SIX-NATION MEETING ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON USSR, AFGHANISTAN

LD312036 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1716 GMT 31 Dec 79 LD

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Britain, America, and four of their allies agreed today that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan "could carry grave implications for the future".

The warning came in a communique issued by six nations taking part in six-hour talks at the Foreign Office in London on the crisis.

The United States' deputy secretary of state, Mr Warren Christopher, had flown to London for the talks attended by Mr Douglas Hurd, minister of state at the Foreign Office, and representatives from Canada, France, West Germany and Italy.

The meeting was to discuss the "serious situation created by the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan".

The communique said that "this intervention goes well beyond the previous level of Soviet activity in Afghanistan and in the Third World generally, and could carry grave implications for the future."

It said that those at the talks "reaffirmed that the people of Afghanistan had the right to determine their own future without foreign interference, and that, if necessary, to ensure that the course of recent events in Afghanistan is not repeated elsewhere".

The communique said that the six representatives were making "appropriate recommendations to their respective governments" in the same spirit of governmental statements already made condemning the Soviet intervention.

When he left the talks Mr Christopher said the one-day conference decided on four steps:

To bring to the attention of the United Nations "this flagrant violation of international law" by the Soviet Union;

That the six nations would "review" their relations with the Soviet Union;

That they would review their diplomatic relations with Afghanistan under its new regime;

That they would review relations with other countries in the area "to ensure they maintain their independence."

Mr Christopher said there was also "a wide measure of agreement among all the participants that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is naked aggression.

"Their attempt to put clothes on their action seems to us to be totally unconvincing."

PRIME MINISTER SAYS 'NO ONE WANTS A CRISIS' IN GOVERNMENT

LD311509 Brussels LE SOIR in French 20 Dec 79 pp 1, 2 LD

[Jacques van Solinge and C.-L. Binnemans 18 December interview with Belgian Prime Minister W. Martens: "Mr Martens Tells LE SOIR: My Ministers Will Do Everything Possible To Avoid A Crisis"--place not given]

[Text] In the flurry of political events of the end of the year, Prime Minister Wilfried Martens has just granted an exclusive interview to LE SOIR.

We chose to ask him simple questions that go beyond the quibbles of experts and party political speakers.

And Mr Martens was equally simple in his answers. And very frank.

"We have," he said, "the desire to find a solution. And the government ministers are best equipped to succeed in this.

"So a steadfast course is being started," the prime minister continued. "Perhaps the beginning of the year will be a period of restored calm for Belgians of every persuasion and language."

[Question] You have seen in succession the three French-speaking chairmen and two Flemish-speaking chairmen of the government majority. What impressions have you gotten from these talks?

[Answer] I get the impression that everyone is aware that though the situation is difficult, it is necessary to do everything possible to avert the crisis. I announced that the government will make specific proposals to break the deadlock in the Senate commission by 9 January and to swiftly implement the second phase of the state reform.

[Question] Do you feel that one or other of your interlocutors is speculating on the government's falling soon or, at the very least, is resigned to that possibility?

[Answer] No. On the contrary, I believe they are all aware of the gravity of the situation and the disastrous consequences that a government crisis would have for our country at the present time in both the socioeconomic and the institutional spheres. I believe I can now say that at the present time no one wants a crisis and that everyone wants to do everything to prevent one.

[Question] You give the impression of wanting to do everything possible to prevent the breakup of the majority. If your efforts were to be successful, what means do you envisage for narrowing the gap between the hard-to-reconcile viewpoints of the French and Flemish speakers in the coalition and for reestablishing a minimum of trust between the parties that support you?

[Answer] The cabinet, dealing with general policy, decided yesterday that in the new year the government will make specific proposals regarding the difficult points of the second phase of the state reform. More specifically, it is a question of the powers, hierarchy of standards, structure and organization of Brussels, and of the financing of communities and regions; however, that list is not exhaustive.

The government will try to include in the irreversible part of the second phase, final solutions for these problems that have stymied every attempt at state reform for 10 years. Obviously, transitory and temporary arrangements are also included in the second phase, for example the composition of the assemblies, the place of the executive within national government, the settlement of conflicts and the delimitation of the Brussels region.

In subsequent weeks, the government wants to try to settle the most ticklish problems. It does not underestimate this task, but there is no point in burying our head in the sand. Aware of the gravity of the situation for the country, the government will assume its responsibilities and make proposals to parliament, which in its turn will have to deliver judgement.

[Question] Do you believe there is hope for your government's success?

[Answer] It all depends on the government's ability to devise solutions. Dialog is essential, even if the two sides' positions have been opposed for years. I believe that the government is the organ best equipped to surmount difficulties because the ministers' political will is indisputable and because each member of government is surrounded by assistants who have had the opportunity in the last 8 months to acquire great experience in the institutional sphere. I would add that it has been agreed that ministers will work in close contact with their respective parties, which means that each will be backed by his chairman. I am very aware of the size of the difficulties and risks and I am certainly not lapsing into pious optimism. I believe that to accept immobility for several months in both the economic and social sphere and the institutional sphere would be to display utter irresponsibility.

AFGHAN EMBASSY SEIZED BY STUDENTS 2 JAN

[Text] Bonn--About 30 persons have stormed the Afghan Embassy in Ickesdorf near Bonn and barricaded themselves inside. According to first reports, the Bonn police have not yet established the nationality of the embassy occupiers whose action is presumed to be in connection with recent events in Afghanistan.

Occupiers Routed Out

[Text] Bonn--The Afghan Embassy in Ickesdorf near Bonn was temporarily occupied this morning by 30 demonstrators said to be Afghan students. According to Bonn police, they cleared the building and took the occupiers into custody who were then released after questioning. According to the police, the reason for the occupation was the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan, against which Afghan students had already demonstrated in Bonn on Tuesday evening.

GOVERNMENT, OPPOSITION CONTINUE CONDEMNATION OF SOVIET INTERVENTION

LD311542 Hamburg DPA in German 1332 GMT 31 Dec 79 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--The government and opposition in Bonn today again condemned Moscow's military intervention in Afghanistan, with varying degrees of sharpness.

Willi Weiskirch, defense policy expert of the CDU/CSU Bundestag party group, believes that the intervention of Soviet military units in Afghanistan has revealed the full danger of the international situation. He said anyone, for example some members of the SPD, who doubted the urgent necessity of the recent NATO decisions in Brussels had been taught otherwise by events in Kabul. He also warned about calling into question NATO's determination toward nuclear counterarming and arms control negotiations through false reactions to the continuing Soviet campaign of threats.

On Saturday [as received] about 100 Afghan students carrying placards bearing slogans such as "Russians Out of Afghanistan" demonstrated in the center of Bonn. In a statement distributed on the streets they called upon all peace-loving people to "condemn the invasion by the Russian imperialists and show solidarity with the struggle of the Afghan people."

CDU OFFICIAL ON SOVIET ACTION IN AFGHANISTAN, DETENTE

[Text] Ludwigshafen--In the view of Werner Marx, CDU deputy and foreign affairs spokesman, the Federal Government should rectify its policy with regard to what was termed "detente." In an interview with the Ludwigshafen DIE RHEINPFALZ, [2 Jan edition] an edited version of which was prereleased to DPA, he referred to the Soviet action in Afghanistan and said that East and West had always differed on the meaning of detente. "I have often pointed out on behalf of my party and parliamentary group that Moscow regards detente as an opportunity to outwit...the West."

Moscow's policy in Asia and Africa had made Bonn's position more difficult. "Peace is now more vulnerable," said Marx. He advised the Federal Republic to "adopt a realistic stance--politically, economically and militarily." He went on to say that, as a result of the USSR's "humiliating challenges" to America, the ratification of SALT II has become "more than questionable."

PRESS COMMENTS ON SOVIET ROLE IN AFGHANISTAN

DW021020 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany
0605 GMT 2 Jan 80 DW

[Press review on Soviet military involvement in Afghanistan]

[Excerpts] Essen's NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG writes: No doubt about it--the eighties are beginning with a serious crisis. Relations between the nuclear superpowers are at rock bottom; the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan threatens world peace. Any false step may lead into an abyss. What has happened in Afghanistan may well happen anywhere else in the world in the future. This is why the West's reaction to the Soviet military action is of decisive significance for the new decade. The crisis can be halted and the danger of the conflict defused only if the Soviets leave the country again as quickly as possible. There are, however, no indications of that so far.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG stresses: By invading Afghanistan Moscow has shown that it does not care a hoot about Washington's warning that detente policy is not a one-way street, that Moscow does not even want to wait for the SALT II treaty if it is offered more favorable and speedier options for enhancing its power. If Carter and his Western allies could make up their minds to take up the Soviet challenge and free the East-West relationship from illusions, the West would not at all be as powerless as it currently sees itself. The danger of its game must be made clear to the Soviet Union in good time, just as it must be told clearly that a price must be paid for the return to detente policy.

Against the background of the Western reaction SCHWARZAELDER BOTE comments as follows: The shock which the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan has caused on a worldwide scale goes deep. Its consequences will become manifest only gradually, but they will be profound and change the course of world policies. This emerges, last but not least, from the words of President Carter who finds himself deceived by Brezhnev. The political activity of the United States and its NATO allies first of all reveals a high measure of concern as well as or a loss for answers. The consequence will be that a painful reassessment of the overall political strategy of the West has become inevitable.

The Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST advocates the following view: It speaks volumes for the unpardonable optimism of the leading Western politicians that U.S. President Carter now charges his Soviet antagonist Brezhnev with breaking his word. Did he really expect anything else? Neither does it testify to a farsighted calculation that alarmed NATO Council members into now hurriedly discussing--and not deciding on--countermeasures. The threat to boycott the Olympic Games will not scare the Moscow hosts a great deal, for come summer the realpolitik advocates in the West will prevail all the way down the line, and with them the old tactics of mollifying, tactics which so far have made imperialists strategy easier for Brezhnev just as they did for Hitler in the past. These are tactics which, in fact, have made such imperialists strategy possible altogether. It is necessary to put an end to the well-liked self-deceit about the cunning adversary which characterized the seventies.

The editorial of STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG reads in part: President Carter used strong words. He charged the Kremlin boss with having provided completely inadequate and misleading information about the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

If Carter means what he says, namely that his assessment of the Soviet Union has drastically changed, then we cannot but wonder what conclusions he proposes to draw from these announcements. The boycott of the Olympic Games in Moscow discussed in Brussels, however, can only be a warning shot. The danger is very great that the two great powers will challenge each other by words and deeds to a point where they will begin to destroy the common basis for talks, above all, on nuclear armaments. By an irresponsible action, possibly as a result of an erroneous assessment, the Soviet Union has accelerated the crisis carousel to a point where it is hard to imagine how it can be halted again.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG voices this assumption: The North Atlantic defense community will have a hard time taking effective sanctions against the Soviet Union in reaction to the Russian aggression in Afghanistan. The consultations of the allies on New Year's Day already showed that NATO will not resort to spectacular countermeasures. A lot would be gained already, however, if the latest example of Soviet power policy were to entail a more realistic assessment of the power ratio between East and West in all countries of the alliance. The Soviet Union can be impressed only with unity and determination.

In this connection the LUDWIGSHAFEN RHEINPFALZ discussed the amended New Year's speech by Chancellor Schmidt: By bringing his speech up to date, Schmidt gave a signal which fit into the most hurriedly arranged consultations of NATO in London and Brussels and which also evoked commotion regarding FRG domestic policy. CDU Deputy Werner Marx immediately came out with a massive statement. It may sound arrogant that he also demanded a correction of Bonn's detente course. Yet Moscow's grip on Afghanistan does indeed seriously bring up the question of what detente policy between West and East is still really worth.

The daily DIE WELT notes: In the original version of his New Year's speech the chancellor was to have spoken of the will for peace and detente on the part of the Soviet Union and the GDR. This surely would have made a droll impression in view of the rattling tanks with which the Soviet Union plowed up the soil of its latest victim of aggression. People in Helmut Schmidt's environment are now saying that he could not have foreseen the developments in Kabul. But was such a perception really necessary to prepare a realistic New Year's speech? Did no other events occur in 1979 which could have caused a realistic statesman to leave the standard phrases about the will for peace on the Eastern side out of the speech this time?

PRESS NOT OPTIMISTIC ABOUT WALDHEIM'S TEHRAN MISSION

DW021026 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 2 Jan 80 DW

[Press review on UN Secretary General Waldheim's mediation efforts in Tehran]

[Text] NUERNBERGER NACHRICTEN writes: Nobody will be so naive as to assume that the UN secretary general will be going back to New York with the promise from Ayatollah Khomeyni that he will release the hostages in the U.S. Embassy without delay and without any return concessions. If we audaciously leave the imponderabilities of the Iranian revolution process aside for a change, Waldheim does have the chance to contribute a great deal toward an improvement in the climate through careful tactics. If he returns totally emptyhanded, then the rulers in Tehran will know, too, that in such an event the United States might feel challenged to draw harsher conclusions than ever before.

The MAINZ ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG makes the following comment: UN Secretary General Waldheim is not in an enviable position with his mission in Tehran.

We may be curious whether the ruling mullahs will deign to receive the UN secretary general at all. Whereas Waldheim hopes to open the door to further negotiations--as he stated prior to his departure--the people in Tehran threaten to slam this very door in his face. In view of the disregard for the United Nations openly displayed by the Iranian Revolution Council and the government in Tehran we cannot, unfortunately, anticipate that the hostage drama, which has lasted for months already, will be brought even one step closer to a good conclusion.

And FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE writes: How long has it been now since a mob that is hard to define took the personnel of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran hostage? Nearly 2 months. Time passes swiftly over the suffering of the prisoners who are hidden to us, and over the impotent words of the U.S. Government which we hear daily. Now UN Secretary General Waldheim is in Tehran where he has been told already that the matter is really none of his business. Yet the world power, the United States, does have reasons to be careful vis-a-vis Iran: It wants to save the lives of the hostages. But what is so fatal in U.S. policy is that it does not look like the result of free decision but like the only option. Or can the United States still act after all? Afghanistan, where no U.S. hostages need to be saved, will tell.

SCHMIDT DISCUSSES ENERGY, DETENTE IN NEW YEAR ADDRESS

[Text] Bonn--Ladies and gentlemen: Many Germans link the observations made at the turn of the year with the idea of contemplation. But you will surely understand on this last evening of the decade of the 70's if I don't try to philosophize, but instead put before you some thoughts connected with the present reality of the world around us.

In 1979 we again came safely through perils and dangers which arose beyond our borders. We have experienced a good economic upswing. The number of Germans seeking work has fallen noticeably, and the labor market today looks better than at any time since 1974. We do not want to pat ourselves on the back for this, and the Federal Government does not want to do so either, but it is quite correct to say and may be said: We can maintain job security in the coming year. But no economics professor, no politician, none of you, ladies and gentlemen, can predict today exactly what risks and what dangers will press upon us in the coming 12 months.

Every one of us has understood what uncertainties have arisen for the supplies of oil for the whole world--for us, the wealthy industrial states, and even more for those developing countries of the Third World that are without raw materials and which, because of the constantly rising energy prices, must reduce even further their already low living standards. Several times this year I have pressed the heads of government of the countries friendly to us for the development of a joint energy policy, at least within the European Community. I will continue to do so in the future. But naturally this is not enough; it is not enough for the Federal Government to urge that electricity should no longer be generated from oil and for me today once again to appeal to the electric companies to use all possibilities to build at least a few new coal-fueled power stations so that our electricity supplies will also be safeguarded when oil becomes even scarcer.

For the time being, to be sure, concern about an acute electricity shortage is unfounded. But, like many of you, I think it's appropriate that the subject of energy occupies us more and more. Many people have grasped these anxieties and are acting sensibly; others still want to put it out of their minds. I would like to urge them to try to adjust to a changed and still changing world energy supply situation. It would be good if, particularly with regard to energy conservation, we could again show the often misunderstood German virtue of discipline.

It is not mere sentimentality when I remind Germans of the middle and older generations who, after the war, coped with enormous problems on their own initiative. Then we did not always call upon the authorities but tackled and achieved a great deal through individual initiative and community cooperation. We certainly haven't lost these abilities. We can revive and reactivate these abilities with profit for the individual and profit for the community.

The problems of the coming decade of the 80's are certainly not beyond our strength, but they are a challenge to every one of us who is interested in something more than his own personal well-being.

In more recent years many people have developed a feeling of responsibility for those who are disadvantaged in one way or another, for those who are themselves not strong enough to keep up, even when they try. I am thinking of the large number of mentally ill and of the many compatriots who have emmigrated from Eastern Europe. It would be a good thing if this feeling that we all have a duty to care for these people and that it is necessary to help them also with taxpayers' money were to be strengthened.

Only a few of our older fellow citizens have material cares, and I want to leave no doubt that pensions are safe, that there will be no cuts, that the situation is in order. But in addition to this the old people must be able to feel that the children and grandchildren and the nieces and nephews are looking after them.

Ladies and gentlemen, the coming decade can be difficult, and not only because of the uncertainties of energy supplies. The whole world is in a state of unrest. Think of Africa, the Near and Middle East, the American hostages in Tehran, with whom we feel solidarity, and Southeast Asia.

I am confident about the prospect that we Germans will cope with our share of the difficulties. For three decades our fraternal Republic of Germany has proved to be a land of much-envied stability. With all our strength, we shall see to it that this stability and internal and external peace are also preserved in the coming decade. For this we need the close partnership with our friends in the West. It also required an honest endeavor for cooperation with our neighbors in the East. But there we cannot conceal our disquiet about the actions of the Soviet Union and its allies in Asia and Africa.

The more the will for detente and cooperation determines political actions in other parts of the world, the more successful will be the cooperation between East and West in Europe. Naturally, we will not be able to move mountains, but every step, even the smallest step, which safeguards peace in Europe and helps to preserve the cohesion of our nation is a step in the right direction. In recent years, and also in 1979, we have advanced many things a little bit in the right direction.

At home we have a Low German saying for this, and I ask for the indulgence of my West German and South German compatriots. It goes like this: "Wenn de Mensch don deit, wat he kann, denn kann er nich mehr don, als he deit," which translated into High German means approximately: "When someone is doing all he can, then you can't expect any more of him." In the decade of the 70's we have done almost everything we could and, therefore, we can enter into the new decade with a good conscience and with a great deal of trust in ourselves. He who does his duty can confidently place his trust in the future, and many people will say that he may place his trust in God.

Ladies and gentlemen, let us go into the new year of 1980 with trust and hope. I wish you a good and joyful new year.

GISCARD ADDRESSES NATION ON NEW YEAR'S EVE

ID312129 Paris Domestic Service in French 1900 GMT 31 Dec 79 ID

[Text] French women and men, my dear friends, may I express the very affectionate wishes of the president of the republic for a happy 1980. These wishes, presented with neither formality nor protocol, are addressed to all French women and men, regardless of their rank or activity, their belief or their opinions. If I may take up the slogan of our republic: They are fraternal wishes. These wishes for happiness are natural for those who are lucky enough to have their families around them or the warmth of their friends. They also go to those who will be spending this evening in solitude as a result of their age or their isolation. I address them also to our distant compatriots in the overseas departments and territories, to the Frenchmen who represent France abroad, to those who have been hit by misfortune in 1979, to the political refugees whom you have generously welcomed and to those women and men who are suffering either with regard to their health or their freedom. I express the wishes of the president of the republic to all you women and men.

But in this dangerous world, at a time when one is seeing the price of oil and gold soar, you are justified in asking yourselves: What do these end-of-the-year wishes mean? Are you being offered an illusion? What can one expect in 1980 and the 1980's?

I shall try to reply to these questions in a few simple and brief words because this is a festive evening for you. Will 1980 bring us peace or war, a worsening of the crisis or the safeguarding of our way of life?

Peace or war? Peace, I hope and we are working for that. The danger of war exists; we are living in one of those periods in which the equilibrium of the world rests on a few men's capacity for composure. I hope that the wisdom of the leaders will prevail. France is working for peace; it does so in the present through its diplomacy, which is firm and realistic and which has contributed to warding off destabilization threats to the neighboring African Continent; it does so for the future through initiatives such as the North-South dialog with a view to removing the causes of inequalities and tensions in the world.

The crisis actually does threaten us. We are going to undergo another shock as a result of the increase in the price of oil, which was recently confirmed in Caracas. The amount to be paid by France and the French will be larger than in 1973-1974. No purpose is served by concealing or denying this. But France is no longer what it was in 1973. It has been transformed since then. It has hardened; facing the difficulties, it is more realistic, is stronger and so is better equipped to resist shocks. Of all the industrial countries, ours is the one to have provided itself with the most complete energy policy. Our nuclear power stations--the security of which is, of course, the object of every necessary precaution--are gradually entering service. They have already allowed the creation of 100,000 jobs. In 10 years--from 1975 to 1985--they will represent the equivalent of 45 million tons of oil annually. This will be as if the French had constructed with their own hands, in a way, an oil deposit capable of producing annually more than half of what our British neighbours gain from the North Sea, an oil deposit which, however, will not become exhausted.

In the same period, our industry was transformed, became adapted. The steel industry--in its death agony last year--has fortunately come back to life. We have systematically entered the high technology sectors, with this year the commercial success of the airbus, the successful launching of Ariane, the development--an unprecedented one--of our telecommunication and data processing.

Yes, the French people have worked hard for 5 years and they have begun to loosen the pressures of the future.

During the same period we have continued our social progress. I want to mention it because in the whirl of criticism the simplest facts are sometimes concealed from you.

The quantity of goods and services produced in France--I say quantity--increased by 15 percent, and this increase has served to reduce the inequalities in the direction of greater justice, because we are living in a period of reduction of inequalities. Here are a few examples: The purchasing power of old people, the least fortunate ones--and I say purchasing power--has increased by 60 percent. The purchasing power of the minimum wage increased by 32 percent. The purchasing power of workers' wages increased by 22 percent. And at the same time, we have embarked on an overall policy of support of families, those living and warm cells of French society.

Thus, despite the crisis, despite the difficulties, France has continued its progress. What we have done we have decided to continue. We have in fact experienced another oil shock, we will again have a deficit of our foreign trade, but little by little we will restore our situation. Why? Because French people are involved. And I should like to tell you a few words about yourselves. As president of the republic, in meeting other leaders, I am proud of representing the French people. They are a serious and courageous people, as they have recently shown in connection with the energy crisis. They have great capacities for adaptation and, for this reason, one must not crush them by compulsory measures or bureaucratic formalities. They are a generous people when the need arises and they have given proof of this in connection with the refugees from Southeast Asia. They are also a people that under dangerous circumstances have an instinct of unity. And for this reason, under such circumstances, the divisions among French people appear so derisory to us.

In 1980 France needs seriousness, courage, adaptability, generousness and unity from the French people. As far as I am concerned, I will devote myself to this search for unity among the French people, this unity which is at the same time so necessary and--in their own hearts--so much desired by the French people.

Dear friends, I am reverting to my words spoken at the beginning to tell you my very affectionate wishes for 1980. A happy new year to you all and also a happy evening now.

WALDHEIM TALKS WITH GOVERNMENT LEADERS

ID010858 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 1 Jan 80 ID

[Text] Kurt Waldheim, the UN secretary general, is flying from Paris to Tehran this morning where he will try to negotiate the release of the American hostages. This is a difficult, almost impossible mission, because it is still not known if Ayatollah Khomeyni will be willing to receive him.

Mr Waldheim himself put no preliminary conditions on this negotiation. Our correspondent was at Roissy Airport last night when the UN envoy arrived:

[Begin Waldheim recording] I have not asked for assurances. All I want is to have the possibility of discussing the very serious situation with the Iranian authorities. I have already explained to you the aim of my visit--to establish concrete contacts with the authorities--and I cannot tell you what result will be obtained on this occasion. [end recording]

During this stopover, French Minister of Foreign Affairs Jean Francois Poncet has reminded us of France's full support for this initiative. It has also been made known that Mr Waldheim has had a long telephone conversation with Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY DEBATE ON EUROMISSILES REPORTED

LD311419 Paris LE FIGARO in French 21 Dec 79 p 6 LD

[Thierry Taittinger report: "Euromissiles Split the Opposition"]

The censure motion submitted by Georges Marchais and his friends received only 86 votes--merely all the members of the Communist group.

Georges Marchais (Communist Party, Val-de-Marne), who defended the censure motion on behalf of his group, delivered a full-blown indictment of the NATO decision, of the French Government, which is an accomplice in that decision, and of Federal Germany, about which he used the kind of revanchist vocabulary that was thought to have disappeared 40 years ago.

According to him, NATO's decision to deploy new American missiles in Europe has no real basis, since the Russian SS-20 missiles involved to justify it have existed since 1975 and are all deployed on Soviet territory. And, Mr Marchais says, the government is NATO's accomplice and has even expressed satisfaction at these decisions.

Decisions of this kind jeopardize France's security: "You are shutting our country inside a bloc that is dominated by the FRG, with its restored power, its desires and its arrogance," Mr Marchais told the prime minister.

Mitterand: France Threatened by Russian Missiles

On behalf of the Socialists, Francois Mitterand (Socialist Party, Nievre) hostile to the Communist censure motion as can be imagined, developed a thesis that did not displease the members of the majority. He recalled that France is part of the Atlantic alliance but does not participate in the NATO joint command and that it has a nuclear force, maintains friendly ties with the USSR and rejects nuclear arms for Germany. There is certainly a national consensus on all these points, he said. Under these conditions France has had neither to accept nor to reject the deployment of American missiles in other countries.

On a world scale, Mr Mitterand believes that arms equilibrium has been more or less achieved. On the other hand, he stated, Soviet superiority in Europe seems to me to be established. As for France, we are simultaneously threatened by tactical and strategic missiles. Why are these missiles targeted on our country?

So the Socialists will not vote for the censure motion--a text that outdoes the Soviet positions, Mr Mitterand said. "The Communist group," the Socialist Party first secretary added, "has called on the Socialists to submit unilaterally to the policy decided by the Communist Party. There is no question of this, nor can there ever be any."

"This censure motion," he concluded, "is a feeble domestic policy operation."

Before answering the substance of the charges leveled by Georges Marchais, Raymond Barre wanted to put the debate in its true context. "Everyone," he said, "has been surprised by the censure motion submitted by the Communist group. Has it really been submitted against the government? There are good reasons for believing that it is a domestic policy operation. But the subject is too important for me not to answer."

"From the outset we have let it be known that we have no intention of being involved in the problem of modernizing so-called 'theater' weapons discussed by our allies."

Raymond Barre went on to recall that France has remained a member of the Atlantic alliance but that since 1966 it has not been a member of the NATO integrated structures. Therefore, our independence is total in the armaments sphere.

On the other hand, this independence must not prompt the conclusion that, as the authors of the censure motion claim, the government is indifferent to the stockpiling of armaments in the world and especially in Europe.

So far as the Vienna talks are concerned, Raymond Barre regards as positive the USSR's decision to withdraw a small part of its forces stationed in East Germany, but the scantness of this progress confirms the government in the conviction that a different approach is needed to disarmament in Europe.

In this connection Raymond Barre recalled the French stance on this issue: "Our plan," he said, "envisages a two-stage process. The first stage whould make it possible to elaborate a coherent package of measures to increase confidence by systematically developing provisions such as the prior notification of troops movements or the sending of observers to military maneuvers." However, such measures, Mr Barre stated, have some point only if they are not an end in themselves but help to prepare for talks on limiting and reducing conventional armaments during a second stage.

Overall, the prime minister concluded, none of the accusations made against the government's policy holds water: "The Communist group has displayed willful deafness; after all, the government has no hand in the decision that is being denounced. Moreover, we have not disregarded our duties to detente and disarmament in Europe. France, which has an independent defense and full capacity for initiative, will continue to contribute to deepening detente, understanding and cooperation in Europe and throughout the world. The government will continue to travel this path, which has the support of the very great majority of the French people."

NOUVELLES LITTERAIRES DEBATE ON PCF STALINISM CITED

LD311109 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Dec 79 p 14 LD

[Text] In its 13-20 December edition, LES NOUVELLES LITTERAIRES published a 19-page dossier on Stalinism in connection with the 100th anniversary of Stalin's birthday. This dossier consists of articles by a number of Communist writers and journalists.

Mr Antoine Spire strives to disprove the validity of the contrast established between Trotsky and Stalin--between "radiant revolution" and "perverted revolution." Mr Jean Elleinstein explains that Stalin's personal dictatorship would have been impossible without the Communist Party's dictatorship in Russia as early as 1920. Mr Raymond Jean refers to an article about linguistics to show that "the very essence of Stalinism consists of first stating something as a fact and then demonstrating the truth of the statement made."

Whereas Mr Elleinstein has recently found that the PCF is being "re-Stalinized," Mrs Yvonne Quiles writes: "There is no comparison between the PCF's past and present behavior. Whatever grievances I may have with respect to it, it is clear that the painful daily work I do in eradicating from my way of being and acting the Stalinist feelings which I have acquired like more or less everybody else, is something I do both in defiance of it and thanks to it."

Referring to new PCF members, the former FRANCE NOUVELLE chief editor writes:

"They are members of a party whose memory they do not share and whose history they do not know. They think that we, the people of my generation, are killjoys. They believe that they are leading the way and do not realize that they are merely marking time. Information has been doled out to them drop by drop, bombastic words have been reinvented for them and walls have been erected to limit their horizon. They have been both nursed and "managed." Hierarchies have been regilded. The high seas have been charted. But after everything has been said and done, the Communists still ask themselves: 'Do you know where you are going?' Doubt is no longer brought out into the open these days. It is in its ability to answer this question that the PCF will find a solution to that false dilemma: Stalinist or non-Stalinist."

And this is what Jacques Fremontier writes. He is a former chief editor of ACTION--a PCF periodical aimed at enterprises--who has decided to leave the Communist Party:

"A party is like an anglers' association--the 1901 law, statues lodged with the prefecture, aim at transforming society...neither more nor less. Anyone seeking to induce me to show any affection, respect or any kind of feeling toward that neutral structure, that purely functional instrument, by this very fact tries to lead me onto the Stalinist path....

"You begin by saying 'Hullo, Georges!' or 'thank you, Roland' and you find yourself supporting the invasion of Kampuchea or condemning LE CANARD ENCHAINE."

BRITAIN TAKES STEPS IN REACTION TO AFGHANISTAN SITUATION

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] International diplomatic moves were underway today to try to isolate the Soviet Union over its invasion of Afghanistan. Britain has instructed its ambassador in the Afghan capital Kabul not to have any political contacts with the new regime which came to power last week with the help of thousands of Soviet armoured troops.

Moves are also afoot by Britain and other Western countries to try to enlist the aid of Third World countries to get the UN Security Council and possibly later the General Assembly to condemn the Soviet move. These steps follow talks in London yesterday between the United States Deputy Secretary of State Mr Warren Christopher and deputy foreign ministers from Britain, Canada, France, Italy and West Germany. Today Mr Christopher was in Brussels to report on the situation to the NATO Council there.

Britain's representative at yesterday's talks, Mr Douglas Hurd, minister of state at the Foreign Office, said today Britain took very seriously the Soviet move in Afghanistan. He said it went "beyond previous Soviet foreign adventures" and unless there was a firm response from the West, the Soviet Union would be encouraged to make similar moves elsewhere.

On the BBC Radio World at One programme Mr Hurd said Britain and the other Western countries would be looking again at all their contacts with the Soviet Union to "see which ones we want to restrict." He said they would be seeking to reassure neighbouring countries, particularly Pakistan, that the West would stand by them to maintain their independence.

This year's Olympics in Moscow were discussed yesterday and Mr Hurd said he believes that although no decision was taken to consider pulling out of the games, the subject was certain to be raised again.

MORNING STAR QUESTIONS 'FOREIGN' INTERFERENCE IN AFGHANISTAN

LD311155 London MORNING STAR in English 31 Dec 79 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "Questions on Afghanistan"]

[Text] The events in Afghanistan raise fundamental questions of deep concern to all involved in the struggle for peace, national liberation and socialism.

The MORNING STAR takes its stand four-square behind the Afghan people in their struggle for national liberation and social progress. Any attempt by U.S. and British imperialism to turn the clock back in Afghanistan or to utilise the increased Soviet involvement there as a pretext for intervention in Iran or elsewhere in the region, must be firmly resisted.

Afghanistan is struggling to free itself from centuries of feudalism and backwardness. This involves complex and difficult problems which had to be resolved, and it is for the Afghan people to do so.

Clearly there were serious divisions within the revolutionary leadership, particularly on the approach which should be taken toward the Islamic groups in revolt, who have been backed by internal and external reactionary forces.

The violent overthrow by Amin of the Taraki government installed by the 1978 revolution was a reflection of this.

The manner of Amin's coup was already a matter of concern in this respect, and it must be said that this concern will not have been lessened by the speed with which Amin, in his turn, has now been tried and executed.

Mr Karmal, the new leader of the government in Kabul appears to favour a conciliatory approach toward the Islamic groups, and that is said to have been the advice which the Soviet Union has given all along.

Such an approach may very well be correct. What is wrong is the use of foreign military force to bring in a new government to follow such policies, for there are wider implications.

Though no one denies that Mr Karmal asked for military assistance, it is by no means clear that he was entitled to do so as the established power in Afghanistan.

This is where the issue impinges on the principle of non-interference in other countries. This principle is central to the struggle for world peace and disarmament, so crucial at the present time.

The imperialists have always been ready to breach this principle if it suits their purpose and if they can get away with it. The U.S. in Vietnam, the Israelis in Lebanon, the South Africans in Angola, and the Rhodesians in Zambia and Mozambique are a few of the recent examples.

To stress the importance of non-interference which all this shows, does not in any way minimize the need, indeed the duty, to offer assistance and solidarity to the democratic and progressive forces fighting for liberation in Afghanistan as elsewhere.

In fact, the principle of non-interference is a weapon against imperialist intrigue and military adventure and, as such, it is a vital element in mobilizing solidarity on the widest and most effective international scale.

STEEL INDUSTRY STRIKE BEGINS, LONG DURATION FORESEEN

LD020310 London BBC Domestic Service in English 0300 GMT 2 Jan 79 LD

[Text] The first national strike in Britain's steel industry since 1926 began at midnight. Production has come to a halt at all the British steel plants through the country, involving nearly 100,000 workers, and both sides now seem resigned to the fact that it could stretch on for several weeks.

LD020612 London BBC Domestic Service in English 0600 GMT 2 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The steel industry has been brought to a standstill now that almost 100,000 steel workers have begun a national strike. It's the first in Britain since 1926. The strike went ahead at midnight after the failure of talks between the two sides during the Christmas break. The two unions involved--the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation and the blast furnacemen--have rejected a pay offer of 6 percent. Other unions have said they will support the strike, and later today the National Union of Railwaymen will give details of the part they will play.

U.S. REPORTEDLY TO REOPEN 'SPY STATIONS' IN NORTH

NC310650 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 31 Dec 79 p 1 NC

[Text] According to clear-cut information, contacts were held recently between the competent U.S. agencies and the Denktas administration concerning the operation of the spy stations existing in the occupied areas. According to the same information, through Ankara mediation an unofficial agreement has been reached according to which:

1. The transportation of technical material is tacitly permitted for the operation and modernization of the radio stations.

2. Permission is given for the movement of U.S. personnel who are using the illegal airport of Tymbou for this purpose.

These are the indications: Following the Iranian events, the operation of the spy stations has been stepped up and, moreover, these installations have been linked with similar installations in operation in Turkey for the collection and transmission of information.

It is not ruled out--on the contrary, it is considered certain--that some financial compensation is being paid to the Denktas clique in return for the operation of the radio stations.

GREEK CYPRIOT SPOKESMAN UNAWARE OF NEW WESTERN INITIATIVES

NC290916 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 29 Dec 79 pp 1, 8 NC

[Excerpt] Official sources have described as quite perceptible the intensive mobility and increased interest being demonstrated by Western quarters in the Cyprus problems. So far, however, the Cyprus Government has not had, at least officially, any specific information about the substance and real contents of the West European backstage plans or thoughts--as they call them--within the framework of some advanced British initiative.

The government spokesman yesterday limited himself to stating that the government is not aware of anything. He said this when asked about exclusive reports in TA NEA concerning a scenario, similar to the Rhodesian one, for a Cyprus solution. The spokesman also gave the same answer when asked whether the State Department is promoting an improved version of the well-known U.S. plan which was submitted to the Cyprus Government in 1978 and rejected.

However, official sources have stated that President Kiprianou's forthcoming visit to West European countries is regarded as highly important and it is expected that, during his talks with British Prime Minister Thatcher, he will bring up for discussion the views and plans of the Foreign Office. The same sources have stressed that President Kiprianou will stress to the British Prime Minister the commitments undertaken by Britain to safeguard the independence of Cyprus. President Kiprianou will also make it clear that the solution of the Cyprus problem should be within the spirit and letter of the UN decisions and resolutions on Cyprus.

ROLANDHIS RESPONDS TO DENKTAS STATEMENT ON FAMAGUSTA HOTELS

NC282107 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 28 Dec 79 NC

Mr Rolandhis said in his statement that Denktas is experienced enough to know that this is an empty offer. He knows very well that those who have toiled for generations to create Famagusta, which has already been baptized Maras [name as heard], have not done so to end up as slaves in a town that belongs to them. Mr Rolandhis adds: However, Denktas is aiming at something else. Of course he is not concerned about the Famagusta hoteliers, but about the hotels. Before getting his hands on these he wants to prepare the world by saying that he has offered the hotels to their owners but that they have refused to reopen them. Of course, as usual he will say nothing about the invasion, occupation and usurpation, on which he has founded his unlawful and internationally condemned regime to which he wants to subject the Famagusta hoteliers.

Mr Rolandhis stressed: All this is taking place while the UN secretary general is about to begin contacts on the basis of the 19 May agreement, the spirit and the letter of which are incompatible with the laws of the occupation regime.

The foreign minister added: If Mr Denktas is really inspired by a desire to contribute to solving the Cyprus problem, let him leave aside his empty and provocative words and proceed to the talks on the basis of the agreements that he concluded but has not yet respected. Mr Rolandhis concluded: If he is counting on the hotels, he must know that he must also take into consideration the hoteliers.

TFSC'S ATAKOL RAPS GREEK CYPRIOT REACTION TO HOTEL PROPOSAL

TA281816 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 28 Dec 79 TA

Pointing out that the Greek Cypriot leaders noted that this attitude violates the sixth article of the agreement reached at the summit meeting on 19 May, Atakol said: So, they remember the sixth article. Then let them also remember all the steps they have taken since the summit meeting which reject the sixth article and the entire agreement. The recent UN resolution is a most vivid example of this. The opening of the hotels cannot be linked to the [word indistinct] agreement to be reached on Maras. The opening of the hotels is necessary for the economy of the island. The status to be granted to Maras depends on the resumption of the intercommunal talks and their positive conclusion. It is not clear how long this will take. As long as the Greek Cypriot leaders continue the long term policies approved by Kiprianou, the resumption of the talks will probably take a long time.

Atakol expressed the belief that a positive reply will be given to the appeal made as an extension of the contacts started in London with certain Greek Cypriot businessmen and hoteliers.

AKEL NEW YEAR'S MESSAGE NOTES PROPOSAL ON CONSTITUTIONAL PLAN

NC292128 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 29 Dec 79 NC

[Text] In a new year's message, AKEL said that new serious dangers threaten the Cypriot people, and that in order to successfully confront these dangers it is necessary to have the maximum patriotic unity of the people based on the correct line and tactics as laid down in the Greek side's 1977 proposals, the Makarios-Denktas agreement, the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement and the UN resolutions.

The message adds: It is necessary that both sides exert efforts to resume the intercommunal talks, which should be held in a positive and constructive way to solve the domestic aspect of the Cyprus problem.

AKEL reiterated its proposal for the submission of a constitutional plan that would elaborate in detail the Greek side's 1977 proposals. It then addressed a message of fraternity, understanding and cooperation to the Turkish Cypriots, urging them to embark on a common struggle against chauvinism and to peacefully resolve any differences at the negotiating table along the lines of a biregional federation.

TURKISH CYPRIOT MINISTER REPORTS DETAILS OF 1980 BUDGET

[Text] The Council of Ministers today finalized the 1980 fiscal year budget of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus at 3.23 billion Turkish lira. In a news conference today on the subject of the new budget, Economy and Finance Minister Hakki Atun said it was prepared in accordance with the 1980 program of the 5-year development plan.

The 1980 fiscal year budget, which was finalized by the Council of Ministers at 3.23 billion lira and which will be submitted to the legislative assembly today in accordance with the Constitution, allocates 1,401.5 million lira to current and personnel expenditures. Atun said that current and personnel expenditures include a cost of living payment of 110 million lira to fixed income groups in order to alleviate the effects of inflation. Atun noted that a total of 827.2 million lira was allocated to transfer payments, 645.8 million lira to investment and 245.5 million Turkish lira to defense.

On the incomes section, Atun said that local incomes are estimated at 1,947.3 million lira, that there will be a domestic debt of 75 million lira and that aid from Turkey has been fixed at 500 million lira. Atun also added that besides the 638.1 million lira loan to be secured from Turkey and other countries, the aid to be extended by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees and other sources will amount to 69.6 million Turkish lira.

GOVERNMENT VOICES OPPOSITION TO USSR ACTION IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] In reply to a question by reporters in connection with yesterday's visit by Soviet Ambassador in Athens Kaboshkin to Deputy Foreign Minister Zaimis, the government spokesman stated the following: The Soviet ambassador briefed Zaimis on the subject of Afghanistan. The deputy foreign minister informed him that Greece's firm position is that armed intervention by third countries against the territory of any independent, sovereign state creates dangers for international peace and security.

Deputy Foreign Minister Zaimis also received U.S. Ambassador in Athens McCloskey who conveyed a message to him from the U.S. Government in connection with the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan and asked the Greek Government's views on this issue. Zaimis replied to McCloskey and stated that, as had already been announced, Greece opposes any foreign military intervention.

KKE (INTERIOR) STATEMENT ON SOVIET INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

AT301955 Athens I AVYI in Greek 30 Dec 79 p 1 AT

[Statement by Bambis Dhrakopoulos, secretary general of the Central Committee of the KKE (Interior)]

[Excerpt] The secretary of the Central Committee of the KKE (Interior) has made the following statement:

"We are clearly opposed to the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan because it is contrary to the principle of independence and nonintervention in the internal affairs of other countries which must be the banner of all progressive and socialist forces in their struggle against imperialism, for peace, democracy and socialism.

"This intervention creates specific dangers of new complications and new interventions by U.S. imperialism in the area of the Middle East which is so vital to world peace."

RIZOSPASTIS WARNS OF INVOLVEMENT IN U.S. PLANS AGAINST ARAB STATES

[Excerpts] Only a few days after its total concurrence with American nuclear missile plans for Europe, the "New Democracy" government now openly alines itself with imperialist policy on the Middle and Near East, thus accepting relevant responsibility for supporting possible adventurist U.S. operations in the area.

The government position appears fully alined with the provocative position of Washington and other NATO member states. It is characteristic that it was expressed during yesterday's meeting between Deputy Foreign Minister Zaimis and U.S. Ambassador McCloskey who, as it was announced, "handed Zaimis a message from the U.S. Government on the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan and asked for the views of the Greek Government on the matter." Also according to the same announcement, Zaimis "replied that, as already announced, the position of the Greek Government is in opposition to outside military intervention."

It is observed that the Greek Government's sincere support of Washington does not appear in any way limited to verbal expressions alone. [paragraph continues]

As can be clearly seen from the activities and the statements by U.S. officials, the recent change in the Peoples Republic of Afghanistan is intended to be used as an excuse for U.S. interventionist operations against the Iranian revolution and against Arab states in the area in an effort to counterbalance the dismal failure of its plans against the Afghan revolutionary regime.

This unprovoked activity of the United States and its allies, as stressed by political observers, creates serious dangers to peace and security in the area. At the same time, it reveals the true goals of the suspicious and hypocritical furor over the alleged "Soviet intervention" in Afghanistan.

The virtual harmonization of the Greek Government to U.S. policy on the entire issue, according to the same observers, particularly strengthens the specific danger of our country's involvement in the planned U.S. high-handed actions in the Near East area.

This becomes ever clearer at a time when a number of indications and specific reports, which have not yet been denied, lead to the conclusion that the necessary military-technical preparations in the area of the east Mediterranean are already underway.

I VRADHINI ON POSSIBLE QADDUMI, 'ARAFAT VISITS

[Text] There was confirmation in Athens of a report from Amman that the head of the PLO's Political Department, Faruq Qaddumi, will visit Greece. The exact date of his visit has not yet been fixed, but it is estimated to take place in late January or early February.

This will be the first official visit to Greece by a senior leading personality of the organization for talks with members of the government and, naturally, with representatives of political parties.

Political observers interpret this official visit of the leading PLO representative as a first step toward its recognition by the Greek Government.

As is well known, Palestinian leader 'Arafat is due to visit our country during the winter.

Envoy to Kuwait Comments

AT271934 Athens Domestic Television in Greek 1900 GMT 27 Dec 79 AT

[Text] In reference to press reports on the interview granted by the Greek Ambassador to Kuwait Yeoryios E. Vandalis on Yasir 'Arafat's visit to Athens, a Greek Government spokesman said that, in answering a Kuwait newsman's question, the ambassador specifically said: "I have no details on this matter. In any case, such a visit could only take place after an official invitation."

PAPANDREOU SEEKS EXPLANATION OF ERKMEN REMARK ON LAUSANNE TREATY

AT291445 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 29 Dec 79 p 1 AT

[Text] At a minimum, it is necessary for the Greek Government to demand clarifications on the Turkish foreign minister's statement about the "shakiness" of the Lausanne Treaty. This was stressed yesterday by PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou to newspaper political editors. Papandreou described as "strange" Erkmen's reference to the Lausanne Treaty, and added that it is Ankara's obvious intention to "dispute the Lausanne Treaty which is critical for our country's borders."

Turkey, he continued, follows the Hitlerite policy of "lebensraum" and succeeds in creating the impression that there is an Aegean issue which should be resolved through Greek-Turkish negotiations. For this reason, Erkmen's statement should not go without a reply.

(According to dispatches from Ankara, Turkey's Foreign Minister Erkmen, while speaking the day before yesterday at the National Assembly during the debate on the budget, claimed that the problems which have arisen in the Aegean between Greece and Turkey spring from the fact that "the balance which had been restored with the Lausanne Treaty in 1923 has been shaken.")

The government did not respond last night to A. Papandreou's statement on this issue.

In the same conversation with political editors, referring to the issue of the visit by the leader of the PLO, Yasir 'Arafat, to Greece, A. Papandreou accused the government of vagueness and of backtracking. The government should explain, he said, why the invitation to 'Arafat and the permit for the establishment of PLO offices in Greece have been suspended. The only explanation one can give, he went on to say, is that the government is awaiting the "green light" from Washington and NATO. We are led to this interpretation by its stance on the issue of the cruise and Pershing-2 missiles. We must, he continued, take as clear a position on the Palestinian issue as the Palestinians have taken on the Cyprus issue. Our position on this issue is the key to our relations with the Arabs. PASOK has extended an invitation to 'Arafat, who has accepted it and will come to Greece. However, we suggested that he wait a little lest the government send him an invitation, because that would be best. We ask the government to invite the leader of the PLO and to stop "playing hide and seek."

(Commenting on A. Papandreou's statement about the 'Arafat issue, the government spokesman stated the following late last evening: "The PASOK chairman is excessively hasty in his judgments about the Palestinian issue. The government is dealing responsibly with this issue and Foreign Minister G. Rallis intends to see Faruq Qaddumi at the end of January or early February in Athens.")

Finally, in reply to questions connected with the economic situation, the PASOK chairman referred to the LAD [expansion unknown] report on the European economy and said it is obvious that in Western Europe the rate of development will drop to zero, that there will be unemployment which will hurt young people in particular, and that protectionist tendencies in every country will be enhanced with a weakening of the connective link provided by the EEC. For Greece, he added, this is the worst moment to talk about the EEC. The government itself will be forced to violate many of the rules of association and accession. The problem, however, he concluded, is that the government does not know what it is doing or what it should do.

TO VIMA REPORTS U.S. SEARCH FOR 'NEW' TURKISH SITUATION

[Article by TO VIMA correspondent St. Evstathiadhis: "The Americans Are Looking for a 'New Scheme of Things' in Turkey"]

[Text] The State Department and at least two governments of NATO member states are concerned with the development of political affairs in Turkey and particularly with the prospects and viability of a government which, "without deviating from the established line of close cooperation with the West, NATO and Washington, would satisfy a great portion of new and politically homeless groups of Turkish citizens."

The evaluation of a group of American experts, who last November examined the "prospects of political possibilities for a stable Turkish political balance," is that: one--the Demirel government does not guarantee long-term political stability; and, two--the prerequisites do exist in Turkey for the "emergence" of a political situation independent of the two existing political parties. The group of American experts dealt with the "Turkish enigma," as it was described in a preamble by a senior State Department official who specifically dealt with Turkish political developments on the recommendations of the State Department's European division following a relevant decision by Secretary of State Vance.

Perhaps the most interesting element in relation to the estimates of Turkish political developments is the conclusion that a considerable portion of the "politically active" urban class is not satisfied with the "political ideology" of Ecevit's party nor with the "government experience" of the conservative elements within Demirel's party. This portion appears to remain stable when Ecevit or Demirel are in authority. It is of interest that the "admission"--as stressed in the American report--reveals that the army does not ideologically or politically influence the Turks, who have been politically and ideologically isolated from the two large political parties. Stress is also made of the fact that the search for a new political situation does not appear to concern the military element to any great extent.

The conclusions, supported with interesting facts on the social position and cultural standing of Turks with a general economic potential, lead the American experts to indicate to the State Department that it should assist in the creation and establishment of a "movement of enlightened political revival." According to their views, such a movement would concentrate the political interest of the greatest portion of small business and the intelligentsia, who remains outside everyday politics and government practice. It is even concluded that the greatest majority of the culturally developed Turkish population "will get hooked onto" the movement and this not only because to date it has remained outside the two greatest Turkish political parties but also because "the movement will offer them a fundamental hope and prospects for a basic presence at the level of formulating Turkish policy."

The ideological, political orientation of this "movement" is defined as pro-Western, pro-NATO and pro-American but two observations are offered, which are interesting from all aspects: One is that a great portion of the Turkish intelligentsia and practionaires has already placed itself in support of neutralism and the center-left, but its relations with the other international movements are limited; the second is that both Ecevit's as well as Demirel's parties "will probably turn their attention and even the state apparatus against such a movement, even stopping the ideological-political war being waged between them." This, naturally, "creates problems" both for the movement but also for those who would motivate it.

The American expert's report which is already in the hands of State Department officials and in the hands of Congress will be the subject for a wider discussion between internationalists, political researchers, diplomats and other interested people from West European countries, Turkey and the United States who will deal with Turkey and its political developments at a scientific conference next April in West Germany.

It is, however, interesting that the conclusions of the American expert's report on Turkey basically coincide with the conclusions of a study-report by a German expert at the University of Munich. [paragraph continues]

The report, portions of which have been published in the Turkish press and political magazines of West Germany and the United States, concludes that the "political disappointment" of the greatest portion of the Turkish intelligentsia and medium to small urbanites recognize the "unwillingness of the state apparatus to draw away from the proscribed (ideological-political) personalities who forge Turkish policy and, without becoming specific, recommends the formation of a 'political movement of enlightenment reform' in Turkey."

This coincidence--that Americans and West Germans support a new political "movement" of "enlightened political reform" in Turkey--is rather peculiar.

GOVERNMENT LIFTS ECONOMIC SANCTIONS ON RHODESIA

[Text] President of the Republic Tsatsos has signed legislation stating that, effective today, Greece has lifted the economic sanctions it had imposed on Rhodesia. These sanctions had come into force in 1967 following a resolution by the UN Security Council. Greece is already restoring its economic relations with Rhodesia in the wake of the signing in London of the relevant agreement, which settles the constitutional future of that country, and following the UN Security Council resolution which asks member states of the international organization to lift sanctions against Rhodesia.

MILITARY VEHICLES MANUFACTURED DOMESTICALLY TO CUT IMPORTS

[Text] Greek-made armoured cars, tanks, Bren-carriers and other armoured vehicles may replace imported vehicles in the near future, according to Greek press sources.

Following the purchase of the Steyer S.A. Lorry and tractor manufacturer by the Greek State, increased investment capital, to be provided by the Greek Industrial Development Bank (ETVA) and other interests, will mean that Greek vehicles such as bulldozers, caterpillars, harvesting machines and track vehicles may take over a large share of the imported market with the aid of foreign (probably Austrian) know-how.

Already the Armed Forces High Command has shown interest in Steyer Hellas S.A., as the nationalised company will be called, and may sign contracts worth 7.5 billion drachmas for the provision of 3,500 heavy duty lorries and 1,500 combustion engines.

In addition, Steyer Ostereich may undertake to purchase 10,000 engines over five years from the Greek company, whose share capital has already been increased by more than $13,900,000.

CHIEF OF GENERAL STAFF ISSUES WARNING TO PRESIDENT

AFP Report

NC020834 Paris AFP in English 0810 GMT 2 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Ankara, Jan. 2 (AFP)--The Turkish Army today issued President Fahri Koruturk with a strong plea for unity among all consitutional bodies to pluck the country from the dangers it currently faces, the newspaper HURRIYET reported. The report said the call was made in a letter handed to the president by Army Chief of Staff General Kenan Evren.

The letter urged "all constitutional bodies to unite, show solidarity and support one another to save the country from the dangers facing it and from the impasse where it now finds itself." Quoting one member of the Turkish military, HURRIYET said the letter did not say that the army would intervene if its appeal was ignored.

The source described it as "a warning in a positive sense addressed not to one single party or to several political parties, but to all constitutional institutions." Another member of the military quoted by HURRIYET said that only one alternative remained if the army's proposals were not acted upon. The letter did not detail that alternative.

He warned that the army could not remain silent faced with anarchy, the country's present economic situation and major movements aimed at splitting the country. "The sterile quarrels and disputes between parties can only add a greater dimension to the problem," he said.

HURRIYET, Turkey's biggest-circulation daily, said that President Koruturk was expected to make a reply today. He was also due to meet with Premier Suleyman Demirel and opposition leader Bulent Ecevit.

Text of Letter

TA021056 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Jan 80 TA

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk has issued a statement concerning his meeting with Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, force commanders and the general commander of the gendarmerie. According to information received from the press and public relations office of the President's Office, Koruturk's statement is as follows:

During his weekly meeting with me on Thursday, 27 December 1979, Honorable Evren submitted to me, as the president of the National Security Council, a letter explaining the impressions and views obtained during the military inspections and tours conducted by himself, the force commanders and the general commander of the gendarmerie throughout the country during 1979. I wish to bring the situation to the attention of the relevant persons and notify the public.

Meanwhile, the press and public relations office of the President's Office issued the text of the foreword to the letter written by Evren and the text of the letter entitled "The Views of The Turkish Armed Forces," which was signed by Evren, the force commanders and the general commander of the gendarmerie. The foreword submitted by Evren to Koruturk on the subject of the letter is as follows:

My Honorable President: It seems to be an inevitable necessity that, in the present atmosphere of the country, constitutional organizations and especially political parties seek--within the parliamentary and democratic system--joint measures in accordance with an Ataturkist national view and solutions in a bid to insure the [word indistinct] of our stage, national unity and the security of life and property of the people.

You are aware that the decisions made on this subject during the various meetings of the National Security Council were not implemented with positive results because of the barren attitude and position of parties in the opposition. During my meetings with generals at the army level and with army corps commanders during my recent tours together with the force commanders, all commanders voiced the need to warn once again all constitutional organizations and political parties in a bid to achieve a speedy result at a time when we most need national unity and togetherness.

In the light of this decision, I present the views of the Turkish Armed Forces to your excellency as the president of the National Security Council. I leave it up to your great judgment to act appropriately.

With my respects,

[Signed] Gen Kenan Evren, chief of the General Staff

The text of the letter signed by the chief of the General Staff, the force commanders and the commander of the gendarmerie and entitled "The Views of the Turkish Armed Forces" is as follows:

The view of the Turkish Armed Forces: The Turkish Armed Forces have been forced to call on all constitutional institutions effective in and responsible for the administration of the country and especially the political parties to perform their duties in order to secure national unity and solidarity against the gradually increasing anarchy, terror and secessionism in view of the most significant political, economic and social atmosphere in our country. We have observed with concern the anarchic incidents that our primary and secondary school children have forcefully been dragged into by organized activists on the anniversary of the Kahramanmaras incidents. Our nation can no longer tolerate those who misuse the extensive freedoms stipulated in our Constitution, those who sing the communist Internationale instead of our national anthem, those who invite the canonical system, those who wish to replace the democratic system with all sorts of fascism, anarchy, destruction and secessionism.

The fact that political parties in power fill all government posts with persons who will act in accordance with party views has forcefully caused a division among civil servants and the citizens. This division created by the political parties is causing the gradual formation of domestic sources which support anarchy and secessionism, and is separating various police, teachers and many other organizations into enemy camps. The Turkish Armed Forces has decided to warn the political parties which do not bring solutions to Turkey's political, economic and social problems, which cannot prevent mounting anarchy and secessionism and thus the threat to national unity, which make concessions to secessionist and destructive groups, and which maintain their intransigent attitude due to sterile political disputes.

The developments in our region can give rise to an active war in the Middle East at any moment. Domestic anarchists and secessionists are rehearsing for a general countrywide uprising. Given the current situation, it is of vital importance that the short and long term measures aimed at speedily insuring the security of life and property of our citizens and at securing unity and solidarity in the country be adopted at our lofty assemblies.

On the other hand, we have observed with concern that the committees have been formed only 1 and ½ months after the assemblies have resumed their activities and that an agenda has not yet been adopted to insure the discussion of the country's problems which are awaiting urgent solutions.

It is a clear reality that uniting our citizens around a joint destiny, pride and concern and making them an indivisible entity sharing the same national ideals and consciousness inspired by Ataturkist nationalism, are the major factors in securing domestic peace and tranquility. Solving the present crisis is the duty of the government as well as of all the other political parties.

The Turkish Armed Forces, aware of the responsibilities and duties bestowed upon them by the domestic service law, insistently call upon political parties to unite in the face of the vital problems facing Turkey, to give priority to our national interests in accordance with our constitutional principles and with an Ataturkist view and to jointly take all measures against all activities aimed at destroying the state such as anarchy, terror and secessionism. The Turkish Armed Forces also calls on all other constitutional institutions to extend aid in this direction.

Government, Opposition Statements

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk, who met with the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders yesterday, received both Prime Minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel and RPP leader Bulent Ecevit at the Cankaya Mansion at 1100 today. Demirel said that during the meeting, which lasted 35 minutes, Koruturk read the text of the letter submitted to him by the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders. Demrel also said that he did not wish to comment on the text of the letter, but that the situation was serious and the letter in question will be announced to the press.

Noting that the government had undertaken to shoulder many difficulties and to seek remedies, Demirel said the present government is not responsible for the present situation in Turkey. Pointing out that his government assumed power after receiving a vote of confidence in the parliament and that it began to work with great enthusiasm, Demirel said: Now we are facing a situation. I would not like to describe this situation. I would also not like to state how one should behave from now on. The situation will be assessed with a cool head.

A reporter recalled the warning made by the armed forces on 12 March 1971 and the subsequent resignation of the government, and asked what will be the political consequences of the letter submitted to Koruturk yesterday. Demirel replied: The government has been in power for 30 days. If the government is responsible for the present situation or if such a claim can be made, then I can understand. Then it is possible to make such an interpretation.

After the meeting, Ecevit said that the letter submitted to Koruturk by the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders is a new development in the crisis. Ecevit said the text of the letter expressed the concern of the armed forces regarding violent incidents, terror, threats against democracy, state and national unity--a concern felt by the majority of the nation--and their requests on this issue. Ecevit said: The fact that the honorable commanders have visited the president for a specific purpose and the fact that they have submitted this written text are unfortunately signs of the new dimension of the crisis in Turkey. I would have wished for the establishment of a productive party before reaching such a point. I would also have wished for a positive response to our good-willed calls. However, unfortunately, this opportunity has been missed.

PRESIDENT, CHIEF OF GENERAL STAFF ISSUE NEW YEAR MESSAGES

President Koruturk Message

TA011646 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1600 GMT 1 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 1 Jan (AA)--President Fahri Koruturk has noted that Turkey has to face major difficulties arising out of her domestic structure in addition to worldwide socioeconomic crises. In a new year message, Koruturk cited the prevention of acts of anarchy and terror and securing of economic stability as the major tasks to be accomplished in 1980.

He believed that a majority of citizens wished the preservation of national peace, calm and integrity without political bickering and expediency. He considered it essential for members of parliament and other institutions established by the Constitution to take effective measures and to implement them in full in order to create such an atmosphere of calm and security.

It was necessary to make sacrifices at times such as these, he noted, in order to maintain "without deviation" the liberal democratic parliamentary system which the Turkish people have "consciously opted for in the belief that it is the best of all regimes."

General Evrèn Statement

TA011121 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 31 Dec 79 TA

[Summary] The chief of the General Staff, Gen Kenan Evren, issued a message to the armed forces on the occasion of the new year. Praising the armed forces for the way they have been carrying out their duties under the martial law as well as in national and NATO maneuvers, General Evren said that the Turkish Armed Forces made great contributions to regional and world peace. The chief of the General Staff said: "Our country, which can neither produce oil nor export technology, is being unfavorably affected in both aspects and is consequently faced with the greatest crisis of the history of our republic. This situation is being utilized very well by our enemies at home and abroad; dark designs are being pursued regarding our country and efforts are being made to eliminate our unity and indivisibility. The Turkish nation and the Turkish Armed Forces which have followed Ataturk's principle of 'peace at home and peace in the world' meticulously so far, must be strong and powerful to be able to continue to pursue this principle. Unfortunately, the present situation is not a happy one. This situation can be changed with national unity and solidarity."

The chief of the General Staff then said: "I am convinced that you [the Turkish Armed Forces] will assess the games being played in the countries around our beautiful country--and the games certain circles want to play in our country as well--from this viewpoint, and that you will solve all the problems in the light of the principles of our great leader, Ataturk."

General Evren then praised the discipline of the Turkish Armed Forces and wished them a happy new year "with the full conviction that they will keep the Turkish Armed Forces and the Turkish nation alive with a spirit of unity and solidarity and in line with Ataturk's principles until the end of the world."

VOTCP ISSUES STATEMENT ON SOVIET ROLE IN AFGHANISTAN

TA020834 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 2 Jan 80 TA

[Statement issued on 31 December by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee]

[Text] Foreign forces headed by U.S. imperialism have led an uninterrupted attack against the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and the April revolution. They have done this directly and by supporting internal counterrevolutionary gangs. They have long been interfering with arms in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. The betrayal of the people by the Amin clique--the agent of U.S. imperialism--threatened the gains of the revolution. This clique overthrew Taraki--one of the leaders of the April revolution--implemented a policy of terror against tens of thousands of Afghan citizens, established a bloody regime of tyranny and attempted to bring back the previous feudal system of exploitation. Hence, a situation was created which threatened the national independence and territorial integrity of Afghanistan as well as the peace and security of the region.

There were forces in Afghanistan which could thwart this threat and protect the gains of the revolution. The Revolutionary Council led by Babrak Karmal, who was elected general secretary of the Afghanistan People's Democratic Party Central Committee, established a real people's power which will lead the national democratic revolution to its final victory. The new government called on all national and progressive forces to unite in the struggle for this aim. It took new, firm measures in a bid to defend the gains of the revolution, national independence, territorial integrity, rights of sovereignty and peace. Within this framework, the legal government of Afghanistan requested from the Soviet Union multifaceted aid--including military aid--based on the goodneighborliness, cooperation and friendship agreement between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union. This request is entirely in accordance with every country's indisputable right to defend--individually or collectively--its country and the peace as stipulated in article 51 of the UN Charter.

The Turkish Communist Party [TCP], the Turkish working class and our people approve of this internationalist aid extended by the Soviet Union upon the request of the Afghanistan Government and heartily support it. The Turkish people have not forgotten the help extended by the Soviet Union--our friend in need--during our national liberation war.

Imperialists, especially expansionist U.S. imperialist circles, and Beijing hegemonists launched a massive campaign against the revolutionary measures of the Afghanistan Government and the internationalist aid of the Soviet Union. The truth behind their outcry is that the imperialist plans to dominate Afghanistan have once again failed. Through this outcry, the imperialists are attempting to conceal that for a long time they have interfered with arms in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and provoked the internal counterrevolutionaries. They are trying to hide their plans to create new military blocs in our region, to establish bases, to realize military concentrations and thus to prepare for aggressive designs. In addition, they wish to render ineffective the people's increasing reaction against their moves to escalate tension through the NATO decision to deploy nuclear missiles in Western Europe.

In line with the Carter administration's directives, the Demirel government, which approves of imperialist interference in Afghanistan's internal affairs, joined the slander campaign against the revolution and people of Afghanistan and the internationalist aid of the Soviet Union. The government, which in Brussels said yes to NATO's nuclear missiles, thus took a new step toward the imperialist policy of undermining peace and security and stifling the people's independence. The government's attitude is aimed at undermining our good relations with our neighbors and with the fraternal Afghan people.

The government is trying to conceal from the public the secret bargainings with U.S. imperialists and the bilateral slavery agreements, which they [presumably U.S. imperialists] want to further strengthen. Furthermore, the government is planning to increase its attacks against the democratic rights and freedoms of the people and against the living conditions of the workers and toilers.

The TCP supports the Afghanistan revolution and the just struggle of the Afghan people against our common enemy imperialism and reaction. The TCP calls on all the country's forces which favor peace, independence, democracy and socialism and on all our people to strengthen solidarity with the people of Afghanistan and to oppose the anti-Soviet campaign waged by the reactionaries.

VOTCP CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT'S STAND ON AFGHANISTAN

[Unattributed commentary: "Solidarity With the Afghan Revolution, Which Has Reached a New Stage"]

[Text] The expected uproar has begun in the imperialist camp. In line with U.S. President Carter's call to the NATO countries, all reactionary forces began the known anti-Soviet chorus against the Afghan revolution. This chorus reflects the anger caused by the foiling of plans aimed at choking the Afghan revolution and rekindling the fires of [word indistinct] in the region.

At a sign from their master, Demirel, Turkes and Feyzioglu--the lackeys of U.S. imperialism in our country--have begun an attack. In a statement, the Council of Ministers tried to criticize the aid extended by the Soviet Union to Afghanistan based upon an agreement with that country and in accordance with article 51 of the UN Charter and made upon the call of the legal Afghan Government. It made unfounded claims to the effect that there was an intervention in the internal affairs of Afghanistan.

What is the true situation? By toppling the followers of Amin--the U.S. agent--who executed Taraki and tens of thousands of Afghans, the Afghan revolution has reached a new stage. A real popular power [erk] was established in a bid to take the antifeudal and anti-imperialist revolution to its final victory. The leaders of the revolution--including Taraki's wife and family--were freed from the dungeons. The Revolutionary Council disclosed its aims of realizing all the liberties of the people and of following a nonalined foreign policy.

At this new stage of the Afghan revolution, with the aim to prevent the interference of the internal counterrevolution and the U.S. imperialism which supports it, the legal Afghan Government asked for urgent economic, moral, as well as military aid from the Soviet Union in accordance with the 5 December 1978 agreement between the two countries. This request made with the purpose of safeguarding Afghanistan's sovereignty, territorial integrity and peace and security is also based on the 51st article of the UN Charter, which says that every country has the right to safeguard its sovereignty and peace alone or collectively. The Soviet Government has fulfilled the request made by the legal Afghan Government. It sent limited military troops to the aid of the Afghan revolution and people to be withdrawn as soon as the reasons which necessitated this aid disappear. In this way the Soviet Union has proved that it stands by the agreements it signs and has done what is necessary in accordance with the internationalist foreign policy it pursues from the day it was founded.

This being the situation, what is the significance of the statement made by the Turkish Government?

This provocative statement by the government against Afghanistan is directly in line with directives from the U.S. Government and NATO. By being made the slave of imperialism and NATO, our country is once more being placed in a position which opposes the national liberation movements and the neighboring peoples. Those who are destroying our national independence by making the country dependent on NATO are now hostile to steps taken by Afghanistan in a bid to safeguard its independence and territorial integrity.

The aggressive statement by the Council of Ministers on the Afghan revolution and the Soviet aid extended in response to a request made by its legal government is a genuine example of deceit. In fact, by attacking an action taken in accordance with an agreement signed between the two countries, the government is, in fact, trying to directly interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, trampling upon the right of every sovereign country to safeguard its security and peace alone or collectively as indicated in the UN Charter. It is opposing the Afghan Government's right to exercise its rights of sovereignty.

Has this government any right to make statements on the issue of interference in the internal affairs of other countries? Led by the imperialists, the Turkish governments have militarily opposed the revolution of the Korean people. The U.S. military landing in Lebanon had originated from Turkish soil. The Turkish peace-loving forces are saying: Demirel, you better first take a look at your own country. In defiance of UN resolutions adopted by great majorities for years, Turkey, led by the Demirel government, is still criminally occupying the territories of the independent, sovereign and integral Cypriot state.

That is not all. On the one hand, this government is raising an uproar alleging that there was interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan for an action taken in accordance with an aggreement existing between the countries while, on the other hand, it is trying to conceal from our people a very important fact. This fact is that the Demirel government is currently engaged in secret talks with the U.S. Government. These secret talks are aimed at strengthening the bilateral slavery agreement existing between Turkey and the United States. One of the articles of this agreement--which is still in effect--bestows on the United States the right to send military troops into Turkey. There is nothing surprising in the fact that those who have given the U.S. troops the right to trample [cignetme] on Turkey should fiercely attack the Soviet aid aimed at safeguarding Afghanistan's independence.

The Turkish collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie which sold its own country's independence to the enemy and which trampled on the sovereignty rights of the Cyprus state is now opposing [the right of] the Afghan people to safeguard their independence, territorial integrity, sovereignty and to freely determine their own social system.

The government's statement casts a shadow on the peaceful relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union. The Soviet aid to the Afghan state is aimed at strengthening regional peace and has a vital importance at a time when the U.S. imperialism is preparing along our borders for an attack on the Islamic revolution in Iran. Under the circumstances, the government's attack on the Soviet aid signifies undermining peaceful efforts in the region.

By approving, in the NATO meetings in Brussels, the deployment of U.S. deadly missiles to Western Europe against the Soviet Union and the socialist countries, the Demirel government has taken a second step against peace. What lies behind imperialist efforts to openly reverse truths is not only the exhaustion of their hopes of taking Afghanistan under their yoke, it is also the plan being prepared for months to mass U.S. troops in the Middle East.

By pursuing the same policies with the imperialists on the issue of Afghanistan, the Demirel government is trying to prepare an atmosphere for massing the U.S. imperialist troops in our country, endangering our national independence, peace and security.

Efforts by the Demirel government to distort developments in Afghanistan is completely compatible with establishing an anti-communist and oppresive administration as indicated in the Demirel government program. The attack directed against the Soviet Union and Afghan revolution abroad, is being directed internally against democratic liberties and our people's living conditions.

Solidarity with the Afghan revolution is part of the struggle being waged for democracy and against the attacks of the monopolist circles on the working class and our toiling people.

The Soviet Union is a peace-loving country, with its stand opposed to [the deployment of] the deadly NATO missiles. The world has witnessed one of the most brilliant examples of this. The history of the October Revolution is the history of the struggles waged for peace. The Soviet country is internationalist. It readily extends its helping hand to all the oppressed peoples of the world. At the cost of 20 million of its citizens, the Soviet Union saved Europe during World War II from the atrocities of Hitler. The brave soldiers of the Red Army fought to save Germany, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Bulgaria, Poland, Austria, Yugoslavia and Hungary. Those who were applauding this military aid by the Soviet Union under the pressure of their peoples are now raising an uproar to slander the aid being extended to Afghanistan. The peoples cannot be forced to forget history.

The toilers of our country understand very well [the meaning of] the Soviet aid being extended to the Afghan people. Because the Turkish people have not forgotten the military, political and moral aid extended by the then young Soviet state during our war of liberation, Ataturk wrote to Lenin: The brotherly agreement [baglasma]--which has been Turkey's strongest support during its liberation war--reached with the USSR is a great assurance in our road to attain high liberation aims.

All those supporting peace, democracy, social advancement and independence, raise the flag of solidarity with the Afghan revolution and bravely oppose the reactionaries' imperialist provocations. Communists, all workers committed to proletarian internationalism, combat with all your strength the chauvinistic and anti-Soviet campaign, rallying with the broadest forces.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY CHAIRMAN ON DEVELOPMENTS IN AFGHANISTAN

TA311605 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1458 GMT 31 Dec 79 TA

[Text] Ankara, 31 Dec (AA)--Democratic Party Chairman Faruk Sukan today claimed the "Soviet intervention" in Afghanistan created threats to Turkey's defense and security as well as for regional peace and security. At a press conference today, Sukan said it was important to remember there were certain "designs" in the making on Turkey. He called for the "reconsideration" of Turkey's accords with alliances to which she is currently committed.

The Democratic Party chairman noted recent developments gave the impression that secret agreements on the Middle East concluded between the Soviet Union and the United States in Vladivostok in 1974 were being implemented. It was being claimed, he pointed out, that the "partition of the Middle East" had begun. He believed foreign powers were playing a major role in Middle East developments and that events in Pakistan, Iran, Afghanistan and other Islamic countries were the implementation of secret agreements. He called on the government to brief the Grand National Assembly and the public, inviting joint action against existing threats.

LUNS: USSR STATEMENT ON AFGHANISTAN 'PERVERSION OF UN CHARTER'

LD011726 Hamburg DPA in German 1647 GMT 1 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Hamburg--In an interview prereleased to DPA, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns told BILD ZEITUNG that the Soviet statement on the invasion of Afghanistan by Moscow forces was a perversion of the UN Charter. Asked whether Afghanistan had been threatened, he replied: "No one threatened Afghanistan. There were internal disorders. The Soviet statement is a perversion of the UN Charter."

Luns felt sure that the NATO states would examine the question of boycotting this year's Olympic Games in Moscow. Asked whether the West would attend the Olympic Games in Moscow, he said: "I am sure that the nations of the NATO alliance will examine this question".

The Soviet action in Afghanistan merited the use of the term "aggression". The whole world, except the communist satellites, was concerned at this action. "I am telling you: Some states in East Europe are seeing the writing on the wall. Consider Romania, or Yugoslavia, which is not a member of the Soviet bloc."

The situation in Afghanistan has helped strengthen the West's determination to maintain the military balance and has vindicated the NATO decision of 12 December to counterarm in the nuclear field.

FRG MISSION DENIES DISCUSSION OF OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

LD012202 Hamburg DPA in German 2054 GMT 1 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Brussels--The German NATO mission in Brussels tonight strongly denied that a possible boycott of the 1980 summer Olympic Games in Moscow had been discussed at the NATO Council meeting on the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan. A spokesman said: "No proposal was made about possible nonattendance at the Olympic Games. Reports to this effect are inaccurate."

CABINET ANALYZES EVENTS IN AFGHANISTAN, EFFECT ON DETENTE

Deputy Spokesman Comments

DW030846 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1150 GMT 2 Jan 80 DW

[Text] [Question] The Cabinet did not adopt a formal decision but it did make a comprehensive and careful analysis of the latest events in Afghanistan. How does the Federal Government assess the topical development, especially under the aspect of detente between East and West?

[Answer] The Cabinet assesses this occurrence as being very serious indeed, for this involves a violation of international law. It involves a violation of the sovereignty of Afghanistan. It is a disregard for the Afghan people's efforts toward independence. To us, the interpretations given by the Soviet Union officially and publicly seem to be inadequate. We do not consider them acceptable.

The Cabinet advocates the view that the conflict unleashed by the Soviet Union in the Third World at large and in the Islamic world in particular through this intervention must be discussed with priority, while the discussion as to how this development, this intervention, will affect East-West detente must recede to the background. Nobody probably believes at this hour that this development will not have any effects on East-West detente. But we deem it erroneous to concentrate the discussion on this particular point; what is important to us is to promote the discussion in our country as well as on the international level to show what remedies the Soviet Union has employed to intrude on the sovereignty of an independent state and to interfere in the Afghan people's efforts toward independence.

At this moment, to put it briefly, the conflict between the Soviet Union and the Third World and/or the Islamic world is more important to us than the secondary effects on East-West detente.

[Question] The United States and its Western NATO allies have already considered possible sanctions. Viewed from the angle of the Federal Government, are sanctions a practicable political instrument at this time?

[Answer] You have rightly said that the reactions of the alliance are being considered internally. I emphasize the word internally. It has been said in the Cabinet that the Federal Government is not at all interested in discussing such matters in public before these matters have been fully discussed internally. I would like to restrict myself in accordance with this indication.

[Question] Nevertheless, let me ask you: Are sanctions a practicable political instrument?

[Answer] It will be necessary to discuss this within the alliance. We do not want to arouse the impression that we think so little of the alliance's solidarity that we will march away from the front in one direction or another.

[Question] People in Brussels are persistently speculating that one possible sanction would be a boycott of the Olympic Games in Moscow. Is that true?

[Answer] This has not been introduced into the discussion by the German side at any rate. Our NATO representation in Brussels denied last night that Ambassador Pauls had suggested anything of the sort.

Besides, what applies is what I have just said in reply to your preceding question: What matters to us is to push the discussion now in the alliance internally; we are not interested in undermining internal alliance discussions, which serve solidarity, through rash public statements.

[Question] To what extent does the conflict over Afghanistan directly or indirectly affect the interests of the Federal Republic of Germany?

[Answer] By our estimates, as far as we can tell, there are about 150 Germans in Afghanistan, and we must be concerned with protecting the lives and the integrity of these people. Everything is concentrated on that. At the moment I do not see any threat to important economic interests in dealings between Afghanistan and the Federal Republic, but we are still in the process of obtaining a full picture of that. This is why I cannot give you a conclusive answer at this point. In any event, what matters foremost to us is to protect the lives and the integrity of these 150 Germans, to the extent possible.

[Question] You have already mentioned that the detente process between East and West has indeed been affected. My question is this: To what extent will the chancellor's visit to the GDR be jeopardized by a hardening of the fronts which we undoubtedly have now?

[Answer] At the moment I do not see any call whatsoever to raise such a question, no matter how you may phrase it. I do not see any call whatsoever to define any stance on the Moscow visit of the federal foreign minister or the Moscow visit of the chancellor at this time.

[Question] Has this been discussed in the Cabinet?

[Answer] No.

Genscher Denunciation

[Text] Bonn--At its meeting in Bonn today, the Federal Cabinet criticized the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who chaired the meeting in his capacity as deputy chancellor, said: "The Soviet Union's military action is unjustifiable." The Federal Government shares the deep concern felt by the states of this region at the Soviet action. Genscher announced that the German ambassador to Moscow will present the Federal Government's view to the Soviet Union.

According to Deputy Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald, Genscher stressed that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan must be regarded as a violation of the basic principles of peaceful coexistence between peoples, of the inseparability of detente and the right to self-determination. The Federal Government viewed with great concern the fact that peace and stability in this region of the Middle East are being jeopardized. "That is why it is a matter of extreme gravity," he said.

Genscher's statement goes on to say that the Afghan people's political and military resistance showed that, in accordance with its traditions and Islamic order, it wanted to live without interference from abroad. There could be no question of intervention by states other than the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, as Moscow claimed.

Genscher advocated that the United Nations should concern itself with the Soviet intervention. The Federal Government is in contact with its allies and is continuing its talks with the other countries of the region as well as with other friendly states of the Third World. Genscher further called for a worldwide program of aid to help Afghan refugees.

STRAUSS ATTACKS SOVIET 'GLOBAL POWER STRATEGY'

ID021225 Hamburg DPA in German 1134 GMT 2 Jan 80 ID

[Excerpt] Bonn--In the view of Franz Josef Strauss, the Union candidate for chancellor, the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan is part of a Soviet global power strategy. In a Deutsche Welle interview today, Strauss spoke of a "great Soviet power strategy extending into the Middle East, into Africa." Strauss expressed the view that the Soviet Union is in the process of creating strategic superiority for itself for its long-term aims.

It is trying to bring this about by its sway or influence over oil-producing and raw material-producing regions in conjunction with its missile arming against Europe. "Thus, in Afghanistan, an already loyal satellite has been replaced by an even more loyal one so that this strategically important country remains firmly in the Soviet Union's hands and does not slip from its control." Strauss said that he had "countless times" drawn attention to the potential source of crisis extending from Afghanistan to the South African frontier. This crisis area is practically on Europe's doorstep.

MARX ON WEST'S OPTIONS FOR REACTING TO SOVIET AGGRESSION

[Text] Hamburg--The foreign affairs spokesman of the CDU/CSU in the Bundestag, Werner Marx, considers that a Western boycott of the Moscow Olympics as a reply to Soviet entry into Afghanistan would serve little purpose. In an interview with the Hanover NEUE PRESSE Marx said: "It is not a question of the Olympic Games. That is a secondary stage on which one should react only in case of extreme necessity. It is a question of the aggressiveness of the USSR."

In Marx's view, the West should "understand its task of strengthening the alliance more clearly than hitherto." The CDU/CSU spokesman feared that the countries of Africa and Asia would now take their cue from Soviet strength because the West merely talked and failed to take political action, such as discontinuing the grain deliveries which were of such importance for the USSR.

Marx warned against the Federal Republic reacting in isolation. "We should concentrate on work within the alliance and make it clear by a coordinated, resolute attitude to the USSR as well as to other aggressive states like the GDR, that we are not prepared to put up with such a policy."

An edited version of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

PAPERS STRESS U.S. NEED FOR RESPONSE TO USSR INTERFERENCE

U.S. Options 'Limited'

DW030953 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 3 Jan 80 p 1 DW

[Article signed Ein.: "Just for Mollification"]

[Text] Pay them back in their own coin! This probably would be the American reaction to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan which would be to the taste of the broad public. A spectacular action would benefit the prestige of the United States. Washington's credibility would be consolidated. In the military-strategic aspect, too, the world could use a convincing countermeasure. The Kremlin is jeopardizing world peace. Reality veritably cries for a demonstration of strength which would put Brezhnev in his proper place.

But what can Carter do? Surely little in a spectacular way. In the nuclear age the President must repress emotions. In all actions it is necessary to keep in mind that confrontation may well deteriorate into chaos. Granted, the other side must be made aware of the risk it took. But if you have as few remedies available, other than the strategic nuclear force, as has Carter's America, the variety of options is small. Thus, the old scenario will take place again: increased U.S. naval presence. Possibly the strategic reserve will be alerted. Air transport space will be made available--just to mollify the public a bit.

Naturally, contacts have been established in secret. First with Dobrynin, the Soviet ambassador to Washington. In New York they subsequently talk with the Chinese representative to the United Nations. This step is reported to the Russians just as it is reported to the allies. Theoretically, the Washington-Beijing-Moscow triangle is to be brought into the political game. The diplomats are to be moved by the idea that none of the three governments can be left indifferent by the question as to which side is isolated. There are ample mechanisms yet which could be triggered. But what could impress the Soviets is being avoided, namely, the United States could halt grain deliveries. Yet this would immediately elicit the resistance of the secretary of agriculture and of the farmers. Rejection of SALT II? The Soviets anticipate that anyway. Moscow need not have any regard for the European allies of the United States either. Since the (fragile) decision of NATO on the closure of the arms gap, public opinion in Europe for the time being is of no interest to the Russians. Why is it that the Russians are acting so nonchalantly? They probably believe that they need not have any regard for the Carter administration.

'Paper Tiger' Image Criticized

DW021300 Bonn DIE WELT in German 31 Dec 79/1 Jan 80 p 1 DW

[Peter Boenisch editorial: "Adventure Kabul"]

[Text] Four out of ten Germans look toward the new year with concern. The old year expired, heralding worries.

The USSR's military intervention in Afghanistan will not remain a regional political affair. The relationship between Washington and Moscow, which has cooled off anyway, threatens to become icy. It looks as though the Soviets have abruptly put an end in Kabul to the period that had been referred to as "detente." All the nice phrases about "coexistence and international cooperation beyond the ideological differences" have been trampled on by Russian boots once again. They have been stomped out almost casually, like a cigarette butt. Division of labor, Russian style: peace slogans on Red Square, marching orders to the Red Army.

What is obviously more important to the Kremlin than world public opinion is a new garrison and new governor on the march toward power and oil. What remains for the West is the outrage, the moral outcry, the joint consultation.

Be it the taking of hostages in Tehran or the intervention in Kabul, we are licking our wounds. Our damaged good will is getting a new white bandage.

The Russians are pursuing a power policy while we are seeking newer and newer formulas for our impotence toward faits accomplis. The West acts too often according to the following pattern: phase 1--outrage over the violation of law; phase 2--threat of sanctions; phase 3--objections to sanctions; phase 4--shelving of sanctions; phase 5--acceptance of the violation of law; phase 6--capitulation to the violation of law and solemn declaration of a new peace policy.

Anyone criticizing this procedure is denounced immediately as preaching the "policy of strength." But, in truth, there is a long road to cover before that point. First of all, one should put an end to the demonstration of weakness because it encourages more and more new violations of law. And these violations of law jeopardize peace.

The Russian adventure in Kabul is highly dangerous not only strategically but also politically because it is intended to show the world that there is but one active superpower, the Soviet Union, while the other superpower, the United States, is passive--a paper tiger with quarrelling alliance partners. Unless the Americans and we succeed in correcting this impression, more and more attempts at blackmail against the Western world will occur in the eighties. Peace will grow less secure and all of us, not just 4 out of 10, will have reason to worry.

BOELLING ON SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING, RELATIONS WITH USSR

LD011134 Hamburg DPA in German 1006 GMT 1 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling said today in a BERLINER MORGENPOST interview that no one should imagine that the forthcoming meeting between Schmidt and Honecker could change the situation in divided Germany and relations between the GDR and the Federal Republic more or less overnight. This would be naive. "We won't be able to move mountains, but even the smallest steps which lead us toward good-neighborliness are worth the effort". Boelling said that, for the Federal Government, good and trusting relations with the Soviet Union are a particularly important, indeed necessary, element of its foreign and peace policy. Boelling, alluding to the Soviet Union's strong criticism of the West's counterarming, said that Moscow's "testy statements" will not change this. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has said several times that he believes in General Secretary Brezhnev's will for the policy of detente.

STRAUSS ON POLICIES IF ELECTED, SUPPORT FOR U.S.

DW021040 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 1705 GMT 29 Dec 79 DW

[Excerpts from Peter Keller interview with CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The CDU/CSU plans to trim its election program properly in February. Could you tell us in advance, in a brief outline, what a Federal Government headed by Strauss would do differently in Ostpolitik and policy on Germany? Will it perhaps punish Eastern treaty violations more severely?

[Answer] What must be stated here first of all is "pacta sunt servanda"--we shall observe the treaties that have been concluded. Yet we will interpret them within the bounds defined by the constitutional court, especially by its verdicts of 1973 and 1975. When more treaties are concluded we will insist on a proper balance in give and take. Furthermore, for future treaties we will insure that there is no longer any room for interpretations which allow application of the treaties in a way that is partially opposite to their purpose. Neither will we allow any violations of treaties by exhibiting the mild patience so far accepted by the Schmidt-Genscher government, which is suffering from motives unknown to me.

[Question] Well, treaties will be observed. Helmut Schmidt has argued on this point that what also matters is the climate, the atmosphere of trust. Would you rule out a worsening of the climate?

[Answer] The latest invectives leveled at the foreign minister of the Schmidt government by the Soviet Union, by official quarters as well as by official state propaganda, prove that in the event of a Strauss government the climate would surely not be worse than it is today. On the contrary, it will be better because I would neither arouse illusions nor make promises that cannot be kept; nor would I conclude ambiguous agreements.

[Answer] The Federal Government--and this applies to Brandt just as it applies to Schmidt and their foreign ministers--in the 70's aroused expectations which cannot be fulfilled now. The Soviet Union obviously believed that it has succeeded in largely extricating the Federal Republic from the alliance politically through German Ostpolitik [words indistinct] and Russian policy toward the West. It failed to accomplish this, however, because more than 20 years ago we unequivocally set the course. This is why disappointment is now accompanied with polemics, and polemics with the attempt at extortion.

[Question] Do you think that Moscow's rejection of disarmament negotiations is propaganda or that it is definite?

[Answer] Moscow will always do what is in its own interest. Hence, it will never abide by earlier statements if such a turn away from these statements appears expedient to Moscow.

[Question] Are you ruling out, for fundamental reasons, an inter-German dialog on disarmament?

[Answer] There is little sense in an inter-German disarmament dialog. It is perhaps an interesting subject for discussion, yet it does not touch the crux of the matter.

[Question] At the moment, the whole world is talking about reprisals against Iran to liberate the American hostages. Word from Washington has it that the United States is expecting proof of partnership from Bonn going beyond the NATO solidarity demands. If the United States needs our help it will get it, too, Helmut Schmidt is quoted as saying. Where would you see any limits to such solidarity with Washington?

[Answer] On this point Helmut Schmidt shows himself a bit prim and a bit overbearing. We must exercise full solidarity with the Americans, particularly on this issue in which the violation of international order is involved, a situation in which things will certainly not be as bad in the beginning as they will be in the end if they proceed as they are. This is also true in the event that we might have to accept economic disadvantages as a result. Yet one precondition must be valid in this respect: The Americans must allow us to participate in the preparations for, and the finding of decisions to be made jointly.

FRANCOIS-PONCET REPORTS TO GOVERNMENT ON AFGHANISTAN

The Elysee spokesman did not want to make any comment on the nature of this report. PRESS VIEWS SOVIET INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN

LE FIGARO Commentary

LD031127 Paris LE FIGARO in French 29 Dec 79 p 1, 3 LD

[Serge Maffert commentary: "Game of Chess"]

[Text] Current developments in Afghanistan seem bound to complicate further the Americans' task in that part of the world, especially in Iran. Indeed, Washington is facing two problems which differ fundamentally, are both equally difficult to tackle and have one point in common in that they are likely to bring the United States and the Soviet Union face to face.

President Carter has his hands largely tied over both Iran and Afghanistan. In Tehran the lives of the hostages are at stake, and that is an obvious reason for caution. However, in addition to this, any precipitous U.S. action is likely to spark off chain reactions throughout the Near and Middle East--anti-American and anti-Western reactions to overthrow regimes which, although they dare not say so, would secretly support action to bring Khomeyni's regime back into line. There is no need to stress the consequences such reactions would have in the sphere of oil exploitation.

That is why Mr Carter, with the support of his Western partners including France, will try to play the UN card to the end. In order to succeed he needs the USSR's tacit or declared neutrality in the Security Council.

We are now witnessing a very close game of chess between the two superpowers, and the stake could be no less than world peace. The U.S. trump card is U.S. Senate ratification of the SALT II treaty. Moscow desperately wants this treaty to be implemented, since it will pave the way for future negotiations on arms in Europe. Washington has made it clear to the Soviets that the future of SALT II is directly linked with their attitude in the Security Council over possible economic sanctions against Iran.

However, the USSR has launched a divisionary operation aimed at strengthening the overall layout of its game.

Acting with remarkable promptness and efficiency on ground already largely conquered, Moscow has abruptly increased its military and political potential in Afghanistan: massive reinforcement of men and equipment, outright elimination of a head of state who was pro-Soviet but discredited, and his replacement by another, equally pro-Soviet but more "political" and more "modern" head of state.

The abruptness and timing of this action show that it was linked not only with the situation in Iran but also with U.S. efforts at the United Nations. Moscow had for some time been watching its Afghan gambit being weakened by Islamic, nationalist and hence anti-Russian rebellion. Taraki and Amin, by their brutality and clumsiness, merely succeeded in increasing the Afghan mountain people's resistance to communism and the USSR. Of course the United States was following these developments closely, and there is every reason to think it is supporting the Islamic rebels behind the scenes, as if what is wrong in Iran could be right elsewhere.

The Soviet "coup" in Kabul therefore does not really alter the geopolitical situation. It is aimed at righting the situation to the USSR's benefit.

For almost 200 years Russian policy has attached vital importance to Afghanistan. The tsars tried constantly, not without success, to establish their influence in that country, clashing at that time with the British. The communists kept the same objective. Indeed, Afghanistan is the key to the Indian subcontinent and, beyond, to the ocean of the same name.

However, it is also, and above all, the key to Russian central Asia. At the foot of the northern slope of Hindu Kush begins the vast plain which stretches from the Dnepr to the Lena; the USSR's Muslim republics stretch out immediately next to Afghanistan.

For Moscow Afghanistan plays the role of a "smooth edge" [lime] to the empire just like the socialist republics of Europe. The Soviet intervention in that country is a replica of those suffered by Hungary in 1956 and Czechoslovakia in 1968, and is just as fundamental for the USSR.

Perhaps the very importance of this affair will bring about an arrangement between Washington and Moscow: Afghanistan in exchange for Iran. In that case, each would pretend not to see what the other was doing. This system has worked frequently since Yalta....

LE MONDE Editorial

LD021337 Paris LE MONDE in French 30-31 Dec 79 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "Indignation and Fear"]

[Text] The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is the culmination of a year in which several states have invoked the need to uphold human rights as a reason for interfering with the recognized right of each people to determine their own future. In January Vietnam overthrew the Khmer Rouge's bloody regime. In April Tanzania put an end to Amin Dada's evil dictatorship. In September, after many months of treating the massacre of children in Central Africa as a "pseudo-event", the French Government organized a "coup d'etat" for the benefit of Bokassa's opponents.

Who would claim that such operations are disinterested? In its venture Vietnam lost many friends who formerly praised its valor against the U.S., but it has brought Kampuchea into its sphere of influence at least for the present. [paragraph continues]

Tanzania has rid itself of an excessively turbulent neighbor. France has rid itself of an "emperor" whose disastrous clowning jeopardized the established order.

Few governments are in a position to show the world how to behave and to point out, as France has just done, that "peace and progress can only be based on respect for the right to self-determination, for the legitimate aspirations of populations and the sovereignty of all states." The Americans who are denouncing "the flagrant violation of internationally accepted norms of behavior" have, to say the least, not always scrupulously applied the principles they vigorously proclaim. They have established and overthrown governments in Latin America and destabilized regimes such as those in Guatemala and Chile.

The Indochinese defeat showed them that even the world's leading power could not always impose its law. The Americans elected Mr Carter in the hope of avoiding being caught up in distant conflicts and, so far, the president has kept his promise. The United States is even reacting with moderation to the affronts it is suffering in Iran.

The outraged protests from various quarters over Afghanistan are supported by the West: After all, it is better to proclaim virtue than defend vice, and what is said is just as important as who says it. Nonetheless the Soviets who had just sent their tanks into Prague were not wrong to denounce simultaneously the U.S. intervention and bombings in Vietnam.

Indignation, however, rarely modifies the course of history. The USSR, which has just established a protege in Kabul in whom it has complete confidence, might once again think that the storm will pass and that the world will soon forget this Afghan episode. However, the event entails many consequences since it arouses an acute awareness of a new imbalance of power. It strengthens the conviction of those who denounce Soviet military superiority and expansionism.

After World War II, the USSR established a "ramp" [glacis] on its European periphery. It now has a new "ramp" to the south of its Muslim republics and in the immediate proximity of turbulent Iran and of Pakistan. Some 30 years ago Paul-Henri Spaak said to the Soviets on the UN platform: "You frighten us." It is dangerous to revive this feeling which was the cause of the cold war.

PARATROOP COMPANY WITHDRAWN FROM CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

LD311125 Paris LE MONDE in French 20 Dec 79 p 6 LD

[Unattributed report: "French Paratroop Company Leaves Bangui"]

[Text] On the eve of the National Assembly debate on African policy the French Defense Ministry announced on Tuesday, 16 December, that one of the three companies stationed at Bangui in the Central African Republic has just returned to its garrison in France.

The company in question belongs to the 8th Marine Paratroop Regiment stationed at Castres. The president of the republic has asked the defense minister to convey a message of congratulations to the company for the "exemplary" manner in which it carried out its mission.

Following the departure of this unit, which participated in the 20-21 September Operation Barracuda to overthrow Emperor Bokassa I, there are now two French paratroop companies totaling 450 men still in the Central African Republic. These are another company of the 8th Marine Paratroop Regiment and a company of the 3d Marine Paratroop Regiment normally stationed at Carcassonne.

FRIENDSHIP DELEGATION RETURNS FROM IRAN

[Text] Rome, January 3 (ANSA)--An Italian delegation for "The Committee for Friendship Among Second and Third World Nations" has returned here from a visit to Tehran. The group, made up of union and political leaders, met in that capital city with several Iranian ministers and with United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim. The delegation included "UIL" [Italian Federation of Trade Unions] union chief Giorgio Benvenuto, Christian Democratic Senator Guilio Grando, DC Deputy Alfredo de Poi and the secretary of the Socialist Revolutionary Party, Vincenzo Calo.

In a communique they released last night they said that they had conveyed to Iranian Foreign Minister Qotbzadeh their concern over the increase in tensions caused in the area due to the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan and the American push for sanctions against Iran. The group urged full respect for international law and guaranteed immunities.

Iranian Finance Minister Bani-Sadr said that the crisis was not unsolvable but on condition that negotiations are begun on procedures for the extradition of the shah, that the huge sums of money stolen from the Iranian people by the shah were returned and that economic and development cooperation were based on principles of equality and not of exploitation.

OLYMPIC COMMITTEE: ITALY WILL NOT BOYCOTT GAMES

[Text] Rome, January 3 (ANSA)--Italy will not boycott the Olympic Games in Moscow, according to the Italian Olympic Committee (CONI) President Franceo Carraro. He also ruled out the possibility that outside pressures would cause "CONI" to change its mind on the matter. He said that the committee intended to respect the committments made by the International Olympic Committee and the international federations, as demonstrated during the Davis Cup finals in Chile in 1976. On that occasion, he recalled that the Rome government confirmed CONI's full autonomy with respect to international committments.

Carraro said he believed that sports competitions and the Olympics in particular, should be the focus of union and brotherhood among peoples, including those who are momentarily divided. These games must never be used for political ends, he claimed. Since the Moscow games are to be followed by those of Los Angeles in 1984, any eventual boycott of this year's competition would mean the end of the Olympics he said. Therefore, he voiced the hope that the Olympic Games at Lake Placid and in Moscow would go ahead as planned and that Italian atheletes would make a good showing.

L'UNITA CONDEMNS SOVIET ACTION IN AFGHANISTAN

LD021013 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 29 Dec 79 p 1 LD

[Unattributed commentary: "Great Concern"]

[Text] In the complex Afghan situation--many of whose developments in recent months have remained unclear--newevents have occurred in the past few days, introducing major causes for concern. The latest forcible interruption of the state leadership and the Soviet military intervention are grave and worrying events, especially since there are conspiracies, interventions and threats by several foreign powers in the area.

Though the nature of the conflict involving various groups of the state and the party which direct Afghan political life is not yet clear, the dominant impression remains that of the dangers threatening the transformation process which began in April 1978 and which was judged a positive step forward toward the emancipation and liberation of a people forced until then to live under conditions of backwardness and feudal exploitation. Looking at this prospect, one can only express the hope that Afghanistan's progressive and popular forces can recover national unity and domestic peace, which is also being undermined by the opposition and rebellions of internal reactionary groups backed overtly or secretly by foreign forces.

For this very reason the military intervention carried out by the Soviet Union over the past few days must be regarded as damaging to Afghanistan's independence and sovereignty. Military interventions from outside always constitute an intolerable violation of the principles of independence, sovereignty and noninterference in internal affairs, which must form the basis of relations among the states and must be observed in all situations.

The Italian Communists believe that their stance is a principled one, and it applies to military interventions or threats of intervention from any source whatever. It has always been expressed as such and it was reaffirmed, in particular, at the recent 15th PCI Congress. The processes of peoples' emancipation and liberation can only be carried out by the peoples themselves, who can, for this very reason, count on the solidarity of the world's democratic and progressive forces; only the negotiation method can help to resolve international controversies and avoid jeopardizing the peoples' emancipation struggle and world peace.

Further Press Comment

[Text] Rome, January 2 (ANSA)--The Italian dailies came back on the newsstands this morning with headlines and editorials voicing deep concern over the evolution of the international situation after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the continued showdown between Washington and Tehran over the hostages held in the American Embassy in the Iranian capital.

The Roman daily PAESE SERA traditionally close to the Italian Communist Party (PCI), carried the frontpage title, "Bitter Fruits of the Power Game" and claimed that the "Afghan imbroglio is getting more complicated." "The Soviet Union can even claim it has blocked 'external interferences in Afghanistan', but it is a fact the situation in that country is not as stable as before. The Islamic rebellion in the mountains is destined to grow. At this point, it becomes more difficult to defend the Persian Gulf from temptations of United States intervention. At the same time, Washington has already announced the dispatch of massive aid to Pakistan on Afghanistan's frontier. Pakistan will hand these arms on to the Afghan rebels, but will also be able to use them against its old Indian enemy. In brief, the perverse mechanism of the power game is aggravating the problems which its propaganda claims it wants to solve."

But IL MANIFESTO, the leading voice to the left of the PCI, argued that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan proves the Soviet Union's limited capabilities for ruling the countries it dominates through "allied ruling classes" in the countries involved. In fact, the paper pointed out the Soviet Union has had a "preponderant influence" in Afghanistan since 1973. But Moscow has never sent in the material aid which would have permitted the leaders in Kabul to push ahead with serious anti-feudal reforms and win the population's backing."

In other comment on the situation, many dailies reassessed early reactions that with its intervention in Afghanistan the Soviet Union was getting involved in its own Vietnam. The leading Milan daily CORRIERE DELLA SERA cited three reasons for revising this view:

Unlike the Americans in Vietnam the information media will not be permitted a close look at the Soviet Army's misdeeds in Afghanistan so "world indignation will have no images on which to nourish itself." The Soviet Army is "quick and remorseless," which provides another reason why "Soviet aggressions do not remain long on the front pages." Few among the Soviet Union's sympathizers scattered across the face of globe "expect them to act correctly," and as far as these [word indistinct] are concerned, "the end justifies the means."

The rightwing Rome daily IL TEMPO also distinguished Afghanistan from Vietnam pointing to the "vast domestic opposition....and conditions and restrictions that made a classical American military affirmation (in the Southeast Asian state) impossible from the start."

The Christian Democrat daily IL POPOLO voiced concern over the American awareness that the "Soviet adventure in Afghanistan is not an incidental episode, possibly by an error of evaluation but a decision taken with absolute awareness of the inherent risks. Moscow is incapable of permitting the collapse of any pro-Soviet communist regime. From this viewpoint, it considers Afghanistan on a par with Hungary and Czechoslovakia brutally invaded in 1956 and [words indistinct] Afghanistan has never formed part of the so-called socialist commonwealth."

What then are the prospects? Few will [words indistinct] out far enough to hazard a forecast.

The Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA was one of them:

"In the immediate future--we are talking in terms of days, not hours--there is nothing on one horizon but a development of American initiative in Pakistan which is directly threatened by the Afghan events."

L'UNITA, the daily of the PCI, which came out with a quick condemnation of the Soviet intervention argued that it was "too early" to assess the negative effects of the Afghan events on relations between Moscow and Washington.

[Words indistinct] a very long way from the Vienna embrace in June between Carter and Brezhnev on the occasion of the signing of the [SALT] treaty," the daily warned.

"Today, even the memory of that atmosphere which represented the [word indistinct] moment of detente in recent years, seems to have been lost."

The U.S. naval command here described the movements of the two vessels as a "normal changing of the guard."

TRIAL OF RED BRIGADE FOR MORO CASE, TERRORISM SOUGHT

[Text] Rome, January 3 (ANSA)--Rome's public prosecutor has officially asked that 21 persons be tried in connection with the "Moro case" and other crimes committed by the Red Brigades urban guerrillas over past years.

Six persons are charged with the kidnap and killing of Aldo Moro and the slaying of his five-man escort. They are: Corrado Alunni, Prospero Gallinari, Franco Bonisoli, Lauro Azzolini, Teodoro Spadaccini and Giovanni Lugnini.

Those accused of crimes connected to the ambush (which occurred on March 16, 1978 were: Adriana Faranda, Valerio Morucci, Mario Moretti, Enrico Triaca, Gabriella Mariani, Antonio Marini and Barbara Balzerani.

Those accused of armed insurrection against the state with a view to sparking civil war are: Stefano Ceriani Sebregondi, Rino Proietti, Marina Petrella, her brother Stefano and Luigi Novelli, along with Gallinari, Bonisoli, Azzolini, Spadaccini, Lugnini, Triaca, Mariani, Marini, Balzarani and Moretti.

With regard to Toni Negri, Franco Piperno and Lanfronco Pace (three leaders of the Workers' Autonomy Movement) the public prosecutor has asked for continued investigation. As a result, the trio will probably be singled out of the main trial for separate treatment.

A 198-page file contained all of the criminal actions attributed to the accused and the evidence gathered to back charges against Negri, Piperno and Pace. Extensive excerpts from their writings ever since 1971 are included. These include exaltations of "the heroic struggle" of the Red Brigades.

The public prosecutor claims that there are links between Italian and foreign terrorist organizations such as the German "RAF" [Red Army Faction], the Irish "IRA", the Basque separatists and American leftwing extremists affiliated with the U.S. magazine "ZERO WORK".

Toni Negri is thought to have played a key role in the Moro case, not only as leader of "the revolutionary movement" but also with regard to the holding of Moro hostage over long weeks. Negri is believed to be the man who on April 30, 1978 telephoned Moro's wife to announce that her husband would be killed.

There is also an eyewitness report that Negri was at the site of the ambush and that a woman, calling him by name, had congratulated him on the success of the interprise. The file also speaks of meetings between Piperno and the Italian Socialist Party. Three confidential meetings took place between PSI Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile, Piperno and Pace.

SUNDAY TELEGRAPH VIEWS EFFECT ON U.S. OF AFGHAN EVENT

LD311157 London THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 31 Dec 79 p 16 LD

[Editorial: "Red Blood"]

[Text] When the Red Army invaded Hungary and Czechoslovakia, those acts of aggression were excused on the grounds that Eastern Europe fell within the Russian sphere of influence implicitly agreed at Yalta. The Western world expressed horror and disgust, but did nothing. Afghanistan, however, is not in Eastern Europe. The West has never regarded that country as falling within the Russian sphere of influence; not least because of its proximity to the Middle East where Western interests are vitally involved. This latest act of Soviet aggression, therefore, is of a different order of magnitude.

So far as the United States in concerned, the challenge could not come at a more embarrasing moment. Just when Washington's impotence is being demonstrated in Iran, Moscow demonstrates a murderously swift and efficient capacity to impose its will. These are early days. It may be that the Afghans will not accept their new Russian-imposed leader for long: that, as a Chinese comment yesterday suggested, the Russians will "burn their fingers." But on the present showing the contrast leaves little doubt about which super-power carries the greater clout.

Nor can the Third World's reaction be ignored. One can imagine the furor which would have erupted among the so-called uncommitted nations had the United States acted in the same ruthless manner. The General Assembly of the United Nations would already be meeting in emergency session, and issuing indignant condemnations.. But aggression by the Soviet Union is met neither by effective Western action nor by Third World condemnation.

What could the United States do? In the short run, very little. In present circumstances military intervention of any sort presents insuperable difficulties. But this realisation makes the question of American bases all the more urgent. The United States has already requested these in Saudi Arabia, Oman, Somalia, and Sudan. So far, it seems, only Somalia has accepted. Conceivably, this latest evidence of the bear's long and bloody reach will frighten the others into compliance, but it is as likely to frighten them the other way.

Clearly the American giant is beginning to stir. But its post-Vietnam apathy has left the limbs of the body politic lethargic and weak. It will be some time before the projected task-force is ready for action. Afghanistan, following on the heels of Iran, should help to complete the grim awakening--not so much by a douche of cold water as by a veritable blood bath.

TFSC Party Condemnation

TA311833 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 31 Dec 79 TA

[Text] Communal Liberation Party leader Alpay Durduran has said that the fact that the Soviet Union is trying to invade Afghanistan as part of the strategy of spheres of influence and security belts has transformed the entire area from the Middle East to the Indian Ocean into a powder keg.

In a public statement today, Durduran said that foreign powers in our region are exploiting the atmosphere of unrest--which is kindled by their own provocations--and increasing their efforts to further their strategic interests. Noting that his party harshly condemns those who attempt to transform countries into satellites through a strategy of spheres of influence and security belts, Durduran said that if the Soviet administration--one of the new breed of imperialism in recent times--does not renounce its invasion of Afghanistan, then duties fall on those who favor independence and nonlinement to insure that [words indistinct] Vietnam.

I KATHIMERINI FORECASTS CHANGES IN GREEK DIPLOMACY

AT301745 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 30 Dec 79 pp 1, 3 AT

[Article by Paris correspondent R. Someritis: "A Change of Policy on National Issues--Greek Diplomacy Will Be Forced Into a Number of Changes as a Result of Developments"]

[Text] Paris--Within the next few months, developments will force Greek diplomacy to consider certain important options on issues which are basic to our country. This is the belief of many who, referring to some of the expected decisions, use the ironic expression, "it's about time."

Contrasting with the normalization of relations with Moscow and our accession to the Common Market--which were handled with courage, imagination and dispatch by the Greek side--the policy of "wait and see," of "don't rock the boat", in short, the policy of stagnation is, according to foreign observers, the main characteristic of Greek diplomacy in its day-to-day dealings on many important problems. The peculiar thing is that such tactics do not even guarantee any "gain in time" because any time lost without progress in solving these problems in fact works against Greece.

1--Relations with NATO: It is certain right from the start that the only solution which brings absolutely no benefit to Greece is that of perpetuating the present "status quo." A full return to NATO's military wing incorporates certain economic benefits; it offers the opportunity of dealing with certain Turkish activities "from within the alliance" as well as certain facilities for training our officers on new weapons and techniques. At the same time, naturally, it also incorporates the danger of our country's full subjugation as well as the subjugation of our entire defense system to NATO requirements which have nothing to do with our country. A new development under these requirements would be conversion of our armed forces into forces for internal security, as they were until 1974, but this is not mandatory.

Final withdrawal from NATO and the independence of Greek Armed Forces are disadvantageous because costs are increased and because, objectively, this makes any automatic allied solidarity--in case of a "danger from the north", which has always been questionable from the point of view of effectiveness--even less effective. They are advantageous, however, in that they guarantee the independence of Greek policy, including the internal calm of the country and, certainly, its effective defense against the only current danger--Turkey.

By contrast, the current status of being "neither in nor out" of the alliance prohibits long-term planning of Greek defense (since the fact of a return--which would overthrow certain elements of the case--always exists) as well as long-term planning of armaments (each separate form of armament meets certain requirements of either defense or offense) since such a strategy is not the same when viewed by Brussels--within the structure of the alliance--or in Athens--on the basis of a possible salvation of the remainder of Cyprus or the sum total of the Aegean Islands. This was established by the army leaders in July of 1974.

In addition, while the situation remains uncertain, the psychology of the officer corps (they must either "think by themselves" or, as in the past, they must wait for the "joint" decisions of their American colleagues) is strongly affected. At the same time "faits accomplis" are established in respect to the operation of U.S. installations in Greece at a time when an official expression of the desire to alter their status, or even their possible withdrawal, has been made.

There is specific information that many issues regarding inter-Balkan cooperation and relations with the "Eastern world" in general are delayed in expectation of a settlement of the NATO issue.

2--Relations with the Middle East: It is supposed that Greece is able to play and wants to play an important role in this area both for its own benefit as well as that of the European Community. There is nobody, however, who could responsibly give a simple and convincing answer to the following question: Why does Greece not have official relations with Israel and why has it not developed relations with the PLO similar to those developed by all the other Europeans?

3--The Cyprus issue: It is clear that the policy of wait and see has resulted in no progress and that it has only allowed the strengthening of Turkish sovereignty in the "occupied" areas. It is also certain that although the Cyprus issue is a national issue for the Greek leaders, there are many who consider it a hindrance, a brake, because what predominates in their opinion is "the national center." This is also a "product of stagnation."

According to evaluations and reports which merit all possible attention (because they refer to specific instances and personalities), the "strategy of stagnation" has been promoted by approximately the identical personalities and factors regarding both NATO and the Middle East as well as Cyprus. They are characterized by the desire to leave things as they are at least until the next political change because they believe that certain positions of both the current prime minister and the foreign minister could be corrected under a spirit of more pro-Western "orthodoxy." At the same time, however, Karamanlis is characterized by a contrary desire: To clear up as many "great issues" as possible before he either considers other options or he retires, thus leaving his successor a "clear desk".

Naturally, everyone can interpret the intentions attributed to the prime minister in any way he wants. Naturally, these are influenced by his personal opinion about the person most likely to be his successor.

EXORMISIS CHARGES SUPPLY OF SECONDHAND U.S. MATERIEL

AT311330 Athens EXORMISIS in Greek 30 Dec 79 p 12 AT [Text] U.S. military equipment originally earmarked for Greece was handed over to Turkey under the decision for modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces and on the basis of priority given to this country in its capacity as the nerve-center of the Atlantic alliance in this area.

A Greek diplomatic note relevant to this matter was submitted to the State Department via the Greek Embassy in Washington. It refers to these peculiar initiatives by the pertinent U.S. committee and to weapons and material which were allocated to Greece during the 1978-79 period and which have not yet reached their destination.

Well-informed military circles in Athens, however, believe that the United States is attempting to supply the Greek Armed Forces with secondhand military equipment and with outdated antiaircraft weapons in its effort to achieve an expansion of the "ABAX 3" [as published in Greek] electronic advanced warning system to Greek territory. This system will be adopted by all NATO member states in 1980.

According to the same circles, these U.S. goals are aimed, as a first step, at weakening the Greek early warning system in such a way that this sector can then be placed under NATO jurisdiction, thus relegating Greek military services to a secondary role.

The system is basically a broad network of electronic substations with strong and very delicate sound collecting equipment able to register the noise from aircraft motors and the whine of missiles and other weapons from great distances and thus to warn local radar stations of the appearance of a target.

Installation of the entire system throughout the alliance's perimeter, including Greece, will cost over $1 billion which, as announced, will be paid for to a great extent by allied countries with the exception of West Germany which will participate in its manufacture.

Military observers in Athens maintain that so far the Greek Government has not been officially informed by Washington but that very soon it will be faced with the dilemma of whether to join or stay out of this new NATO game of electronic warning and the antiaircraft protection for the country.

According to the same sources, the above system will be supplemented with the U.S. "Daivane" [as published in Greek] antiaircraft missiles which, to the great bitterness of Bonn replaced the German "Gebart" [as published in Greek] antiaircraft armored vehicles equipped with missile launchers which were destined for the protection of the 7th U.S. Army area.

Despite their obvious faulty operation, these German antiaircraft armored vehicles will not remain unused in military warehouses since Greece, according to a Pentagon decision, will be the first country to include these costly vehicles in its antiaircraft system.

It has not yet been reported what Greek reaction will be to the supply of these faulty weapons, whose use will further burden Greek defense budget.

It must further be added that there is an additional Greek protest against these U.S. activities which concerns the categories and quality of equipment earmarked for Greece.

Such U.S. equipment includes weapons withdrawn from Vietnam and various spare parts not suitable for current equipment of the Greek Armed Forces.

GOVERNMENT, OPPOSITION REACT TO ARMED FORCES WARNING

Demirel 'Not Responsible'

TA021728 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 2 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Referring to the letter the chief of the General Staff and the armed forces commanders submitted to the president, Justice Party leader and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that we were facing a new and serious situation. Speaking at the joint meeting of his party's parliamentary groups, Demirel said that the new situation should be assessed rationally. Noting that they were not the ones to be blamed for starting the fire, Demirel said that they were struggling to extinguish the fire. It is out of the question to blame us together with those responsible for starting the fire, he added.

Demirel continued: Turkey is facing grave conditions. This fact has been stated in the government program which received a vote of confidence a month ago. We have enthusiastically and consciously undertaken work to solve Turkey's two urgent and grave problems. I went to the Cankaya Mansion at the president's invitation. The honorable president read a letter submitted to him by the chief of the General Staff and the armed forces commanders. I do not want to comment on this letter now. However, the situation is serious. Many will be commenting. We shall disclose our stand after we discuss the problem in the government, in the party's administrative council and in the parliamentary groups. This will be carried out rationally.

Pointing out that they were not responsible for the situation which Turkey is facing, Demirel said that in fact it was impossible for a government which has been in power for 35 days to bring Turkey to such a situation. Recalling that they were the ones who had activated all the institutions of the state in a bid to prevent anarchy, terror and secession, Demirel added: 60 days have passed since the parliament opened. The presidents in the parliament [National Assembly and Senate presidents] were elected on 6 November. The RPP was not able to supply its party's representatives to the [parliamentary] committees until 11 November. As a result, the committees could not be formed. The bills concerning anarchy were included in the agenda through the efforts of our colleagues. We are the ones who have engaged in a merciless struggle against anarchy, terror and secession. That is what we have been doing for the last 35 days. We have set to work with the aim of serving Turkey.

Stating that they had accomplished the maximum of what it was possible to do in 35 days, Demirel said that they had taken steps against all traitors and the treacherous gangs and had activated all state institutions to this end.

Concluding his statement, Demirel said: We are not seeking political power. We want to serve Turkey. It is for the parliament to make the laws and to supervise the government while the government administers the country. It is for the National Security Council to make the recommendations for measures regarding national security. The council brings these recommendations before the government. The National Security Council met on 21 November and on 18 December 1979. It discussed national problems. At this point, we are faced with a new and dangerous situation. This new situation should be assessed rationally. God is with those who are rightful.

It has been announced that the Justice Party joint parliamentary group will convene at 1000 on Friday, 4 January, in order to discuss the latest developments.

Ecevit Prepared for Action

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that the warning letter of the armed forces commanders was an indication of a serious situation and that the crisis in Turkey has reached a new and more advanced stage. Referring to his subject in the joint meeting of his party's parliamentary groups, Ecevit expressed his regret over the fact that Turkey has come or has been brought to this point. Recalling that in view of the situation he had taken steps in order to establish a dialog with the Justice Party even before the government was formed, Ecevit said that there was no positive reply to his initiatives.

Ecevit continued: I believe that what we should do at this stage is to speedily complete the process we have started--as if there were no such letter or warning--in a bid to attain the goal we believe to be right according to our own free will: In other words, to determine as soon as possible our views on the bills in question--although we might disagree with the way they have been brought before the parliament, which we consider incompatible with the principles of a democratic dialog. We must then make our democratic contribution to the parliamentary debate on these bills without causing any delays in the parliament.

We were convinced of the urgency of this subject even before such a warning was made. The fact that this meeting of our group--which can be considered as an extraordinary one--was decided upon on 29 December is concrete proof of the way we feel. Since that date, certain studies were prepared so as to be brought before you through the work of pertinent committees and councils. That is why, despite this warning, our party--which has never needed a warning to safeguard democracy and the state--must fulfill the task in accordance with our own judgment.

Recalling that the public was very concerned and worried about the incidents of violence, Ecevit said that the escalation of these incidents during the last 50 days had enhanced this feeling. Ecevit said that the public was waiting for the government, the political parties and the parliament to take the legal measures in connection with public order.

Ecevit concluded his speech as follows: There are some who are not careful enough on the substance of these legal measures. Undoubtedly, the public is aware that legal measures are not sufficient to curb the accelerating incidents of terror. Nevertheless, there is widespread belief that these legal measures should not be neglected either. Considering the public's feeling with understanding and respect, I believe that the best thing for us to do is to make our contribution to the bills in accordance with our judgment and without any delay. This decision was reached in our administrative council and parliamentary groups even before we were confronted with these latest developments.

VOTCP CONDEMNS GOVERNMENT REACTION TO AFGHANISTAN EVENTS

[Text] The Demirel government and reactionaries in Turkey have sided with the U.S. imperialists and NATOites on the issue of Afghanistan.

The imperialist countries, the aggressive NATO circles as well as the pro-American government, which supports martial law, the holding firms and reactionaries have expressed their discontent over the toppling of the Hafizollah Amin regime and its replacement by a new administration which is under the chairmanship of Babrak Karmal, that is attempting to bring a genuine people's democracy; to safeguard the gains of the April revolution in Afghanistan, its territorial integrity and its national independence; and to insure regional peace and security, thus reaching a new stage [in the Afghan revolution].

Engaging in a demagogic campaign, the imperialist forces, and all the reactionaries have tried to portray the call made by the Afghan Government to the Soviet Government for urgent economic, political and military aid and the positive response of the Soviet Union to this request as an interference in internal affairs. Influenced by its U.S. masters, the Demirel government and the reactionary and fascist political parties are participating in this campaign being waged by the imperialists. In line with the lies and demagogies of the U.S. imperialists and the NATOites, the Council of Ministers, meeting under the chairmanship of Demirel, issued a resolution agreeing with the deceitful terming of [the events in Afghanistan] as an interference in the internal affairs of that country.

Meanwhile, Ogah Oktay Guner, a deputy leader of the fascist Nationalist Action PARTY [NAP], Republican Reliance Party leader Feyzioglu and the religious exploiter and leader of the National Salvation Party [NSP] Erbakan in statements have openly asked for Turkey's interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. In fact, reactionary and Fasicst forces in Turkey have for a long time openly interfered in the internal affairs of Afghanistan by cooperating with CIA agents, the Maoist agents of Beijing and the counterrevolutionaries in Afghanistan.

Documents and facts which prove this have appeared in the Turkish press. For example, newspapers dated 10 October 1979 reported the following news: An Afghan refugee, (Rafik), heads the organization which supplies various items of aid, including weapons, from Turkey to the counterrevolutionaries in Afghanistan. This Afghan refugee has close contacts with the NSP officials and is using the name of Gazneli Mehmed in Turkey.

Aid was also collected by (Mujadeddi), a leading Afghan counterrevolutionary, who arrived in Turkey last month as the guest of the NSP leader Erbakan. This person, who is an avowed fierce anticommunist, is working to incite the counterrevolutionary movement in Afghanistan under the direct support of the CIA and enjoys the backing of the NSP, Justice Party, NAP and official circles.

Even this one concrete incident is enough to prove that the reactionary and fascist forces in Turkey have been interfering in the internal affairs of Afghanistan for a long time, that they have openly cooperated with imperialists and the enemies of the Afghan people in order to destroy the Afghan people's revolutionary gains and to trample the territorial integrity and national independence of that country.

Our people as well as all progressive and democratic forces support the revolutionary advances made to safeguard and reinforce the gains of the revolution, the territorial integrity of the country and its national independence. They greet the fraternal aid extended to the Afghan people by the Soviet Union. Our people still recall the extremely valuable aid extended by our neighbor the Soviet Union to Turkey during our national liberation war. The response of all the progressive forces in Turkey to the bourgeois propaganda based on distortions of the truth and lies is to enhance their solidarity with the Afghan people.

PREMIER NORDLI EXPRESSES WILLINGNESS TO BOYCOTT IRAN

[Unattributed report: "Iran Boycott"]

[Text] Naturally there is a limit to what Norway can do concerning the continuing tragedy in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Nevertheless, Prime Minister Nordli confirmed at his latest press conference that Norway is willing to contribute. The prime minister made it clear that Norway is prepared to participate in a comprehensive boycott of Iran if the United Nations adopts an initiative in that direction. Nordli'd statement must be viewed against the background of the fact that Iran has been our most important Mid-east trading partner. However, we are agreed that measures of this kind should be linked with UN decisions as a matter of basic principle.

GOVERNMENT CONDEMNS USSR INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

Kreisky Criticism

AU041044 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 4 Jan 80 p 1 AU

[Report on exclusive interview granted to DIE PRESSE by Chancellor Bruno Kreisky at Lech, Vorarlberg--date not given]

[Text] Lech (HWS)--Austria would "of course" participate in economic sanctions against Iran should the world Security Council make a decision to that effect. This was stated by Chancellor Kreisky in an interview with DIE PRESSE in Lech, where he is on vacation. Austria would live up to its role as a "loyal member state of the United Nations" in this respect, too, he said. "However, I hope that some other roads will be tried before such a decision is taken." The occupation of the Tehran embassy was undoubtedly a spontaneous act--"This was not an action of the ayatollah." But now the Iranian Government must show solidarity with the students and "wait and see where the occupiers might be ready to see reason."

Kreisky showed even more concern over the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan: "What worries me most about it is the fact that, in my opinion, this action makes no sense at all." Even if the Kabul government may not have been compliant to Moscow in every respect, "how much is there really that they could have done without Moscow's consent?"

"That was very carefully planned by the Russians. They do not run the slightest risk. But there is absolutely no excuse for what they have done. Afghanistan, Hungary, the CSSR were satellite states even before, but to dispatch one's troops there so conspicuously... I wonder whether they might not become involved in a guerrilla war there."

The situation is now becoming increasingly precarious, Kreisky says: "On the one hand there is NATO's endeavor to restore the arms balance--something that is rejected by the Soviets with great irritation. On the other hand there is the invasion of Afghanistan and, under such circumstances, should SALT II be implemented? This is hard for me to imagine. However, if SALT II is not implemented, then the entire policy of detente will be endangered."

Kreisky summed it up: "We are in for a cold spell in world politics."

Pahr Comment

[DIE PRESSE Vienna dispatch: "Pahr Hopes for UN Debate on Intervention"]

[Text] "Everything points to the fact that there is outside intervention in Afghanistan. We have always condemned such intervention." With those words, Foreign Minister Pahr in a talk with DIE PRESSE gave the first official Austrian reaction to events in Kabul. The foreign minister, however, circumscribed his comment by the reservation that a final judgment is not possible for the time being.

Pahr also hopes that a discussion of Afghanistan will take place within the framework of the United Nations. "We are also concerned that such a situation does not remain without punishment and without reaction." Austria itself, however, "has no reason to take the initiative. We are not a party." No comparable state has become active in the matter, Pahr said.

Questioned about the comparison of Afghanistan with Austria, Pahr said there was a fundamental difference: In Austria, he said, there is inner stability, which is decisive for our security. Owing to an illness of the Austrian charge d'affaires in Kabul, Austria currently has no representative in Afghanistan.

AUSTRIA TO AWAIT UN DECISION BEFORE DECIDING ON IRAN SANCTIONS

[DIE PRESSE dispatch from Vienna and Tehran: "Iran Sanctions: Vienna To Await UN Decisions"]

[Text] In a telephone conversation with DIE PRESSE, Austrian Ambassador to Iran Plattner called reports alleging that he had said Austria would not participate in economic sanctions against Iran "either intentionally or unintentionally distorted." He said that in a talk with Iranian Commerce Minister Reza Sadr he had stated that Austria would not discourage the control bank from continuing to guarantee loans for exports to Iran.

Foreign Minister Pahr in a telephone talk with DIE PRESSE emphasized that the Vienna government would only deal with the question of Iran sanctions after a corresponding decision has been made by the Security Council. The Security Council would have to meet once again to do that. As with all UN decisions regarding sanctions, Pahr stressed, Austria takes the position of not feeling automatically bound to such decisions.

Federal Chamber of Commerce Secretary General Kehrer can easily imagine that Austria as a neutral country does not accede to decisions on sanctions by the UN Security Council or the UN General Assembly. As a matter of principle, it is difficult to aline Austria's neutrality with sanctions bringing us into conflict with one single country. On the other hand, the violation of international law by Iran must also be taken into consideration. Should the Austrian Government go along with UN decisions, the Federal Chamber of Commerce would take cognizance of it, as it did in the case of Rhodesia.

Austria's external trade with Iran showed a strong declining tendency in 1979. Compared with the corresponding period of last year, exports in the first ten months decreased by 54 percent from 1.5 billion schillings to 680 million: 278 million of this amount was in machinery shipments. Imports--almost exclusively fuels, that is to say oil--decreased by 69 percent from 2.3 billion schillings to 700 million.

As to the question of the departure of Austrian diplomats from Tehran, Foreign Minister Pahr leaves that to the discretion of Ambassador Plattner. Plattner told DIE PRESSE on Wednesday that for the time being an evacuation was not being envisaged. The embassies of Portugal and Norway, however, have closed down, and Great Britain and France had reduced their staff to a minimum, Plattner said.

AMBASSADOR TO KABUL RECALLED TO REPORT ON SITUATION

LD041046 Hamburg DPA in German 1027 GMT 4 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has summoned the German ambassador in Kabul, Heinrich Berninger, to Bonn to report on the situation in Afghanistan. This was announced by a Foreign Ministry spokesman in Bonn today. At the same time, German staff sent to Afghanistan within the framework of cooperation in the educational, cultural and economic fields have been instructed to leave the country temporarily. The number of Germans at present living in Afghanistan, including members of the embassy and their families and representatives of German firms is about 150.

WARRANT ISSUED FOR ARREST OF FIVE AFGHAN STUDENTS

[Excerpt] Bonn--At the request of the public prosecutor's office the Bonn local court today issued warrants for the arrest of five of the Afghan students who for a time yesterday occupied their country's embassy in Bonn. According to the Bonn judicial authorities, the five are suspected of collective disturbance of the domestic peace, unlawful detention and causing grievous bodily harm.

According to initial investigations, the accused, who are between 21 and 27 years of age, are said to have bound three members of the embassy staff and repeatedly struck two of them so that they had to be treated in hospital for considerable injuries.

BRANDT SAYS AFGHAN EVENTS SHOW NEED TO STRENGTHEN DETENTE

LD041010 Hamburg DPA in German 0931 GMT 4 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has warned that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan should not be used as an argument against continuing the policy of detente. In an interview with KOELNER STADTANZEIGER, to be published tomorrow, Brandt said that this "very serious event" in the Middle East demonstrated that "the world continues to suffer not from too much but from too little detente, and that we must do everything to develop detente beyond Europe." According to Brandt it would be completely contrary to common sense to use the Soviet action in Afghanistan as a lever against efforts for an effective limitation of the arms race.

SPD'S WISCHNEWSKI CONDEMNS SOVIET ACTS IN AFGHANISTAN

[Excerpt] Bonn--Newly elected SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski has sharply condemned Soviet interference in Afghanistan, but warned at the same time against ill-considered reactions by the West. At his first press conference in Bonn today since his election by the Berlin party congress he said that "this must not be the hour of the cold war."

Because of the Soviet actions the West now has a great opportunity to play an active role vis-a-vis the Third World and to work for the true political and economic independence of the developing countries. Wischnewski came out in favor of a UN response to the situation in Afghanistan. The efforts for the conclusion of SALT I and SALT II and for the continuation of the European Security Conference must go on. He added that the Soviets are guilty of threatening peace in that region, guilty of violating the right to self-determination and guilty of interfering in the internal affairs of another country.

With their actions against Afghanistan the Soviets have not only ventured into difficulties with the Islamic world but have also suffered a political defeat as far as the Third World is concerned.

PRESS CONTINUES TO REACT TO SOVIET ROLE IN AFGHANISTAN

UN Response 'Must Be Unmistakable'

DW031513 Munich Bayerischer Rundfunk Network in German 1725 GMT 2 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from H.R. Faessler commentary]

[Text] What the Soviets fear is a spreading of the Islamic revolution to the roughly 50 million Soviet citizens in the Soviet republics who profess the Islamic religion. Thus, the motive for the Soviet invasion is self-evident. But what is likewise obvious is the flagrant violation of international law by those Kremlin rulers who must now rightly let themselves be called red tsars. It is extremely difficult to find out at this point whether the progressive decline of Brezhnev's health has meted out growing power to the hawks in the CPSU Politburo so as to enable them to commit this act of piracy irrespective of the policy of detente pursued by Brezhnev and his group.

Granted, this question is interesting but it is trivial as far as initial reactions by the West are concerned. What matters is action, and this indeed is a threat to peace. Though NATO yesterday expressed itself unequivocally in this sense, the debate on the closure of the West's arms gap has shown that a long way may have to be traveled between words and deeds.

There is hardly any measure that could hit the Soviet Union more heavily than a clear-cut and unequivocal condemnation of its military action by the United Nations because, out of long-standing experience, there is nothing about which the Kremlin rulers are more anxious than preserving their international prestige.

The UN response to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan must be characterized by a high degree of unity and its message must be unmistakable. But it likewise must enable international detente policy to continue because a world-political conflagration is threatening at present in the Middle East. The Kremlin rulers must be made to understand how disastrous it may turn out if they continue to boil their Afghan soup over this flame.

'Death of Detente' Assessed

[Friedhelm Kemna article: "Will Detente Die?"]

[Text] In serious bitterness President Carter has complained about the tactics of deceit with which Leonid Brezhnev explained the latest application of his doctrine. The dialog via the hot line between Moscow and Washington, if we take Carter verbatim, thus started the revision process of a concept which has been the principle for shaping East-West relations since the end of the cold war.

The Russian intervention in Afghanistan naturally is not the first occasion for reviewing detente for sham and reality. The concept, always vague and disavowed time and again, probably is precise only in the formulation of the good will, in the political paraphrasing of the principle of hope. It has bitterly little to do with the world of real differences between East and West, and not just since the final week of December.

This world, which has surrendered to obstinately surviving detente illusions so often since the Berlin blockade, since the Cuban crisis, the world which was only too ready to mistake a regional balance of interests--under constant shrinkage of the asset balance of the West--for detente, will not come off its hinges through the establishment of the Soviet garrison in Afghanistan. It should not even pretend to be surprised because Moscow has been claiming this buffer state for quite some time as an area of influence. The rapid change of the Marxist-Socialist regimes in Kabul left no doubt about the determination of the Soviet Union to remain present at the strategically important points of Middle-Eastern Asia--and to improve this position, if possible.

There were also some other Asian and African adventures by Moscow which have not unhinged the cryptically persistent dogma of "detente" and over which one proceeded to "business as usual" in the great political East-West business. The recollection of the escalating dangers of cold war, which set in swiftly after the shock, departed when the new geopolitical irritation was registered. A revision of detente failed due to the world political order of the day. Kassandra Kissinger, too, had handled it differently before dinner when he still had responsibility.

In Afghanistan, too, the tortured concept has not been rolled flat by the Russian tanks. It was nearly forgotten over Carter's bitter new year's complaint that his security adviser Brzezinski, a hawk after all, had shortly before protectively warned the world against prematurely declaring detente dead in reply to the Afghanistan challenge. In all probability it was the attempt, above all, not to burn the bridge of SALT II at a moment when many illusions of detente did in fact burst into flames all over the world.

Whatever motivated Moscow to the massive invasion of the Afghan State--the long-planned, strategic advance closer to a port of its own on the Gulf and on the Arabian Sea, or the incidental favor of the hour, the impotence of the Americans, in which a wavering position in this very direction of thrust had to be consolidated--it was an intervention into the zone of incalculable risk; into a region in which the old, tested belief of the Soviets in the divisibility of detente in the world might prove to be unrealistic.

In the end, what also makes the Soviet coup in Afghanistan different from all similar ventures is the reckless destruction of the basic prerequisites for detente, the surprisingly rude disregard for the rules of balance, the brilliant exploitation--in timing and course of action--of a position of weakness of the very power whose partnership is indispensable for detente. It might be the decisive mistake of the Russians in this case that they have overstrained the thus far reliable arc of detente to the West by three or four divisions, a few hundred tanks and the attempt at deception by their supreme representative toward the President of the United States.

Naturally the consolidation of power on the "belly" of the Soviet Union this time again is based on the concept of the divisibility of detente. In their calculation, detente in Europe will not collapse as a result of the cold war in Middle-Eastern Asia, no matter how bravely--now in turn--the German foreign minister phrases the dividing line between the community of nations and the imperial seizure by Moscow and, as the first Western politician, called for the UN "court of arbitration." No doubt the Kremlin also believes that it can rely on the emasculating entanglement of the United States in the Iranian crisis, on the supreme orientation of its foreign policy toward the lives of the 50 hostages in Tehran.

Yet nobody can tell at this hour where are the safe borders behind which indivisible cold war will replace the leftover concept of detente for good.

This would happen provided that neither the United States nor the West at large wishes to return to the icy region of the political controversy and the lack of communication in relations between the powers. The question is how long the West will yet allow itself to be fascinated in its vital interests by a detente concept which advertises itself with the instruments of extortion.

There is no simple answer because the room for effective reaction below the military risk is narrow. The charge that the Russians have released in the middle of an Islamic zone of conflict through an act of challenge is so highly explosive that any step may end up in an uncontrollable chain reaction. Mourir pour l'Afghanistan probably is not the motto. Yet the West once again, and perhaps at the decisive time, has been plunged into the need for a determined demonstration to block Moscow's imperial course.

USSR Relying on Western 'Helplessness'

DW021325 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 31 Dec 79/1 Jan 80 p 4 DW

[Commentary signed Schr: "Cold Wind From Moscow"]

[Text] A cold wind is blowing from the East at the turn of the year. The fact that it is also blowing into the face of the chancellor is now probably also one of the long-distance effects of the turbulence in the Afghan mountains. And these are linked with the fact that Moscow believes it can take the Western powers by surprise in a moment of weakness. It seems as though it expects more from open action than from a defensive stance of waiting and placing stakes on ratification of the SALT II treaty and the continuation of the detente process. Does this already indicate the handwriting of a new generation of Soviet leaders or does Brezhnev believe that Afghanistan of 1979 will be forgotten as quickly as was Prague in 1968?

There is no indication, however, that "hawks" and "doves" exist in Moscow, whereas everything seems to indicate that the Soviets are placing their stakes on the forgetfulness and helplessness of the West and reckon with the eventual winding up of the SALT II treaty after a cooling-down period--a risk taken on purpose. The attacks on Helmut Schmidt are so subtly dosed that they would fit into such a strategy. On the one hand, they are phrased in such a way that they can be used propagandistically as proof of aggravation of the international situation for which the West is culpable, thus intending to divert attention from Moscow's lack of will for peace. On the other hand, they are an only too transparent attempt to put grist in the mill of internal opposition to Schmidt's course.

The charge that the chancellor himself demanded medium-range missiles rather than acted in response to Washington's pressure is intended to provide an argument for those in the SPD who deny the need for closing the arms gap. Schmidt will thus be deprived of the objection that Bonn has no other choice for the sake of the alliance. At the same time, the neighbors of the Federal Republic are incited against "German militarism." As long as Moscow does not cancel the invitation to Schmidt, it leaves all doors open, however.

BANKS NOT AFFECTED BY IRANIAN WITHDRAWALS

[Summary] Hamburg--It appears that banks in the Federal Republic have not been affected by the withdrawal of Iranian deposits in European banks. This was stated today by a spokesman for the main German banks.

The Ministry of Finance in Bonn, the German Federal Bank and the Association of German Banks in Cologne also have no knowledge of any withdrawals. The Deutsche Bank in Frankfurt pointed out that, in this matter, bank confidentiality strictly applies, and that it can give no information.

Other banks said that in recent months there have been some withdrawals and some new deposits, and that on the whole the two have canceled each other out. It seems that Tehran carried out these transactions as a sort of test to find out to what extent the Iranian depositor could dispose with these funds. These transactions, however, did not take place on federal territory, but most likely with the foreign branches of German banks in Luxembourg and London.

MOSCOW SEEN PROMOTING DISARMAMENT VIA INTER-GERMAN CONTACTS

DW030957 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 31 Dec 79 pp 19-20 DW

[Unattributed article: "Moscow Puts Its Stakes on the Germans"]

[Text] In their efforts to prevent the deployment of new U.S. medium-range weapons in Europe after all, the Soviets are placing hope on Bonn and East Berlin. SED boss Erich Honecker is to convince the chancellor in a series of meetings of the special task which the two German states have for disarmament.

The Russian has appeared generous. "The Germans", said Andrey Gromyko, "should be sitting at the table, too" when disarmament negotiations between Soviets and Americans materialize on nuclear medium-range weapons in Europe.

The West German chancellor, however, did not like the offer advanced by Moscow's foreign minister during his Bonn visit in November. The Federal Republic, Helmut Schmidt objected, is not a nuclear power, nor does it have the ambition of becoming one. But his government will indeed be particularly interested in the negotiations of the two great powers. In being the very country in which most of the new NATO missiles are to be deployed, the Federal Republic has a "vital interest" in the success of the disarmament talks which, ideally, could make NATO's arms-gap closure superfluous.

Refusing to be discouraged, the Soviets insist on having the Bonn people participate in the next disarmament round of the two superpowers, at least indirectly: Regardless of the latest attacks against Bonn's Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the Kremlin wants a second line of negotiations to be established parallel to the disarmament talks of the two great powers, namely, via German-German relations. Helmut Schmidt and SED boss Erich Honecker are to begin this dialog by proxy at their meeting planned for early next year.

Moscow hopes that Bonn's governing Social Democrats could prevent the transfer of new U.S. medium-range weapons to the U.S. troops in Europe after all. They are less convinced of the will for disarmament on the part of the United States, however.

The Soviets, too, proceed from the premise that the new missiles allow the Americans to confine the nuclear conflict to Europe in the event of war. In that case they no longer need to put up their strategic missile potential for the allies and risk the destruction of their own country.

Hence, the Kremlin suspects Washington is only half-heartedly interested in negotiating with the East on "Pershing-2" and cruise missiles.

It was already clear to the Soviets in early October that they would be unable to prevent the missile decision of NATO. At a meeting with the SED Politburo during the 30-year anniversary celebration of the GDR, Leonid Brezhnev explained the guidelines to the East German comrades:

There must not be any military superiority of NATO in Europe;

Still it is necessary to adhere to the policy of detente since there is no alternative;

The two German states have a special mission in the relaxation of the East-West relationship.

For all these reasons, demanded Brezhnev, Honecker must get together with Chancellor Schmidt.

The SED leadership, which until then had displayed little interest in an early inter-German summit because of the unstable situation in the eastern republic, obeyed. It dispatched its Bonn representative Ewald Moldt to Schmidt and summoned Bonn's authorized representative, Guenter Gaus, to Honecker to have preliminary talks on the meeting. The SED also decided on a signature campaign by which the GDR people were to support Brezhnev's disarmament initiative which the Soviet chief had announced during his visit to East Berlin. Honecker plans to present the 13 million signatures to the chancellor as evidence of the will for detente.

Thus Helmut Schmidt must prepare himself for disarmament to be the dominant subject and not inter-German affairs or economic cooperation. Addressing the SED Central Committee in mid-December, Honecker averred his readiness "to clarify with the Government of the FRG a number of questions which will achieve further headway toward safeguarding peace and disarmament."

For the Schmidt visit the East German is envisaging a joint statement which will fix in writing the special interest of the two German states in detente and thus also their special role in the disarmament dialog. The general secretary suggested the tenor of such a document: In his progress report to the Central Committee he emphasized several times the "commitment of the two German states to insure that war will never again emanate from German soil."

Under Moscow's concept the special effort of Bonn and East Berlin for disarmament must not remain a lone event. The Soviets would rather like to make the German-German summit meetings a permanent institution--after the model of the German-French consultations.

But then both the Russians and the East Germans have made up their reckoning without Helmut Schmidt. The chancellor deems special German-German actions of little use. "And in that respect," says a close Schmidt aide, "he will not be vamped by anything whatsoever."

On the one hand, the Bonn government chief believes that relations with the GDR are not yet adequately developed for trustfully conveying the wishes and demands from one side to the other.

On the other hand, the chancellor is aware that any flirtation with Honecker would make the allies at home and abroad suspicious. In the FDP and among the NATO partners the suspicion is too strong that the Eastern offer is but another attempt to drive a wedge between the Federal Republic and its allies--with the objective of reducing U.S. influence in Europe.

Nowadays the Soviet Union is again indicating such intentions openly. Thus, high-ranking Soviet functionaries dealing with Western affairs [Westfunktionaere] spread the absurd contention that Washington had extorted Schmidt's assent to NATO's closure of the arms gap with the hint that the United States otherwise would put its stakes on Franz Josef Strauss in the election campaign.

Thus, skepticism is wielding greater weight than the lure to be present now at the side-table during the disarmament negotiations--just as at the time of the four-power negotiations on Berlin--and to share in determining the speed and substance of the talks through individual contacts with each of the official negotiating partners.

Yet the Federal Government would not like to be solely dependent on the good will of the United States. Upon Bonn's urging the NATO Council decided in Brussels in mid-December that the Americans must consult their alliance partners in each phase of the talks through an institution which is to be set up.

Bonn is prepared indeed to sit down at the negotiating table with the East--though only shoulder-to-shoulder with its European allies. When the followup meeting to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) is due in Madrid in the fall of 1980, it is planned to decide there on a special meeting on disarmament in which all European states in the East and West will participate.

This conference then would meet parallel to the SALT III talks between Moscow and Washington--and could control the course of the negotiations any time through direct inquiry.

Bonn also wants to cultivate bilateral talks--but not just with East Berlin. The Bonn visit by Polish Foreign Minister Emil Wojtaszek just before Christmas was the overture to a series of consultations with most Warsaw Pact states: In early February the Hungarian foreign minister will visit the federal capital, in late February Hans-Dietrich Genscher will fly to the CSSR, and in March Schmidt will be going to Moscow.

Additional consultations are also planned with the GDR, albeit on the level of state secretaries, and even on these contacts Bonn has already stuck a European label so as to dispel any suspicion of the Western allies. Protectively, Bonn's representative in East Berlin, Guenter Gaus, told the GDR leadership that the talks will be "conducted only with a view to the Madrid conference."

L'HUMANITE CRITICIZES MITTERRAND ON EUROMISSILES ISSUE

LD031631 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 20 Dec 79 p 1 LD

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "Plea for NATO"]

[Text] So, the Socialist Party [PSI] has said no to our proposal to stage a joint demonstration against the installation of new U.S. nuclear missiles in Europe.

This refusal was no doubt predictable after the unequivocal statements made by Gaston Deferre and Lionel Jospin.

However, it has to be said that Francois Mitterrand went further yesterday by adopting the main argument put forward by NATO to justify its decision.

Moreover, this argument is exactly the same as the one hammered home by the whole government press in France: The Americans are right to respond to Soviet rearmament.

In short, the PS first secretary is faithfully siding with Washington.

This is hardly surprising since he said as early as 5 December. "We do not want any imbalance between East and West. If the experts think that Pershing missiles are necessary to insure this balance we are in favor of them."

The White House experts simply had to think they were necessary and Francois Mitterrand was immediately convinced.

Unfortunately the new argument used by the experts is in complete contradiction to the statements hitherto made by NATO circles.

Do you want proof?

Is it not true that the London Institute of Strategic Studies expressed on 2 February 1979 the view that there was parity between the NATO and Warsaw Pact nuclear weapons?

Did President Carter himself not state on 1 October 1979: "Nobody in the world could surpass our defense forces?"

Did German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt not express his satisfaction in the following terms on 22 October: "We have created the right conditions in Europe for the political and military balance required for our security"?

Finally, did U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance not go even further on 26 October: "Our alliance is stronger than the Warsaw Pact."

Well? Why this sudden change of attitude? Why are the U.S. leaders, with the support of Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mitterrand, assuming the frightening responsibility of reviving the arms race by deploying 600 new nuclear missiles on the borders with the USSR?

Such a decision runs counter to the SALT agreements signed on 18 June by Carter and Brezhnev which consecrated the balance of military forces between the USSR and the United States.

Has the Soviet Union strengthened its defenses since then? The SS-20 missiles, which some people use as a pretext to justify the NATO decision, were deployed more than 3 years ago, in other words, well before the SALT agreements were signed. FRG Defense Minister Hans Apel gave the game away by stating that the decision to "modernize" the NATO missile system was taken in 1975--in other words before the SS-20 missiles ever existed.

Since the SALT agreements were signed, the Soviet Union has not only not increased its military potential but has decided to withdraw 20,000 men and 1,000 tanks from the GDR. Therefore the steps taken by NATO thwart the move toward detente which had been started.

In an article by Georges Fillioud, the PS yesterday denied that it is trying to side with Washington. We would have been the first to welcome this if he had not repeated the pretext of the strengthening of the USSR's strategic forces used precisely by Washington.

It is regrettable that the PS, which so loudly declares its desire for union, did not seize this opportunity to show the sincerity of this desire by taking part in today's demonstration in Paris. However, those who take the threat posed by nuclear escalation seriously will flock to the march from [Place de] la Nation to the Bastille this evening.

L'AURORE SCORES 'AMBIGUOUS' GOVERNMENT STAND ON IRAN

LD031451 Paris L'AURORE in French 28 Dec 79 p 1 LD

[Jacques Guilleme-Brulon article: "Too Far or Not Far Enough, Mr President"]

[Text] Ambiguous talk is not necessarily the best aspect of diplomacy.

It is even less appropriate when it is a question of expressing your solidarity with a friend who has found himself in a difficult situation.

Throughout the dramatic affair of the American Embassy hostages, France--I mean, its representatives--has made enigmatic statements which could indicate agreement just as well with everybody as with no one.

While international laws are being openly violated by the Tehran authorities we would like to see our rulers make a clear-cut choice.

"The right choice," as Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing once stated, admittedly under different circumstances.

"France," the president stated at a Cabinet meeting yesterday, "which has recognized right from the beginning the realities of the Iranian revolution, will support the international community's efforts to secure the release of hostages still held prisoner in Iran...."

This statement leaves us with a sense of frustration. It goes both too far and not far enough.

Too far because the incumbent at the Elysee has first paraphrased one of the answers which he gave to Jean-Pierre Elkabbach during his 28 November televised interview, when he strangely emphasized "the fundamental force of life in Iran" as represented by the Islamic revolution.

Furthermore, Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing stated that "you cannot accept the destruction of international law and seizure of hostages."

Antagonism between these two statements seems obvious since it indeed was the fanatical and demented nature of Mr Khomeyni's revolution that encouraged some peculiar students to seize American diplomatic personnel as hostages.

Condemnation of the latter inexorably implies condemnation of the former.

Under the circumstances, any allusion to the "international community" looks like a tacit concession which neutralizes the above statement even further, assuming that is possible.

France needs no one to pass judgment on an intolerable situation the responsibility for which falls--who would dare to deny this?--on the shoulders of men who have brutally shown themselves to be implacable enemies of our civilization.

With respect to this matter, our duty to show solidarity with our American allies must not be affected by any reticence. Our solidarity must be complete and without reservations.

Cioran is right to emphasize that "compliance with the adversary's wishes is a clear symptom of weakness, that is, tolerance which in the final analysis is merely tantamount to the coquetry of the dying" (Guilleme-Brulon note: "Ecartelement" [struggle] published by Gallimard)[French publishing house].

PRICE OF OIL PRODUCTS, GAS, ELECTRICITY RAISED

LD031330 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 3 Jan 80 LD

[Summary] The national price committee decided this morning to raise the price of oil products, gas and electricity. Economy Minister Rene Monory told reporter Michel (Gariballe) that the entire increase announced by the oil producers would be applied immediately to the price of gasoline, supergrade gasoline, gas oil and domestic heating fuel. The increase represents a rise of 19 centimes a liter, including tax, on all the products.

Electricity and gas prices are to rise by more than 10 percent.

Raymond Barre will comment on the economic and social consequences of the oil price rises this evening. He will be speaking live on television at 2000.

PRIME MINISTER COSSIGA TO VISIT WASHINGTON

LD031920 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 3 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Prime Minister Cossiga is going to Washington for an official visit on 24-25 January at the invitation of the President of the United States. He is scheduled to meet with President Carter, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and other members of the American Government, with whom he will examine the principal problems of international affairs as well as bilateral problems.

LABOR ATTACKS COSSIGA, GIANNINI REMARKS DEBATED

[Text] Rome, January 4 (ANSA)--Italy's joint CGIL-CISL-UIL [Italian General Confederation of Labor-Italian Confederation of Workers Unions-Italian Union of Labor] Trade Union Central has come out with a major attack on Premier Francesco Cossiga's ruling coalition, breaking the "truce" that has reigned in labor-government relations since the administration came to power in August.

The powerful labor organization overwhelmingly approved a motion from CGIL Secretary Luciano Lama to stage the general strike announced for this period on January 15. The secretary of the predominantly Communist trade union confederation passed the harshest of possible judgements on the Rome government, that it was incapable of governing.

"The severity of the crisis", Lama said, "requires a government that is capable of intervening and dealing with the tasks of the day".

"The present government, we regret to say, is not capable of governing", he added. "That is why we are asking for a leadership that is up to the job", Lama concluded.

Despite the blow dealt by the unions, the Cossiga government appears to be on a steadier footing now than in recent days. The government's drastic anti-terrorism measures and recent energy deliberations, according to observers, has given a major boost to its image in the eyes of public opinion. The general impression these days is that the government will hold out until next spring's round of local elections, a more optimistic survival forecast than in the past.

Two major political appointments between now and the spring are likely to have a crucial effect on the government's fate--the Socialist Party's (PSI) forthcoming Central Committee meeting and the Christian Democratic Party's (DC) national congress at the beginning of February.

A badly split "PSI" is expected to face a tough battle between its two major factions. One, headed by Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile, advocates a path of leftist unity, while the other, led by Secretary Bettino Craxi, advocates a more "independent" role for the party.

For their part, the Christian Democrats will be grappling with the issue of the Communist Party's (PCI) demand to join the government and will have to map out a stand on the matter.

Meanwhile, debate was still going on about Italian Minister for Administrative Reform Massimo Severo Giannini's grim analysis of the nation's state of health. Giannini, a "non-political" authority on bureaucratic affairs who is considered to be close to the Socialists, went down on record in a recent interview as saying that there was "nothing to be done" about the Italian situation. He charged the country's political class and trade unions with "incapability and irresponsibility" and was even quoted as saying that he was increasingly tempted to "get out of Italy".

Although the minister issued a partial retraction of the interview and said that he had been attributed with "concepts that do not respond to (his) effective opinions with a forcing and distortion of (his) thought", the furor over the affair has not let up.

The latest word on the debate came yesterday from the former chief justice of the Italian Constitutional Court, Paolo Rossi, who branded Chief-of-State Sandro Pertini's reaction to Giannini's statements "sensational".

The president's office issued a statement Wednesday saying that Giannini's alleged statements "arose surprise and a painful impression", especially in their contrast to Pertini's New Year's speech voicing "confidence in the Italian people and hope in the country's future". The statement also contained an implict invitation to Giannini to quit his post if he was so sour on Italy. "It is surprising that, despite this uncommendable state of mind (of wanting to leave Italy), professor Giannini should remain a minister of the republic, unless, of course, he hastens to deny the statements attributed to him," the presidential communique said.

Rossi, taken aback by Pertini's reaction, issued his own statement to say: "I can understand the president feeling hurt, because Giannini's statements and his assertion that he wants to leave Italy are rather hurting, especially coming as they did from a government minister. But it is not the chief of state who revokes or concedes confidence. It is the Parliament's job. I'm not the one who says so, the Constitution does--the chief of state entrusts a man to form a government, then the lower house and the Senate give or do not give it their approval. These are the rules, and they must be respected."

SA CARNEIRO CONDEMNS SOVIET INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] The new Portuguese prime minister today condemned the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan, even before presiding over the first meeting of his council of ministers. Sa Carneiro described the Soviet intervention as a threat to world peace and security.

Sa Carneiro's government, sworn-in today, is the first Portuguese cabinet since 1919 exclusively comprised of civilians. After the first cabinet meeting, it was announced that Francisco Pinto Balsemac, minister assistant to the prime minister, will travel to the Azores tomorrow. At the same time, a working group comprising the ministers of defense, social affairs, housing and public works and transport was entrusted with the task of mobilizing national resources with a view to solving the most pressing problems and planning the reconstruction work in the archipelago hit by the earthquake.

Sa Carneiro's cabinet has decided to present its program to the Assembly of the Republic on 11 January.

SA CARNEIRO SPEAKS AT GOVERNMENT SWEARING-IN CEREMONY

LD031720 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1248 GMT 3 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] [Begin recording] [Announcer] General Ramalho Eanes is shaking hands with the outgoing prime minister, Maria de Lourdes Pintasilgo. The prime minister, Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro, will now speak:

[Sa Carneiro] Mr President of the Republic, ladies and gentlemen:

The Democratic Alliance is assuming power by the imperative of the electoral will of the Portuguese people who have given it a majority in the Assembly of the Republic [sentence indistinct]. Thus ends a prolonged political crisis that could only have found its conclusion and its resolution by means of general elections.

The electoral victory that has led to the formation of this government is a vindication of the political blueprint under which the Social Democratic Party [PSD], Social Democratic Center [CDS] and People's Monarchist Party [PPM] united, and to which the Reformists' Group [former Socialists] became associated through an agreement with the Social Democrats.

The unity of our goals and our action, while preserving the specific character of the programs and principles of each component, was one of the reasons for our victory and will be the basis of the success of the new majority. Thus the Democratic Alliance is assuming power not as an end in itself but as a means for realizing a proposed and accepted blueprint.

So today we are assuming both here in government and in parliament the exercise of democratic power which is relative power and must be exercised with full respect for the Constitution, for other sovereign bodies, for social and political forces and, above all, for the men and women of Portugal.

This power neitheremanates from behind desks nor is imposed from behind the scenes. In such circumstances it will neither be the kind of power which one shrinks from using [words indistinct] nor the kind of power that would be limited to the mere administration of a system partly inherited from our opponents and partly from the undemocratic action of minorities which describe themselves as revolutionary.

While aware of limitations imposed by time and resulting from the observance of requirements of the constitutional system and of the respective transition period, the present government and its parliamentary majority, faithful to the express will of the Portuguese people, have been mandated to change Portuguese society in accordance with their specific blueprint and by means of reforms whose intensity and pace will be determined by the need to resolve the country's specific problems.

The government will be guided by these principles and therefore, it will properly exercise executive powers and be unswerving in its goals, cohesive and solid in its resolve and moderate and truthful in its actions--actions uncompromisingly carried out for the strengthening of representative democracy, the rule of law and the sense of solidarity and justice.

Total respect for representative democracy and the aim to achieve it fully by the conclusion of the transition period will entail respect for the views of social forces and public opinion and its representatives, and therefore observance of the usual means of maintaining communication with each of them. But this also means that none of those forces must be granted privileges or influence which might misrepresent the choice made at the polls or which might give them a decisionmaking power incompatible with democratic principles and practice.

The government will lend an attentive ear to public opinion as expressed via the mass media and will not attempt to force the media by administrative means to inform the nation as the government thinks fit at any given moment. However, the government will not forget that the views reflected, and at times originated, by the mass media often do not represent the national consensus of opinion, and sometimes do not even reflect a significant component of such opinion. Thus, while listening to these views, the government will not allow its actions to be determined by them, nor will it use them to assess its situation or the advisability of its policies.

The government will not (?suppress) the responsible interaction of social forces, but will not refrain from insuring that this interaction is truly free, or from (?bringing about) the conditions propitious for the possible degree of consensus among these forces. The social forces are not organs of sovereignty; any effort to govern through them would be no better than a return to the concept of a corporate state that we utterly and firmly reject. By the same token, it does not behoove the organizations that claim to represent the social forces to determine the decisions of the executive power that is the sole province of the government.

The primacy of law, cornerstone of the state of law, entails full respect for the laws of the land, with no exceptions or temporizations of any kind.

It is not easy to rapidly put an end to a certain climate of impunity that is spreading in our country and exists in areas of the state--or dependent on the state--which should, on the contrary, give an example of scrupulous respect for the laws of this country. But the difficulty of the task will only lead to the government's greater resolve in tackling it. In the certainty that, if this task is not undertaken, the national community, the democratic regime and the freedom of the individual will be undermined by corruption and arbitrariness and will finally collapse under the weight of the immorality of unjust power.

The awareness of the need for solidarity and justice cannot be dissociated from the democratic regime itself and must be fully promoted in each individual country so that gradually it may be imparted to the international community. Such lofty goals make it imperative that the Democratic Alliance government should be seen operating on a national rather than a partisan level. Supported by the parties and individuals that form the new parliamentary majority, the government and its policies will nevertheless not be subordinated to them--even though it is answerable to them, and liable to be replaced by them.

The decision to adopt this line prompted me to abandon the post of chairman of the PSD. The office I have just been sworn into belongs to the PSD in the context of the Democratic Alliance, but the responsibility for the exercise thereof and for the political leadership of the government is mine and mine alone.

The government will not be guided by ideological criteria. Rather, it will consider real conditions in order to resolve the specific problems of the people--of the people and of the communities that they make up with a greater or lesser degree of autonomy--for solidarity and justice must be extended to all Portuguese, wherever they may live and work, to the local government organizations and to the autonomous regions of Madeira and Azores. And at this particular time it behooves the government to declare its determination to help the people of the Azores, especially those on Terceira and Sao Jorge islands, by every available means. In the midst of the grief shared by the whole nation we must start thinking immediately of the rapid and complete reconstruction of what the earthquake has destroyed. The government is committed to this.

The internal and external difficulties we are facing cannot be underestimated. A continuously deteriorating internal economic situation--having as its sole hopeful sign the improvement of the balances of trade and payments--will be echoed this year by a worsening of the international economic situation. The latest OECD forecasts give no encouragement to its member countries, specifically to Portugal, where a higher rate of inflation and a lower growth rate are forecast.

We shall also have to face new increases in the price of oil and the political instability that has characterized the end of the seventies and which threatens to degenerate into serious conflicts. The recent invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, which poses a threat to world peace and security, is an example typical of the dangers ahead.

The decade that has just come to an end was characterized by an uncertainty and instability that spread the anxiety and doubt we see taking root everywhere. We feel them in Portugal too, mixed with the joy of the regained freedom and of the not totally fulfilled promises of democracy and social justice.

It will be our role, at the level of real achievements, to start to work toward meeting the legitimate and unfulfilled aspirations of the Portuguese people. This work may continue later through more profound reforms and more lasting changes.

As a member of the community of European nations and of the broader community of the free world, Portugal must also make its contribution to helping mankind find the paths of peace, tolerance and justice in the eighties. It will be on the basis of our internal policies, and as an extension thereof, that we shall adopt our approach to international issues, never in the opposite direction that creates dependence and [words indistinct].

The individual is the measure and the purpose of all human endeavor. Politics must be at the service of his full realization. Such is our rule, our new beginning and our goal. (?It provides) the measure of failure or success and is the cause of the stability or downfall of governments and regimes. [passage indistinct] [end recording]

EANES ENJOINS NEW GOVERNMENT TO RESPECT DEMOCRACY

[Begin Eanes recording] The elections' turnout and results were essentially democratic. They expressed a deeply felt need for a change, and were the reaffirmation of the people's hope in the ideals of April 1974 and their materialization: A greater security in the future, a greater effort in the creation of wealth, a greater care in the equitable distribution of wealth created and a greater social justice through real support of the most underprivileged classes. This desired change is always based on the wish to meet the aspirations of the Portuguese people.

As the person responsible for the government, you are, Mr Prime Minister--as a result of the people's vote and the imperative need to interpret it democratically--the foremost custodian of such demanding hopes. You have at your disposal considerable means which make it legitimate to expect--in an attitude of realistic compromise--a term in office capable of providing for the gradual satisfaction of the daily needs of the people. Without forgetting the difficulties lying ahead, one could even say that both your excellency and your government have--unlike any previous government since 1976--the minimum means required to overcome them successfully. In this connection, the extensive experience you had during your years in the opposition will no doubt enable you to have no doubts about the extreme importance of the political debate of major and minor issues through the media, and the suitable use which the government will prove capable of making of such means in order to explain its decision, and to facilitate the necessary criticism. The parliamentary majority, from which the government sworn in today has emerged, has sprung from democracy, and only in democracy can it find its full justification.

It is indeed taken for granted that no majority in a state of law and in a pluralist regime will allow itself to be paralyzed by the Manicheism of antagonic decisions, which is the vice which destroys democratic tolerance and the harbinger of authoritarian tendencies.

The decade we are now entering will probably have little in common with the decades of relative prosperity and international stability in which the political and social concept of our generation were formed. It is the duty of all rulers to pursue a policy--their own policy--taking into account that international relations are of paramount importance to countries like ours in view of our insufficient industrial resources, (?the dimension) of the domestic market and also of the historic conditions linked to [word indistinct]. But we have also (?tried) to govern according to a criterion of democratic vitality which gives sense to the state of law and consistence to the principle of alternation of power.

Therefore, it is also my duty to insure that the concept of political majority--as a condition of government stability and coherence--will not lose its value, so that the debate which will unfold in the near future may develop within a framework in which several alternate majorities will be possible. [end recording]

[Text] Several Spanish political groups have condemned the armed Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The Spanish Communist Party, in an editorial in the daily MUNDO OBRERO, rejects the intervention from a class and revolutionary standpoint. Nevertheless, the Communist Party says that neither the United States nor other leading NATO powers have the moral right to condemn the Soviet Union since they too have been accomplices to similar imperialist aggression.

For its part, the Union of Maoist Youth has also condemned the Soviet invasion. A note issued by the party's Central Committee says this action sets a new highpoint in the spiral of interference and aggression carried out directly or indirectly by the Soviet Union.

PCE Executive Issues Communique

LD032358 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 3 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] The intervention of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan continues to have repercussions throughout the world. The Spanish Marxist left also condemns the intervention.

The Permanent Commission of the PCE Executive, which met this afternoon, has issued a communique in which it says: Without entering into the nature of the events which preceded this intervention, or the possible involvement of other great powers--for a lack of objective and reliable information among other reasons--the Permanent Commission believes that the entry of the troops of one country into another violates the principles of sovereignty and independence, contributes to making international relations more tense and creates more dangers for world peace.

The PCE Executive's Permanent Commission says that the fact that certain imperialist powers may have used methods similar to those which we condemn today does not excuse what has happened.

The PCE considers that, following these events and others such as NATO's decision to station new tactical nuclear missiles in Europe, initiatives within the framework of the United Nations are urgently required to reach effective disarmament measures and suppress military blocs and the presence of all kinds of military bases on foreign soil.

The communique concludes by saying that the PCE hopes that the nonalined countries' movement will place itself at the head of such initiatives, which can make a decisive contribution to the maintenance of world peace.

For its part, the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia, that is to say that Catalan communists, has said through its President Don Gregorio Lopez Raimundo: We cannot accept the military intervention of one country in another, especially when this intervention affects socialist countries.

PRESS COMMENT ON AFGHANISTAN REVIEWED

LD031520 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0920 GMT 3 Jan 80 LD

[Press review on Afghanistan events]

[Excerpts] Many papers comment today on the repercussions of the Afghanistan situation on big power politics.

HELSINGIN SANOMAT notes that Afghanistan was, even a couple of years ago, still a backward neutral state whose national government maintained good relations with the Soviet Union. Now the country is becoming Moscow's Vietnam, tying up a lot of Soviet resources without giving much in return. Moreover, the situation in Afghanistan strengthens the suspicions about Soviet policy. It is being asked what would happen if in Iran, for instance, a leftist "Terijoki government" [reference to pro-Soviet 'Democratic People's Government of the Republic of Finland' set up in 1939] were to be formed, and it concluded a treaty with Moscow and asked for assistance?

The statement issued by the Finnish Foreign Ministry about the events in Afghanistan can, in the view of HELSINGIN SANOMAT, be understood as follows: Finland regards the present situation as abnormal and undesirable from the point of view of the entire international community, and hopes that the Soviet Union will withdraw its troops as soon as possible in accordance with its promises. The hope is appropriate, the paper says, but perhaps not realistic. It appears that the Soviet troops will have to stay in Afghanistan for a long time, the paper says.

SUOMEN SOSIALIDEMOKRAATTI notes that if the United States seriously wants to interpret the events in Afghanistan as an indication of the Soviet Union's expansionist policy, it may then be foolish to expect any great progress in detente for the next few years. It is true that the situation regarding detente seemed gloomy even before Afghanistan; the U.S. Senate's debate on the SALT II treaty seemed to have been postponed until after the United States presidential elections.

KRISTITYU VASTUU says it is difficult to understand what forced the Soviet Union to show to the world the efficiency of its military transport and of its armored troops in Afghanistan. The military air transports and the open intrusion of armored divisions into Afghanistan is to be condemned and is in glaring contrast to the Soviet Union's earlier talk about detente. The occupation of Afghanistan has led rapidly to a crisis of confidence between Washington and the Kremlin and has decisively weakened the possibilities of the U.S. Senate's ratification of the SALT II treaty. At the same time, the international atmosphere has suddenly deteriorated, says KRISTITYU VASTUU.

SAVON SANOMAT says the Brussels meeting of NATO ambassadors touched upon events in Afghanistan, and it was reported that some possibilities of action were brought forward. One of these possibilities, according to NATO sources, is a boycott of the Moscow Olympics. If that possibility becomes a reality, the matter will turn into a very strong international demonstration which will be widely noted, SAVON SANOMAT points out. On the other hand, reacting to this action would, in the paper's opinion, be a very doubtful kind of reaction.

NORWAY

AFTENPOSTEN DETAILS LABOR PARTY CHIEF'S MOSCOW TALKS

LD031201 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 24 Dec 79 p 5 LD

[Olav Trygge Storvik report: "Soviet Union Fears New Nuclear Weapons"]

[Excerpts] During Norwegian Labor Party chairman Reiulf Steen's visit to Moscow 11-17 December, Soviet political leaders repeatedly expressed serious doubts about a real U.S. willingness to negotiate to bring the arms race under control. Informed sources have reported this to AFTENPOSTEN.

Party chairman Reiulf Steen held four rounds of talks in Moscow with high-ranking Soviet leaders. The participants on the Soviet side were: CPSU chief ideologist Mikhail Suslov; Boris Ponomarev, chief of the Central Committee International Section; Vitaliy Shaposhnikov, who is one of the four deputy chiefs of the International Section and who has special responsibility for Scandinavia and the Benelux countries (he speaks Scandinavian languages); and Vadim Sobakin, secretary to Shaposhnikov.

Labor Party circles report that the talks took place in a calm and relaxed atmosphere. The meetings with Shaposhnikov, in particular, were very informal, with long and exhaustive talks. Characteristic of the atmosphere were humorous moments such as when Reiulf Steen mentioned that his trip to Moscow had been criticized in Norway and compared with Chamberlain's policy. This remark made Ponomarev smile and say that Chamberlain worked for war but you work for peace. Some of the Soviet comments and utterances during the talks ought to be assessed in the light of the fact that the Soviet leaders were talking with a Norwegian party chairman who is also a central member of the government immediately before the NATO ministers' council was to take an important decision.

A central factor common to all the talks was the Soviet leaders' suspicion, doubt and serious fear of the United States' real security policy objective and its political desire for real negotiations to end the arms race. It was said outright that several times they had asked themselves whether some circles in the United States want an arms race for economic reasons in order to play on the Soviet Union's weak economic position, and whether the West is possibly playing along with China, which Moscow is also obliged to take into account in its defense planning. In this connection, they referred to the fact that Chinese leaders call the Soviet Union enemy No 1.

Soviet Pessimism

Soviet pessimism regarding the United States' real intentions is based on the long time spent negotiating the SALT II treaty. And when the President finally signs it seems as if Congress will not ratify the treaty. Maybe this means that Carter does not control forces in American society who want a different development, the Soviet leaders were wondering. They also alleged that General Rogers, NATO supreme commander in Europe, does not really want arms control but regards such proposals as a political smokescreen in order to acquire more and better weapons.

Suslov asked what "negotiations" really mean. He believed that the very word is ambiguous and that there is a great difference between negotiations from a position of strength and an actual decision on arms modernization, and negotiations first and decisions later. He did not believe that the weapons will not be deployed once the decision is taken. He believed that there will be no way out if the Pershing-2 and cruise missiles are deployed. Then the Soviet Union will have to take precautions and countermeasures. At least there can be no talk of fresh negotiations before the SALT II treaty is ratified. The possibilites of that happening in the next few months were viewed very pessimistically, and in the meantime, the Pershing-2 missiles could be deployed. Shaposhnikov claimed that the Russians possess information proving that their missile is already in production and can be deployed within a year. He refused to identify the source of his information but said merely that in his position he reads many reports.

Shorter Warning Time

The Soviet leaders were very worried about the potential deployment of the cruise missile. They believed that it will introduce a new dimension into the arms spiral. They pointed out that the warning time for the new missiles will be drastically reduced, saying that technical installations can break down--for example, computer errors can arise. Hitherto there has been time to use the direct telephone link with Washington to investigate whether what is being monitored on the radar screens is correct. This means will no longer be available if the new missiles are deployed. Everything will happen so quickly that there will only be time to push the button and maybe not even enough time to direct the missiles accurately toward the planned targets, the Russians said.

Steen reminded them that the SS-20 missile also has a short warning time and is aimed at targets in West Europe. He expressed the desire that the new missiles not be deployed in Europe and that the SS-20 be removed. At one point Shaposhnikov gave a little sigh and admitted that maybe it was Moscow's fault that the mood was exacerbated by the SS-20's deployment.

During the talks Steen said that the negotiating side is strengthened by contributions from the Norwegians and West Germans, and that it is important that decisions in Brussels are linked to a framework of conditions so that negotiations will be central. But he also recalled that this depends on Moscow's response. Shaposhnikov was sympathetic toward these arguments but claimed that everything changes quickly in the West and that the uncertainty surrounding the ratification of the SALT II treaty might result in the Soviet Union's being obliged to take precautions.

SOVIET ENVOY HOLDS TALKS WITH THATCHER ON AFGHANISTAN

[Excerpts] The Soviet ambassador to Britain, Mr Nikolay Lunkov, today firmly denied that Russia had invaded Afghanistan.

He emerged from 45 minutes of talks with Mrs Thatcher and Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington at 10, Downing Street, to tell reporters: "We sent some limited military contingents to Afghanistan at the request of the Afghanistan Government. This is a bi-lateral matter between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union."

At the same time, America's ambassador to Russia, Mr Thomas Watson, who has been recalled to Washington, was leaving Britain, where he broke his journey overnight.

There was a flurry of diplomatic activity in London today over the Afghanistan situation. Before Mr Lunkov's Downing Street meeting, Minister of State Mr Douglas Hurd had talks at the Foreign Office with the U.S. Ambassador Mr Kingman Brewster, to discuss Afghanistan. Later, Mr Hurd saw the Norwegian Ambassador Mr Frithjof Jacobsen, to discuss Afghanistan and the Middle East.

Mr Lunkov's visit to Downing Street was at his own request. He wanted to give Mrs Thatcher President Brezhnev's reply to her message last Saturday in which she said she was "profoundly disturbed" at events in Afghanistan.

As he left Downing Street, he described the meeting as "a serious exchange of views." He said: "The prime minister tried to defend her position, but I acted on behalf of our president and explained to her and the foreign secretary our position. I confirmed especially this fact: that we sent some limited military contingents to Afghanistan at the request of the Afghanistan Government. I categorically rejected some allegations made in this country, including by some of your colleagues in the media, about a so-called Russian invasion."

Mr Lunkov said he told the prime minister that the military force would be withdrawn from Afghanistan. When reporters asked when, Mr Lunkov said it was impossible to give a date. Asked what the figure of Soviet troops in Afghanistan was, he replied: "There is no figure."

Mr Lunkov denied that the meeting was hostile. He said: "I cannot complain. I think we have so many things in common. Both sides are interested in stability and peaceful co-existence." The ambassador said he did not think further diplomatic action was expected.

Mrs Thatcher told the ambassador of her "very serious concern" over the invasion of Afghanistan and told him she hoped there would be an early withdrawal of the Soviet troops.

LD032050 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1959 GMT 3 Jan 80 LD

[By David Healey and Chris Moncrieff, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher took a strong line with the Soviet ambassador to Britain today when he delivered the reply of Soviet leader Mr Leonid Brezhnev to her message that she was "profoundly disturbed" at the Russian intervention in Afghanistan.

And the Foreign Office is considering protest action against Russia which could involve the recall of the British ambassador to Moscow. The Soviet ambassador, Mr Nikolay Lunkov, saw Mrs Thatcher at 10 Downing Street. Mr Brezhnev's reply spoke of acts of external aggression committed against Afghanistan which led to a request from the Afghan Government on Boxing Day for Soviet help.

But Mrs Thatcher, who echoed President Carter's view that Mr Brezhnev "is not telling the facts accurately," told Mr Lunkov that she knew of no evidence of acts of aggression against Afghanistan or anything else that justified the Soviet Union's action.

The prime minister said a request for Soviet help must have come from the government of President Hafizollah Amin, who was overthrown and executed in the Soviet-backed coup. She said it was easy to reconcile this sequence of events with the assertation that the Soviet Union had done nothing to overthrow the previous Afghan Government.

Mrs Thatcher told Mr Lunkov that she was surprised at the Soviet claim that it had taken no military action against Afghanistan. She said there appeared to be considerable public evidence contradicting this claim.

Mr Lunkov denied after his talks with Mrs Thatcher that Russia had invaded Afghanistan. "We sent some limited military contingents to Afghanistan at the request of the Afghanistan Government," he said. "This is a bilateral matter between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union."

Mrs Thatcher told Mr Lunkov that she hoped the Soviet troops would be removed at a very early date. She agreed with the ambassador that "artificial complications" should not be introduced into Soviet-British relations, but added that the present grave situation had been caused by the Soviet Union's armed intervention.

Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington is to fly to Pakistan--almost certainly the week after next--for talks with the government there about the crisis over the border in Afghanistan. Among protest moves open to Britain is to follow the United States' lead and withdraw our ambassador to Moscow. The Foreign Office would not comment on the possibility, but said a number of courses of action are being considered. It appears clear that recalling the ambassador is one of these courses. The American envoy, Mr Thomas Watson, left Britain today after breaking his journey back to Washington.

FOREIGN SECRETARY CARRINGTON TO VISIT PAKISTAN 14-16 JAN

[Excerpt] Lord Carrington will visit the Pakistan capital of Islamabad from January 14 to 16. On his way to Pakistan he will stop off for talks in Turkey and Oman and possibly some other countries.

Carrington Interview

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington tonight announced he is to visit countries bordering troubletorn Afghanistan. He plans to go to Pakistan, Oman, and Turkey and "probably one or two other countries in the area," the week after next.

The object, he said on a BBC Panorama special on the crisis, was to discover the feeling in these countries and tell them of Western support.

He called the explanation given to Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher by the Soviet ambassador in London today, "totally unconvincing". The ambassador, Mr Nikolay Lunkov, said the Soviets had taken no part in the coup and they had been called in by the Afghan Government on December 26. Lord Carrington added "I don't see how anyone can believe that. It's too childish. I think we made it fairly clear that we didn't think that was a very satisfactory, convincing explanation."

Britain has already had talks about the situation with the United States, Germany, France, Italy and Canada and decided on a joint approach to the United Nations Security Council, he disclosed. The moves being considered are the cutting off of grain supplies and stopping the export of technology and the granting of cheap loans. He said it was better for the West to act together rather than individually.

His visit, he added, was essential to discover what countries in the area around Afghanistan felt. "It must be very worrying to those countries to see overnight what can happen to an independent country. I think we must consider the situation there, talk to the people concerned and come back and think about it."

LONDON PAPER CALLS FOR QUICK SOLUTION TO IRANIAN-U.S. CRISIS

[Jihad al-Khazin article: "Lessons From Afghanistan"]

[Text] Recent events in Afghsnistan must have caused shock waves in neighboring countries. Successive events in the unfortunate country point, if anything, to the danger of dealing with major powers, particularly the Soviet Union, because such powers serve only their own interests.

Pakistan probably is the neighboring country closest to events in Afghanistan because Afghan rebels operate from the border areas and consequently are dragging Islamabad into a situation in which it does not want to be involved. India, despite its gigantic size and ancient traditions, is bound to feel fear, especially because Indira Gandhi's regime was close to the Soviet Union and was followed by a regime that kept its distance from Moscow and was inclined towards Washington. Mrs Gandhi is now in a strong position but she, the present government and all Indians must have learned the hard lesson of the danger of dealing with a major power like the Soviet Union.

The Afghan lesson that the Iranian regime in Tehran must learn is that the safety of every small country lies in keeping your distance from the two superpowers and preventing them from interfering in internal affairs because such a country would be the loser in dealing with either of them.

Iran's future problem might lie with the Soviet Union and not with the United States because of its common borders with Iran and its covetousness toward Iranian oil. But the present problem with the United States, which is taking precedence over future considerations, calls for an immediate solution.

It is hoped that the revolutionary regime in Tehran will realize that it is in the interest of Iran and its people to resolve the crisis with the United States rapidly and with the least possible losses. This is because even if Iran should gain anything from the occupation of the American Embassy and the holding of hostages, it--and likewise the Third World and Muslims in general--will lose many things in return, not the least result of which will be tarnishing the reputation of Islam and invoking hatred in the West for it and for the Third World in general.

Ending the embassy crisis is not difficult because the key to the solution is in Ayatollah Khomeyni's hands. All he has to do is to choose from the solutions open to him one that will neither cause the death of the shepherd nor kill the sheep because the crisis has become prolonged and its dangers have gone beyond Iran to include the Arabs, the Muslims, and the Third World in general.

MEASURES U.S. SHOULD TAKE ON AFGHANISTAN OUTLINED

[Editorial: "Another Bus Missed?: The Things To Do"]

[Text] Much Western reaction to the Russian invasion of Afghanistan has been characterised by frivolity, complacency or futile despair. Take British newspapers, for instance. The popular papers, the DAILY MAIL excepted, have almost ignored it. Comment in the mandarin press itself merits comment. We have been invited by various august voices to regard the invasion as "defensive aggression," launched by "a frightened Soviet regime." The size of the operation "certainly indicates nervousness." Is Afghanistan a glittering prize, woth the winning? Oh, no. We are assured that it is "an anarchic nightmare," a mountain land in which Russia will be hardput to it "simply to avoid a disaster."

We are reminded that, if Russia invades Afghanistan without the slightest pretext, she thus proves that she can do the same to others: "This is not the way to win friends." Perhaps not; but, as even the TIMES concedes, "it may win influence by inspiring fear... a factor to be reckoned with but militant Islam tends to be relatively unfrightened." (Is "unfrightened" here a euphemism for foolhardy?)

Attention is drawn to the cheering possibility that Russia "has made a monumental mistake," has over-reached herself (what about "missed the bus"?). Unfortunately, we are told with a sigh, "the West cannot sit back and rely on this." What then should it do? There is "no need to rush"; we must "weigh considerations carefully," avoid being "too specific at this stage" (as if undue haste or specificity on our part were real dangers!). Meanwhile we may console ourselves with narcotic riddles: "Who will now listen with anything but derision when Soviet representatives makes speeches about sovereignty and non-intervention?" Who? Those who are mortally frightened of Russia, and their number is increasing.

In elegant defeatism of this sort there is hardly more than a hint of what may be true: that Russia knows exactly what she is about in Afghanistan and what her next moves will be. Fears indeed may be liars; but prudent statecraft dares not indiscriminately treat them so.

The greatest risk which attaches to the savage act of war against Afghanistan is that the West may lurch from complacency into defeatism overnight. We are, God knows, soft, self-indulgent and not readily stirred from the passivity of losers rationalising from defeat. By their energy and will to conquer the Russians are able to take tailors shears to the map and meet a chorus of wilting words. The deploring has to stop. Afghanistan has been invaded because in the hot peace which has replaced the cold war the Americans and their allies are taken to be feebletons. In fairness Mr Carter is sounding like a man who has been given a crash course in the nastiness of the world during the past few weeks. He wishes to respond. How should he go about it and how should his friends abroad help him and their own interests?

First, there must be a formal withdrawal from the Moscow Olympics. The whimpering of the sporting interest must be ignored in the knowledge that if such people mind withdrawal so will the Soviets. Of course they will. The Soviet Union has invested resources and advance home publicity on a public display of her standing in the world. America and Britain should stay away and get as many nations to join them as possible. If necessary a counter Olympics might be staged, but the prestige gala put on in the first place as Soviet propaganda, would resemble a Roman triumph if the limp Westerners and the affronted Moslem states trailed their banners around the imperial stadium. Absence is a matter of self-respect.

Second, Mr Carter must look at the immensely difficult problem of grain, sale of which is fine for private profit and a life link to an economy geared to missiles, tanks and exported terrorism but not to the growing of food. Mr Carter will face powerful lobbies and great talents for evasion, but surely a stiff export tariff on the entire Eastern bloc and on any intermediary caught in the act, might work as a ban might not.

Finally, if Mr Carter wishes to impress the Russians with the fact of his own arousal he can take a very simple step. He chose for his Cabinet three years ago a combination of bureaucrats and McGovernites, passing over the skilled, hard-headed realists who were to be found in the camp of Senator Henry Jackson. To turn now to men in the mould of Dr Paul Nitze--the untrusting hardheads who know the score, would spell out his purpose very clearly to the Soviets. To bring in such people with Mr James Angleton restored to control of an untramelled CIA, would be the best telegraphy imaginable.

HURRIYET REPORTS REOPENING OF HOTELS IN FAMAGUSTA

NC031607 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 30 Dec 79 p 1, 6 NC

[By correspondent Ziya Akcapar]

[Text] Nicosia--The governments of Turkey and the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus have decided to gradually reopen the Varosha area of Famagusta for business and settlement as of April. This area, which has been closed since the peace operation, has a tourist capacity of 16,000 hotel beds. Secret preparations that have been going on for some time have now been expedited.

In accordance with a decision taken in Ankara some time ago by the TFSC Government on the question of "reopening Varosha," Dr Kenan Atakol, minister of foreign affairs, tourism and defense, had written to the Greek Cypriots and the third country nationals who have tourist facilities in Varosha informing them that they had 2 months to decide when they would like to return to Varosha.

It has been learned that Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has assigned Dr. Saadettin Bilgic, deputy leader of the Justice Party, the task of finding out what problems could emerge with the reopening of Varosha and how they would be rapidly dealt with.

Dr Saadettin Bilgic, who came to Cyprus and held a series of secret talks, told HURRIYET before leaving for Ankara that it was true that Varosha was going to be reopened for settlement and business section by section. Dr Bilgic stated that the most serious problem in this respect was "water." He added that it is quite likely that the Varosha water, which originates in the Greek Cypriot sector, will be cut. This means that water for Varosha will have to be piped in from Baspinar, and this will require an investment of 80 million liras.

On the other hand, the determined stand of the Turkish and TFSC governments to go ahead with the reopening has caused panic in the Greek Cypriot administration. In a statement, Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandis told hotel owners that such an attempt ran counter to the letter and spirit of the Denktas-Kiprianou agreement.

In his statement Rolandhis said: "The Denktas administration informed the hotel owners that they could freely reopen and manage their property. This means that on one hand, it is asking those who have created Varosha to accept the results of invasion and occupation and, on the other, it is trying to deceive world opinion. The hotel owners will not return to Varosha under the laws and orders of the so-called Turkish Cypriot administration."

The TFSC authorities say that Varosha can no longer be exposed to the destruction caused by nature, and that it is its humanitarian duty to reopen these facilities for international use. They have also stated that most of the facilities were British owned and that positive answers have begun to come from these business circles.

MULTINATIONAL FIRMS READY TO RETURN TO FAMAGUSTA

NC031608 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 1 Jan 80 p 3 NC

[Ny correspondent Ziya Akcapar]

[Excerpts] Nicosia--Following the decision by the governments of Turkey and the TFSC to reopen Varosha for settlement and business, many multinational firms, including British, American, Swiss and German, have stated that they are ready to return to the island "provided Turkey gives them the necessary assurances."

Third country nationals who own installations in Varosha have stated: "If Turkey provides us with the necessary assurances, we can start repair and renovation work in 1980 and accept reservations for the 1981 season."

Dr Saadettin Bilgic, who has investigated the matter in Cyprus on behalf of Prime Minister Demirel, said: "The Demirel government does not intend to prolong the political error that has been pursued so far regarding Varosha. Varosha will definitely be reopened. An investigation of records has shown that 68 percent of the land of Varosha belongs to the Turkish Trusts Administration (Turk Vakiflar Idaresi) and to the Turkish Cypriots who possess title deeds. More than 50 percent of the facilities on this land belong to foreign organizations. The Turkish Government is prepared to provide all the necessary assurances for those firms that wish to return to their facilities and get them ready for international use." TFSC Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Atakol has said: "The foreign nations and organizations who control the vast majority of the facilities changed their attitude toward us when they realized that we were determined to reopen Varosha. We look upon Varosha as a whole and urge the Greek Cypriots and their organizations to return to their facilities as well. However, we cannot wait indefinitely. If they wish to return to Varosha under TFSC laws, they will be entitled to all the facilities, credits, aid and inventive measures available to TFSC citizens. If they give in to pressure from the Greek Cypriot administration and refuse to return, these facilities will still be reopened. The Turkish Cypriots possess the managerial ability and experience as well as the capital needed for this purpose."

ATAKOL PROTESTS GREEK CYPRIOT-BRITISH TALKS ON BASES

TA031926 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 3 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The minister of foreign affairs and defense, Mr Atakol, has again stressed the partnership right of the Turkish Cypriot community in the Republic of Cyprus and said that Britain could not conclude an agreement with the Greek Cypriots on its bases in Cyprus without the consent of the Turkish Cypriot community. He expressed the belief that the British Government knew this reality and would take action accordingly.

Mr Atakol's statement came after the Government of the Federated State had received information to the effect that in a forthcoming meeting with the British prime minister, Mrs Thatcher, the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, would discuss the question of British bases in Cyprus and that he would ask the British Government for compensation amounting to more than 75 million pounds sterling.

NONE OF PROMISED LIBYAN OIL RECEIVED IN 1979

[Text] The Government of Libya maintains a peculiar position on the question of supplying Greece with the quantities of oil agreed upon last January during the visit to the Libyan capital by Coordination Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis. Although an entire year has elapsed the relevant protocol has not yet been signed. It is reported that Libya requested that the protocol be signed immediately after the OPEC meeting in Caracas. The year 1979, however, is coming to a close and there is no signed agreement.

Authoritative circles observed that there has been no explanation of Libyan intentions on whether and what quantity of oil it is prepared to supply to Greece. In addition to this, Greece has not received a single liter of the quantity of 500,000 tons Libya had promised to deliver in 1979.

DHROSOS DISCUSSES POSSIBLE MILITARY TAKEOVER IN TURKEY

[G.N. Dhrosos commentary]

[Text] Regardless of the fact that terrorism is Turkey's most significant and difficult problem, the warning letter by the leader of Turkey's Armed Forces is somewhat strange. First, it is strange because for more than a year martial law has been in force over a very large part of Turkey, that is, the military and not the politicians are those who have undertaken to combat the wave of terrorism and to arrest and try the culprits. Second, because the large political parties--one which until a month and a half ago was in power and the other which is currently in power--have taken measures to confront terrorism. If these measures were not of a very fortuitous inspiration or if they have not produced results, it does not mean that the country's large parties sympathize or at least tolerate terrorism, or that their followers are involved in it.

After all, terrorism in Turkey has a somewhat peculiar form. It concerns a fight to the death between followers of an extremist left and a fascist, extremist right. To these opposing groups the military people have now added some Islamic circles. No one can define what these circles are, but obviously the military means the representatives of some minorities who have embraced and are trying to implement the teachings of Turkey's neighbor, the most venerable Khomeyni.

In any case, political parties, as we have said, have separated their positions and have ceased killing one another. If occasionally there is an erroneous killing or personal murder of a follower of one party or the other, it constitutes an exception. Consequently, the most logical interpretation of the generals' initiative--which is not so democratic--at this moment seems to be the following: The wave of violence and its ramifications have exhausted the patience of the Turkish Army and perhaps it is planning a more active involvement in politics; that is, an argument or an excuse is being sought to make more palatable the operation that is being planned--if it is being planned.

In any case, for some time now the army has been in a position to take power at will. It has not done so simply because it has not wanted to make the country's position internationally difficult.

MILLIYET INTERVIEW WITH FOREIGN MINISTER ERKMEN

NC281535 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 22 Dec 79 p 5 NC

[Interview granted to MILLIYET by Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen--date, place not given]

[Text] In a statement to MILLIYET, Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen said that Turkey was exerting efforts to help Iran extricate itself from this difficult situation, but he added that Turkey was compelled to comply with the UN resolution. Erkmen said: "We are on the side of international law. We have to protect the rule of law." Erkmen said he was under the impression that the attitude of the former government had created certain "doubts" about Turkey in Western minds, and added: "I do not approve of a policy which creates doubts and tries to attract the doubtful. This has to stop."

Drawing attention to the fact that full membership in the Common Market constituted a link in relations with the West, Erkmen added: "I cannot see Turkey outside the EEC framework." He futher said a decision on full membership would be taken sooner or later.

Foreign Minister Erkmen said: "The West is not a charitable organization. You cannot resolve issues by complaining about the West." Erkmen than added that from now on Turkey will abandon the policy of achieving its goals by changing sides. Stating that holding next year's NATO conference in Ankara does not present any disadvantage from a foreign policy viewpoint, Erkmen said: "We are not going to plan an attack in Ankara. Everyone knows that we are a member of NATO."

On the question of Cyprus, Erkmen stated that there is sound logic in Denktas' desire for independence and added: "At this stage we support Denktas. However, I must add that the attitude of the opposite side is leading to independence. I do not see any disadvantage in this from Turkey's point of view. Erkmen said Turkey wanted to place the issue in the proper perspective, but added that Greece would have to display the same desire. This would become clear at the negotiations which will begin shortly.

After stating that the West possessed the necessary resources which could help Turkey overcome its economic difficulties, Erkmen added: "We shall seek new credits from these sources. Credits should have continuity." Erkmen then said that Turkey in turn had a lot to accomplish if the foreign exchange bottlenecks are to be overcome.

Question: Do you believe that the West has given Turkey all the support it needed? Are you happy about it?

Answer: Organizations such as the IMF cannot be discounted. Blaming everything on others is just as complex as blaming everything on oneself. This is the wrong approach. It is an inferiority complex. I do not believe it is correct to try and justify myself by complaining that the West is not sympathetic enough toward us. The government has a duty to resolve matters, whether this is through the West or elsewhere, it is my duty to secure the understanding of the West. If this understanding is not forthcoming, I must find out the reason, for I am part of the West. There appears to be a wall in the relations with the West: this or that side of the wall, etc. These are matters of internal policy. However chopping and changing policy does not befit the life of a state. I shall seek the settlement of our problems within the framework of the Western bloc. I shall resort to organizations such as the IMF, EEC, and OECD. These are not charitable organizations. You cannot just say "give us money because we need it" and get away with it. We have to conform to certain requirements. Acting in accordance with the system established by these organizations and fulfilling our obligations toward them does not mean dependence on them. [paragraph continues]

Does borrowing money from a bank on the bank's terms mean surrendering to it? I shall comply with the requirements of these organizations and I shall meet my needs in a justified manner.

Question: Do we wish to join the Common Market as a full member just because this organization offers most of the resources for the most important of Turkey's needs?

Answer: We have joined this organization because eventually it leads to full membership. This is not a new development. We are not compelled to wait for 22 years to eliminate the economic differences which exist between us and the EEC. The Rome pact affords us the right to resort to it...naturally if the others agree. I cannot afford to see Turkey outside the EEC framework. Whether or not the EEC grants me this right is not a problem. We have to belong to a system when joining such a system. We have to take steps which will not damage our economy. This is what I purport to do. I shall join the EEC but I will not say "give me $1 billion." We must first take our place in that building.

Question: When shall we reach that stage?

Answer; I cannot say anything at this moment. But I do not think that it will take a very long time.

Question: With the Continental Shelf as the leading issue, all our differences with Greece are suspended. Do you contemplate a new initiative?

Answer: We intend to place matters in their correct perspective. But Greece must desire this too. There are many reasons why we should come to an understanding. We are neighbors. We share the same need for security. We are facing the same threat. There is a sea between us. That, too, is jointly owned. Both countries could benefit from this sea within the framework of a definite system. We must seek a settlement based on righteous principles. However, you cannot say to me "you must suffice with your own territorial waters; the islands as well as their territorial waters belong to me." I cannot accept this. I cannot shoulder this historic responsibility. But I do not contemplate imposing a settlement on Greece just because I happen to be stronger.

Question: Claims for the establishment of an independent state in Cyprus are gradually increasing. Does Ankara support these claims?

Answer: No other formula can be accepted in Cyprus except the one that would enable the two communities to live separately but in partnership. Turks need to live in a specific area. The frontiers of this area are negotiable, but the principle is not. Denktas maintains that there is no end to the negotiations, that a settlement is obstructed by the opposite side and that there is no alternative other than proclaiming independence. There is logic in his argument. But we say: "Let us try once more." The other side maintains a stiff position. It is a fact that it is not our attitude, but theirs, that is leading toward the declaration of independence. We cannot abandon Denktas. Denktas' words confirm the attitude of the Greek Cypriots.

Question: Could this not be disadvantageous from Turkey's point of view?

Answer: This is not what we want. However, I do not see any disadvantage in this.

Question: What would your attitude be, should the Turkish minority in Iran seek Ankara's support one day?

Answer: I do not like to advance views about the unknown. It is important to us that Iran should not be disintegrated. The question of the hostages should therefore be resolved as early as possible. This is an embarrassment for Iran. The United States has so far followed a reasonable, peace-loving policy. However, now there is talk about sanctions...

Question: What would Ankara's attitude be if the United Nations decides on imposing economic sanctions?

Answer: We will conform to the requirements of such a status as long as it is applicable. However, we are exerting efforts to avert the adoption of such a resolution. We are trying to prevent matters from reaching this stage. We do not at all want Iran to be confronted with such sanctions. I am doing everything in my power to secure a peaceful and dignified agreement.

Question: Don't you think there is a contradiction here? On the one hand we talk of our neighborly relations with Iran; we say we do not wish to interfere in the principle of internal affairs, while on the other hand we are preparing to cooperate with the West in implementing an approach which is bound to upset the entire economy and the domestic situation in Iran.

Answer: No, there is no contradiction. We are acting according to the requirements of international law. We are not just cooperating with the West. Is Russia Western? The establishment of the rule of law is what we are after. I wish to be a means toward this end. I wish to offer my services. Though fraught with difficulties, this is what my embassy there is trying to do. The Americans openly admit this.

Question: Would it not be a little more useful from our foreign relations standpoint if, in the face of such sensitivity shown by the Islamic world, we stood a little aloof from the West, be this within NATO or on the question of sanctions?

Answer: No. I believe that the prolongation of this situation might lead to a confrontation between the Islamic world and the West. It is possible, but I do not favor such an outcome. A country rules itself. However, there may be certain Christian countries which cherish the mentality of crusades. They should not be given a cause for action. That is why the issue must be resolved without any further delay. The world is already in a turmoil. Where would such polarization on religious grounds lead us? We are certainly Muslims. But the religion of Islam is a truth-seeking concept. Such a concept requires a settlement by peaceful means.

KREISKY DISCUSSES FOREIGN, DOMESTIC POLICY

LD041355 Paris LE FIGARO in French 21 Dec 79 pp 1-2 LD

[Report on Serge Maffert and Henri de Kergorlay undated interview in Vienna with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky: "Kreisky--A Happy Chancellor"]

[Text] We met the Austrian chancellor in his big office with deep armchairs and windows letting through subdued light in the famous Ballhausplatz from which Metternich presided over the Austrian empire for more than 50 years. Bruno Kreisky has been installed there since 1970 after becoming successively secretary of state, foreign minister and chairman of the Austrian Socialist Party.

Mr Kreisky will be 69 next month. He is a man of medium height with a big face and constantly screwed-up eyes with a penetrating gaze. He speaks French fairly well, only seldom stumbling over a word or turn of phrase.

"My personal status? It is a result of the fact that I have long been a politician. The fact that you are always there earns a certain reputation for you." This explanation given to us with a little smile by Bruno Kreisky does not seek to convince. In fact, Kreisky's personality is based on three factors--passion for foreign policy, a certain style of government and an original way of looking upon the relationship between the supreme political leader and his country's people.

As soon as foreign policy is mentioned, he obviously brightens up. He sits up and talks at great length. Our first question concerned detente. What stage has it reached following the NATO conference and the West's decision to build "Euromissiles?"

"It is sometimes necessary to restate the obvious," Bruno Kreisky explained. "Detente is a consequence of the cold war and the cold war was ended by Khrushchev. The signing of a state treaty between Austria and the four victors of World War II in 1955 was the most significant event which marked this new situation. It was the first agreement among the four since the end of the war.

"Once this problem was resolved, it was believed that it would be possible to try to resolve the German problem and some other questions. In fact, however, even though the Soviets wanted to mark the end of Stalinism, they were not prepared to say that they were willing to embark on a new policy. Therefore, in their eyes the signing of the Austrian state treaty was insufficient. From that moment, the general line of the policy pursued by the Moscow leaders became favorable to peaceful coexistence which, however, did not include ideological coexistence."

The West Has Won the Cold War

"Therefore, efforts to resolve the German problem have been useless. And a feeling of stagnation prevailed in Europe until the SPD admitted--this is a historical fact--that the entire world was beginning to get tired of the German problem, because it hindered the development of the international situation.

"As Europe developed, the attitude of Western powers changed. It was at that time, during a visit which I paid with the Austrian chancellor to Paris prior to a visit to the Soviet Union, that General De Gaulle told me: 'You can tell Moscow that the EC policy is based on a status quo in Europe.'

"The SPD understood the situation and initiated a new policy. Brandt's 'Ostpolitik' was favorably received in Moscow and the major Western powers tolerated it though not without some reservations.

"In the end, a real balance based on their 'overkill capacity' in the nuclear sphere was established between the 'superpowers.'

"It is the combination of these three factors--signing of the Austrian treaty, Ostpolitik and military balance--which has given us detente. I would like to add that detente became possible only because the West won the cold war. The West had to win this war and it did.

"It is always necessary to remember that negotiations with the USSR can succeed only if you are strong. If you are weak no result can be achieved. This became quite clear in the years which followed World War II.

"It is in this context that you must consider the decision recently adopted in Brussels to modernize European nuclear potential. It may lead to a temporary crisis, but once it is over negotiations will begin."

Question: In your view, can anything be done to lower the existing wall of distrust between the United States and the USSR?

Answer: Distrust is an important factor of world politics. However, there are two kinds of distrust--real and simulated. Distrust between the United States and the USSR is real.

Generally speaking, it must be said that Soviet policy is very realistic. The Soviet Union does not want to become involved in Europe at present because it is already deeply involved in Asia; nor do I believe that it has aggressive intentions. A big empire owes it to itself to show extreme caution. Consequently, we do not have to fear any Soviet offensive.

Naturally, the European communist parties--in France and Italy--will remain strong but we will witness the end of Eurocommunism in the coming years. This development has already started. It does not surprise me. I forecast it as long as 3 years ago. However, in the coming months we will witness a rapprochement between these European communist parties and Moscow, in the disarmament sphere, for instance.

Recognizing Palestinian Reality

Question: Why do you take such a close interest in the development of the situation in the Near East?

Answer: For a long time, and long before the oil crisis, we have been in favor of an open-door policy with respect to the Middle East. This tradition goes a long way back in our country. The school in which our diplomats were trained and which was founded by Empress Maria Theresa was called the Oriental Academy. It must also be said that we had very close and very lively relations with the Ottoman Empire for centuries.

I feel sure that the greatest danger for detente is in the Near East. In fact, there is a risk of confrontation between the two superpowers in the Gulf. I believe, however, that peace is nonetheless possible in that part of the world. [first part of answer ends]

Bruno Kreisky has repeatedly indicated his support for a negotiated settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. He received 'Arafat in July 1979.

[Answer continues] Efforts greater than ever should be made to resolve the complete deadlock which Israeli-Egyptian relations have reached. I am aware of the fact that a new government is needed in Israel. In any case, it is necessary to convince the Israelis that they should show more understanding for the Palestinian and Arab cause.

What the Palestinians now demand is that their national identity be recognized. After all, everybody has in fact the right to have a passport and to call some little place in the world his own. This is a completely rational desire and the Jews, who have been talking about putting an end to the Diaspora, should understand it. [answer ends]

However. Kreisky is involved not only in international action but also in Austria and in the government of a certainly small but highly deveolped country. His expression underwent a subtle change as soon as we broached this subject. The politician, the old militant, the old fighter was revealed to us.

[Answer] We have devised an original method of government which is, as it were, specifically Austrian--I like direct confrontation with men and problems. Every Monday, therefore, I receive trade union Chairman Anton Benya at the Chancellery for a few hours. He is an important man, the leader of an organization representing 1,600,000 people of a total of 2,700,000 wage earners. I discuss social problems or tariff conventions, for instance, with him. We do not always agree but we have now known each other for more than 15 years and in the end we always reach some understanding.

Quite recently, I spent an evening with a group of Slovene students--they were frank, infuriated and difficult, making many demands and stuffed with ideology. Such discussions with young intellectuals are not easy. They accept whatever you do for them as their due and always ask for more.

My Name Is in the Telephone Directory

But for me the main thing is always to be prepared to compare my own views with those of my fellow citizens. Anyway, my name is in the telephone directory, and people can telephone me when I am at home. And they do, especially since my personal line is open throughout the night because I expect calls from the Near East or Washington. Who wants to talk to me? It depends. There are madmen, insane people. Quite recently, a woman told me on the telephone: "I just had an inspiration. Let me meet Carter; I have something to tell him." But such cases are exceptional. Usually, families ring me up because they are faced with housing or other kinds of difficulties with which they are unable to cope. A few days ago I had two people who had been arrested by the police released. I also listened to the complaints of a worker who had invented a method for conserving energy and whose employer refused to see him. His request for a patent is now being considered.

Telephone calls start about 0700 and continue for about 1 hour--5-12 calls on average. When I leave home to go to the Chancellery I switch on an automatic answerer which says: "Bruno Kreisky is not in now but you will be able to speak to him tomorrow at such and such time."

I often receive important information on the telephone. For instance, several widows called me up one day. They gained the impression from a speech by one of my ministers that their pensions would be reduced. I set the facts in their true light and immediately informed the party and the government about this. Obviously, all this takes a lot of time and requires patience. [paragraph continues]

However, it is necessary. And I must tell you that I in fact like these talks which sometimes lead to clashes. I prefer this to applause. I do not like crowd ovations. They remind me of the past too clearly. I am thankful that people trust me, but I appreciate it when they show their confidence in a calm manner.

Discussions with my party also take a lot of my time. This is natural because it is with the party that I determine the main lines of Austrian policy. And I have always been able to avoid any conflicts during the 10 years in which we have worked together.

But even though the Austrian Socialist Party plays a major role in determining the government's orientations, I do not let officials dabble in politics. They are useful, and you cannot do without them, but governing is none of their business; it is that of politicians.

Question: Do you feel pleased, optimistic?

Answer: Things are not going badly in Austria at the moment, and the outlook for 1980 seems rather good. In fact, I am a happy chancellor. However, I am very concerned and uncertain about what the future holds in store for us. Anyway, such concern is necessary when you lead a country. I told my party members the other day: "The opposition is now nonexistent but this must not prevent us from being vigilant and self-critical. Let us shun self-satisfaction."

In any case, my uneasy temperament helps me to rule the country. It is because of it that we have been able to deal more rapidly with the crisis induced by the 1974 oil price increase. I felt that something had to be done, and we decided to make up for private investments by an increase in public spending as soon as possible. We went full steam ahead, and since 1975 we have invested the equivalent of more than Fr200 billion.

We have taken advantage of the crisis to modernize Austrian industry and make it more competitive. True, the Austrian State has run into debt but its debts are not bigger than those of most OECD countries. And it will be up to the generations which will succeed ours to deal with our debts. This will only be just. After all, our generation has already financed the country's reconstruction after the war. Our efforts have been considerable. It is only natural that our successors should assume their share of responsibility for the country's economic life.

PREMIER ANNOUNCES SUSPENSION OF AID TO AFGHANISTAN

[Text] Ottawa, Jan 4, REUTER--Prime Minister Joe Clark said Canada today suspended about three million dollars in aid to Afghanistan and would not recognize the new Kabul government which was installed with the help of Soviet troops. He also told a news conference that his government was considering whether to take economic and cultural measures against the Soviet Union following the Soviet Union's armed intervention in Afghanistan. Mr Clark said Ottawa viewed the incursion of an estimated 50,000 Soviet troops with "deep concern" and would protest the Kremlin action in a letter to President Leonid Brezhnev. He said the Soviet role in the December 27 coup that overthrew the late President Hafizullah Amin was a clear and unwarranted intervention in a civil war.

The Canadian ambassador to Moscow was being asked for advice on what measures might be taken to influence the Soviets to withdraw from Afghanistan. These might include suspension of economic co-operation and cultural exchanges, Mr Clark said. He indicated it was unlikely Canada would withdraw from the Moscow Olympics next summer because such actions would have "no practical effect" on the Kremlin position on Afghanistan.

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERS PARTIAL GRAIN SALE EMBARGO

LD051502 Montreal in Russian to the USSR 1430 GMT 5 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] Ottawa--The Canadian Government has announced that it is seriously considering the possibility of imposing a partial embargo on deliveries of grain to the Soviet Union in connection with the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan. An aide of Canadian Prime Minister Joe Clark stated that the possibility of not permitting the Soviet Union to increase grain purchases in Canada is also being considered. This was declared after the statement made by U.S. President Jimmy Carter on television, in which he addressed all the American people. In Ottawa yesterday, Flora MacDonald, Canadian secretary of state for external affairs, called the conflict in Afghanistan one of the biggest international incidents since World War II.

[Text] Ottawa, Jan 4, REUTER--Canada is giving serious consideration to a partial grain sales embargo against the Soviet Union, similar to the U.S. one announced by President Carter, an aide to Prime Minister Joe Clark said tonight. The aide, who asked not to be identified, said another option under consideration in the face of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was ensuring that Moscow was not able to increase its grain purchases from Canada.

In his televised speech in Washington tonight, President Carter said 17 million metric tons of American grain ordered by the Soviet Union would not be delivered. After consultations with other grain-exporting countries, Mr Carter said he was confident they would not replace the grain with additional shipments to the Russians. Before Mr Carter's speech, External Affairs Minister Flora MacDonald told reporters here that Canada was reviewing all its relationships with the Soviet Union. Stopping wheat shipments would be better than armed conflict, but it would have to be a joint action by all countries to be effective, she said. Prime Minister Clark said Canada suspended about three million dollars in aid to Afghanistan and would not recognize the new Soviet-backed government there.

OFFICIALS, PUBLIC REACT TO DEVELOPMENTS IN AFGHAN SITUATION

'Understanding' of SALT Vote Deferral

[Excerpts] Bonn--The Federal Government has expressed its understanding for President Carter's wish to postpone the debate on the ratification of SALT II in the U.S. Senate. Government Spokesman Gruenewald, who stated this at a press conference in Bonn today, also made it clear, however, that the Federal Government regards the Soviet-U.S. SALT agreement as particularly important for reasons of security policy. As Gruenewald put it, Bonn has repeatedly "encouraged" the United States to ratify SALT II.

Gruenewald said that Carter's move to postpone the ratification debate shows that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan must be judged as serious. On the other hand, the fact that the final vote is to be kept separate from the current confrontation shows what importance the U.S. President attaches to the SALT II agreement.

According to the government spokesman, the U.S. ambassador in Bonn has meanwhile conveyed to the Foreign Ministry Washington's views concerning sanctions in response to the Soviet military entry into Afghanistan. Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has already been in contact on this matter with Chancellor Schmidt, who is on vacation. Gruenewald declined to give any details. He said that consultations are taking place among the alliance partners.

The German ambassador in Moscow, Hans-Georg Wieck, has not yet conveyed to the Foreign Ministry in Moscow the German position on the Soviet entry into Afghanistan. Foreign Ministry Spokesman Sudhoff hinted at a press conference in Bonn today that this might be done very soon. Sudhoff declined to give any details. He merely said that a statement would be issued as soon as talks had taken place. He assumed that this will occur over the weekend.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman denied reports that the Soviet side has so far refused an appointment for Bonn's ambassador. At Wednesday's Federal Cabinet meeting Genscher clearly condemned the Soviet military action in Afghanistan and demanded that the United Nations be called in. Wieck will set out these views in Moscow and present a reply to the explanation given by the Soviet ambassador in Bonn, Semenov, concerning the elements in Afghanistan. In a surprise move before Christmas, Semenov called not at the Foreign Ministry but at the chancellor's office.

The Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee will meet in special session next Friday to hear a report from the Federal Government on developments in Afghanistan and their international consequences.

Citing the confidential nature of the recent NATO discussions on the situation in Afghanistan, the Foreign Ministry spokesman today again sidestepped questions on whether NATO Ambassador Rolf Pauls advocated at these discussions a boycott of the Olympic Games. He merely stated that no such proposal was made.

Genscher Defends U.S. Sanctions

[Text] Hamburg--The Federal Government and the opposition have once again sharply condemned the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and called for a joint stand by the Europeans with the United States.

At the Dreikoenigstreffen of the Baden-Wueritemberg FDP in Stuttgart, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the first prominent government politician to do so, has defended the sanctions against Moscow announced by the U.S. President. Genscher said that the decision Carter has taken in this difficult situation "shows his circumspection but also his determination." At the same time, Genscher called for the support of the Middle East states.

Further Genscher Remarks

[Text] Stuttgart--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and FRG foreign minister, speaking today at the end of the traditional 2-day Dreikoenigstreffen of the FDP, again sharply condemned the Soviet entry into Afghanistan. But he also indicated that there was nevertheless no alternative to the policy of detente. After this event, not only those who had hitherto been critical of NATO's decision to counterarm but also those "who now see their chance to reverse the policy of the last 10 years will have to change their opinion. We shall confidently and levelheadedly continue on our path which embodies a realistic policy of detente," the FDP chairman emphasized.

The decision by U.S. President Jimmy Carter to postpone the debate on SALT II in the American Senate, Genscher said, neither withdrew the basis from the Western alliance's arms control offer nor was it necessarily an obstacle to the actual start of negotiations on medium-range missiles. Also regarding this issue the Federal Government viewed the policy of detente as long-term and, for this reason, the West's offer remained intact.

According to Genscher, the only appropriate reply to Moscow's intervention is a common policy by the Europeans and the United States. This policy would also have to promote the interests of the Third World and insure that Africa and Asia would not lose their recently gained independence to new rulers. In connection with the demand for support to the Middle East states, Genscher suggested an investigation as to whether or not forms of cooperation could not be found similar to those which exist within the ASEAN community.

"It is not the Soviet Union--which is trying to dominate Afghanistan--who is the natural ally of the nonalined, but it is us who must be their fair partners, partners who not only respect nonalinement but see the plurality of that movement as an important factor for international stability," Genscher said.

Spokesman Foresees UN Condemnation

[Text] Bonn--Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald has affirmed the Federal Government's view that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan should be assessed by the United Nations "so that the Soviet Union knows what the community of states in the civilized world thinks about such an intervention." Gruenewald said on Radio Free Berlin on Saturday that nobody could believe that the United Nations would condone Moscow's action. "No doubt a condemnation will be forthcoming," the government spokesman said. Asked about the significance of the German-German dialog in case of a hardening of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, Gruenewald said that such a dialog would in any case "certainly not be harmful." Assuming that talks were discontinued, which was not desirable, then it would be in the interest of the Western world and of the Warsaw Pact "that not all the lines were severed at the same time, so that at least some of them were available to continue talks." Gruenewald added, however, that at this moment he did not wish to burden prematurely the intended dialog between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Chairman of GDR Council of State Erich Honecker with such questions.

Minister Rejects Olympics Boycott

ID051840 Hamburg DPA in German 1632 GMT 5 Jan 80 ID

[Text] Bonn--According to Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum, the Federal Government rejects a boycott of the Moscow Olympics as a appropriate reply to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. In an interview for WELT AM SONNTAG, the minister, who is responsible for sport, says, according to the newspaper: "It is the opinion of the Federal Government that boycotts of sporting events cannot in principle be used as a political means."

Baum (FDP) said that sport cannot solve problems whose solution is a matter for politics alone. Otherwise, there would soon be no more international sporting events.

ID042007 Hamburg DPA in German 1740 GMT 4 Jan 80 ID

[Text] Bonn--Franz Josef Strauss, Bavarian premier and CDU CSU candidate for chancellor, sees long-term dangers also for Central Europe as a result of the Soviet military campaign in Afghanistan. In an interview with DIE WELT (Saturday edition), Strauss expressed the view that only "energetic and considerable reaction by the United States and her alliance partners resulting from events in Afghanistan can induce the Soviet Union to exercise a certain restraint."

Strauss emphasized that psychological arguments are not enough. "However, in order to avoid any misunderstanding," the candidate for chancellor added, he does not have in mind a military campaign against the Soviet Union or its troops in other countries.

At the moment, Strauss sees dangers primarily for Yugoslavia, where the question as to what will happen once Tito is forced to relinquish the reins has been asked for years, and for Turkey. Their strategic importance "in view of the overall situation from Afghanistan to Yugoslavia, in view of the still open Arab-Israeli question and the difficult situation of (Egyptian President) as-Sadat, is characterized by enormous international implications." in particular, today it is again necessary "to draw the Turks closer to Europe, closer to the Atlantic alliance."

Strauss also accused the Soviet Union of seeking "to get its hands increasingly on the Middle East and Africa, thus securing for itself oil and raw materials." The USSR seeks "to increase the dependency, not to say the liability to blackmail, of the Europeans with their delicate political, economic and social systems." Strauss offered the Federal Government support for its energy and raw materials policy as well as its defense policy, in fact, "more cohesive support than is offered by the governing parties, especially the SPD."

Excerpts of the interview were prereleased to DPA.

CDU/CSU Lauds Carter Measures

ID051946 Hamburg DPA in German 1749 GMT 5 Jan 80 ID

[Text] Hamburg--According to Werner Marx, foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, it would be a good thing if Federal Chancellor Schmidt, in what Marx describes as the present difficult foreign policy situation, returned to Bonn from his Spanish holiday to state his opinion.

In a Saarland radio interview on Saturday afternoon, Marx accused Schmidt, in contrast to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, of having made no recommendation regarding action in view of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. In the interview, Marx called for greater political and military resolve by the United States and its European allies. In an assessment of the measures against the Soviet Union announced by U.S. President Jimmy Carter, Marx said that it is psychologically important for many peoples in the world for the United States to show its own strength: "It must show that it is not prepared to allow room for a further Soviet expansion." The peoples of Asia must not be brought to the state where they look towards the Soviet Union because, Marx said, "the political and psychological effects would be disastrous."

Marx called for a "demonstration of one's own power while keeping a sense of proportion." The Soviet Union must not assume that the West will accept almost anything. Here Marx described Carter's recommendation to the Senate not to ratify the SALT II treaty for the time being and not to supply technological equipment to the USSR as important. But only time will tell if this is sufficient. An edited version of the interview was prereleased to DPA by the radio station.

Afghan Students Demonstrate

[Text] Bonn--Some 1,000 Afghan citizens living in the Federal Republic demonstrated outside the Soviet Embassy in Bonn today against the entry of Soviet troops into their country. According to the police, individual demonstrators were prevented from climbing over the barrier outside the embassy. Embassy staff refused to accept a protest resolution. One of the organizers of the demonstration was the General Union of Afghan Students. The Islamic Center . Cologne has announced another demonstration for tomorrow.

Arabs Protest Soviet Action

[Excerpt] Bonn--Several thousand Arabs living in the Federal Republic demonstrated in Bonn's diplomatic quarter of Bad Godesberg on Saturday, against the entry of Soviet troops in Afghanistan. Carrying banners and chanting in unison, the demonstrators condemned the suppression of the "Islamic movement" in Afghanistan. The Muslims demanded that the Western world show solidarity with their oppressed fellow Muslims.

Numerous veiled Arab women took part in the demonstration. Many demonstrators were wearing national dress. During the procession, which was several kilometers long, they knelt for several minutes in prayer right in the middle of the street.

The demonstration was organized by the Islamic Center of Cologne and was attended by about 2,500 people, Bonn police said. The demonstrators arrived from all parts of the Federal Republic.

DW071004 Cologne Duetschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1900 GMT 6 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from Fried Wesemann commentary]

Whatever was accomplished in the past in the way of hopeful cooperation, the world is now facing an East-West confrontation. Carter's measures are no longer monitions or warnings, but steps which would be rescinded only if the other side annuls the act of violence against Afghanistan. Since this cannot be expected under any circumstances, the U.S. policy can only tighten the screws still further.

The Europeans will be reluctant to join in this funeral song for detente, yet they cannot repudiate the leading Atlantic power either. Carter's decision on the postponement of the ratification of the SALT II treaty may spell its salvation. But, if as must be expected the crisis cannot be solved, this very arms spiral will start moving on both sides--something which this treaty was to avoid.

In the boundless wake of armament by the two superpowers, the Europeans have no alternative but to stick loyally to the flag of joint defense because the policy of crisis wields a weight of its own. Its law is escalation which may be bridled but cannot be totally halted. Yielding is in the realm of possibilities only if and when the ultimate trump card has been played and all that is left is the destructive nuclear strike.

If the motive of Brezhnev's breach of confidence is the strategy of military conquest aimed at gaining access to Iranian oil and to the Indian Ocean, the West, under U.S. leadership, will have to reply by insuring its vital interests. The containment of Soviet communism, which has now been proven expansionist, becomes the supreme commandment. No communist propaganda can cover up the origin of the crisis. With its armored divisions in Afghanistan the Kremlin has exposed a policy which leaves nothing for East-West detente.

GENSCHER TO VISIT U.S. FOR 'REGULAR EXCHANGE OF VIEWS'

LD050954 Hamburg DPA in German 0920 GMT 5 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is to have talks with the American Government in Washington 20-21 January. The Foreign Office said in Bonn on Saturday that the visit serves the continuation of the regular exchange of views with the American Government and was agreed with U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance in Bonn last December. Details of the topics to be discussed were not announced.

LAMBSDORFF LEAVES FOR MIDEAST TOUR, ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS

[Excerpt] Frankfurt--Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff left Frankfurt by air this afternoon for an 8-day tour of the Middle East. The minister is to hold talks with government representatives in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates about the further development of economic relations. The situation in the international oil markets against the background of the latest OPEC conference in Caracas and the current situation in the Middle East are also scheduled for discussion.

Outlines Purpose of Visits

[Text] Osnabrueck--Despite the events in Afghanistan and Iran the Federal Republic's oil supplies are safe in the opinion of Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, at least for the next few months.

In an interview with NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG (Saturday edition) Lambsdorff said that, taking into account the adequacy of reserves, he expects this situation to continue until the end of 1980. The minister said that during his visits to the OPEC countries--Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Abu Dhabi--beginning today, he will try to insure that the direct contracts between German oil concerns and those countries are continued and perhaps extended. The Federal Republic will have to become accustomed to the idea that the trend in those oil-producing countries is to try to downplay the role of multinational oil corporations.

In this connection Lambsdorff emphasized that the events in Afghanistan have further increased the Federal Republic's interest in the stability of other Islamic countries. During his trip he will therefore discuss the new situation with the politicians concerned, assuring them of German solidarity and political support.

The minister emphasized that the producing and consumer countries ought to sit around a table to seek, within the framework of a UN conference, a common line on not only oil policy but also on an overall energy policy. The producing countries should stop plunging the entire international economic structure into "great difficulties" with their pricing policies because more and more countries are facing insoluble balance of payments problems due to energy costs. However, it is equally important for the consumer countries to responsibly use alternative energy sources, including nuclear energy, and to increasingly help the poorest of the developing countries.

An edited version of the interview was made available to DPA.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT ON USSR REJECTION OF PROPOSAL

[Excerpt] Bonn--NATO is to adhere to its offer of negotiating on the limitation of nuclear medium-range missiles in Europe despite the fact that the Soviet Union has rejected the negotiating proposal. This emerged from a statement issued by the Bonn Foreign Ministry on Sunday after the Soviets' "no" had become known in Washington.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman said that the Federal Government was informed about the Soviet reply to NATO's double decision of December presented in Washington on 3 January. The alliance will be discussing the matter soon. The spokesman added that the alliance will continue with the implementation of its December resolutions. The negotiating offer remains intact.

CDU/CSU CRITICIZES SOVIET REJECTION OF MISSILE TALKS

[Text] Bonn--Moscow's refusal to negotiate NATO's proposal for reducing medium-range missiles in Europe has been criticized by the CDU/CSU. Its defense spokesman, Willi Weiskirch, told DPA on Sunday that this proves that the Soviets have no intention of reducing their superiority in this sector. Furthermore, against the background of the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan the constant eastern peace protestations have thus been unmasked as pure hypocrisy.

Weiskirch appealed to NATO to maintain and renew its negotiating offer in the spirit of the counterarmament decision. The Western alliance should not allow Moscow to either limit its ability to act or to blackmail it into making risky advance concessions.

Those NATO member countries who are skeptical about the counterarmament decision, such as the Netherlands, ought to reconsider their attitude. Weiskirch warned the SPD that it would be foolish and dangerous if it were to follow certain groups inside the party which are against the production and deployment of new medium-range missiles in the NATO sector should arms control negotiations fail.

CARSTENS INSISTENT ON DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS

[Text] Bonn--Federal President Karl Carstens has come out in favor of adhering steadfastly to the disarmament proposals submitted to the Eastern side. "We should not be discouraged by the fact that the other side has not yet accepted these proposals," he said on Southwest German radio on Sunday. They were well-considered and excellent proposals which, if necessary, should be pursued over an extended period.

As a decisive precondition for entering into successful negotiations on arms control and disarmament, the federal president mentioned a level of defense which was such as to convince any potential opponent of the futility of attack. In this connection Carstens suggested that a joint defense concept and security policy be developed within NATO. The deadly dangers contained in the arms depots of the great powers could be countered successfully only "if we act jointly within the North Atlantic alliance." Without mentioning names Carstens added that "the action by some alliance partners seems to hold little prospect of success when compared with the unity of the opposite side."

LAMBSDORFF SAYS MARK 'CANNOT REPLACE' U.S. DOLLAR

[Text] Hamburg--The Federal Government wants the U.S. dollar to be "at long last valued according to the real strength of the U.S. economy." This remark was made by Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff in an interview today with NEUE REVUE. This would restore calm to the foreign exchange markets. There is no need for the German mark to become stronger. It is strong enough and could "certainly not replace" the dollar as an international currency. The volume of German marks is far too small. "This alone makes the German mark unsuitable for financing worldwide transactions," Lambsdorff stressed. The interview was prereleased to DPA in an edited version.

Further Comments

[Text] Bonn--Lambsdorff expects that, because of the weakness of the dollar and the recent increase in the price of gold, German earnings from exports will decline. In an interview with Deutschlandfunk Radio the minister said that international shipping and the German shipbuilding industry would also face considerable difficulties this year.

An edited version of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

GOVERNMENT DOES NOT PLAN ON TAKING SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

[Summary] The Soviet Union no doubt underestimated the reaction that their invasion of Afghanistan would provoke: Reaction has been very strong today in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Iran.

"Among the Western countries, Great Britain is considering taking sanctions against the USSR. As for the United States, they may act jointly with China: The American defense minister, Harold Brown, who is on a visit to Beijing, has called for parallel action by the two countries. On the other hand, France is not envisaging taking sanctions against the USSR, Jean Francois-Poncet has just confirmed this at the press club."

Francois-Poncet Statement

[Excerpt] France is adopting a moderate attitude to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. It condemns the Soviet intervention but will not take retaliatory measures. Jean Francois-Poncet, the minister of foreign affairs, summed this position up a short while ago on the press club program on Radio Europe One:

[Begin Francois-Poncet recording] It appears that the events which have occurred harm the comprehensive nature of detente. It is a situation whose gravity is evident. What should France's attitude be? Should it conclude from this situation that the cold war should be revived and that (?without delay) a series of initiatives, [word indistinct] of reprisals or retaliatory measures should be taken [words indistinct]?

We have always thought that detente is balanced, that it involves advantages which are reciprocal and mutual for both the parties committed to it. Consequently, we do not envisage reprisals, as you say, but we do envisage having talks with the Soviet Union which will show them that we are still deeply attached to detente, but without weakness and without complacency, in the hope that the Soviet Union will adapt its behavior (?to) demands which it has often appealed for itself. [end recording]

GISCARD D'ESTAING CONCERNED BY MIDEAST EVENTS

He is concerned, first of all, owing to the reception granted to Kurt Waldheim in Iran. His was a pitiful mission. The president called it inadmissible in a comment during this informal conversation of 1 hour which did not have the character of a press conference. It was clear that the head of state is worried by the little weight which international organizations have in today's world. He added that the snub given the UN secretary general may well turn against the Iranian people.

He is concerned also over the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Valery Giscard d'Estaing is asking himself: Was it premeditated, or did the Soviets decide to intervene only a few weeks ago owing to changes in the Afghan situation? The president seems to lean toward this second hypothesis, but he adds immediately: This does not reduce the worry.

But it is mainly the situation in the Middle East that concerns the head of state, and Valery Giscard d'Estaing did not hide from us that it was indeed this region he had in mind when he spoke on television about the possible risk of war. He is also concerned due to American-Soviet tension. Not a single word on Jimmy Carter's latest decisions but, the president notes, that without confidence detente is not possible.

And even if they do not seem so serious, the disputed issues in Europe also worry him. For the moment I do not see any hope, he said, noting, too, that a big European summit is scheduled for March to settle outstanding problems. In the head of state's diary there are two appointments this year in the two most populous countries of the world, India at the end of this month and China in October, not forgetting a journey to the Persian Gulf countries in March.

POLITICAL PARTIES CONDEMN SOVIET INVASION

UDF Statement

LD041633 Paris LE MONDE in French 4 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "UDF: A Threat to World Peace"]

[Text] The Union for French Democracy (UDF) leadership issued the following statement on Wednesday 2 January:

"The UDF learned of recent events in Afghanistan with great concern. The UDF which unites French people of all classes and opinions but who are all firmly opposed to the violation of states' sovereignty and to the use of force to install a government from outside, thinks that the situation created by the Soviet invasion is a threat to stability in Asia and to world peace. It is concerned about the Afghan people with whom France is linked by long-standing friendship and cooperation.

"The UDF reaffirms its attachment to detente which cannot be divided and should include all parts of the world. In Afghanistan, as elsewhere, peace and progress should be based on self-determination for populations and on the sovereignty of states. The UDF welcomes the consultations between the Western powers in London following the Soviet coup. It urges the French Government to maintain its attitude in consultation with the other free countries."

PS Resolution

[Unattributed report: "Executive Bureau: The USSR Is in Danger of Becoming Entrenched"]

[Text] The Socialist Party (PS) Executive Bureau adopted the following resolution at a meeting on the evening of Wednesday 2 January.

"The Soviet Union, which has already had a presence in Afghanistan for several years, has taken an additional step by making a massive military intervention in a country belonging to the nonalined movement, in order to impose a government. The USSR will increase tensions and conflicts in Asia by this intervention. Moreover, it is in danger of becoming entrenched in a bloody conflict. At a time when alarmist campaigns are growing in the West and when arms sales are rising, Moscow's decision could have serious consequences.

"The PS is opposed to any interference by a state in the affairs of another state and condemns this intervention just as it condemned U.S. interventions in Southeast Asia and in Latin America or the French Government's interventions in Africa. The PS hopes that in these circumstances all leftwing forces will show their attachment to peace and to peoples' right to determine their own future."

PCF SUPPORTS SOVIET ACTIONS; MITTERRAND REACTION

[Text] The PCF Politburo has reiterated its position on the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. This stance will not fail to increase the divergence in views of Socialists and Communists. Here is Joseph Paletou:

[Paletou] Yes, contrary to what the Socialist Party of other European communist parties such as the PCI or the PCE did, the PCF approves without the slightest reserve Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. It approves of it and also justifies it by explaining, and I quote, the Afghan people have embarked on a progressive road, and it is U.S. imperialism which is trying directly or indirectly to oppose this popular movement, end quote. This means making light of consistent proof of the hostility of the Afghan people to the Soviet armed presence in its territory. The PCF prefers to note explanations given by the Soviet Government, according to which it merely responded to the appeal made to it in accordance with the UN Charter and Soviet-Afghan friendship treaty, an appeal for aid against a rebellion supported from abroad.

This alinement with Moscow thesis is an ill omen for the meeting today between Marchais and Berlinguer, his Italian counterpart who does not accept the Soviet explanations. On the other hand, this is undoubtedly bound to create a favorable climate for the meeting which the PCF general secretary will have next week in Moscow with Mr Brezhnev.

[Paletou] Six years, to be precise, 27 July 1974. If the PCF seemed to have distanced itself to some extent from the CPSU, things have changed a lot when it is a question of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, or Vietnamese intervention in Kampuchea , or the deployment of NATO missiles.

[Announcer] Francois Mitterrand himself condemned Soviet intervention last night on Antenne-2 by saying that it was of an imperialist nature. He expressed surprise over the stance adopted by the PCF since, he said, the latter is departing increasingly from the bases on which the joint program had been signed, whose basis was the right to national independence and the right of each people to self-determination. Mr Mitterrand concluded by saying that it is henceforth up to the Socialist Party to undertake the mandate given to the entire left.

Such comment evidently provoked the acid comment by L'HUMANITE this morning which recalls that it was Francois Mitterrand himself who had declared the joint program as being foreclosed--all entitled: "Mitterrand Suffers From Amnesia." Another difference in their assessment: If the Socialist Party is concerned, as is the president of the republic, about intensified international tension, the PCF considers that Valery Giscard d'Estaing is dramatizing the international situation in order to distract attention from the real problems facing France and the French people in the hope of obtaining some sort of "sacred alliance." From here to accusing again the Socialist Party of throwing itself into the arms of the president of the republic is a short step.

PCF OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON AFGHANISTAN, RELATIONS WITH CPSU

[Interview by correspondent Didier Ades with Pierre Juquin, member of the PCF Political Bureau--live]

[Excerpts] [Question] I want to consider the position of the PCF: You are the only Western Communist Party not to have condemned the Soviet assistance to Afghanistan. Since you do not condemn it, do you by implication approve of it?

[Answer] Let us say first of all that one of the aspects of Eurocommunism, this Eurocommunism that is not dying, which is not freezing up, contrary to what we have heard, it lives, it is developing, one of the aspects of Eurocommunism is that every Communist Party is making up its mind freely, decides its own policy freedly and independently. We do not suffer the instructions, the demands or the influences of any other party. So there are situations, such as the one we are in now, where the positions of the various parties of Western Europe differ. This is the case in the question you have raised.

[Question] But you have not answered the question. I tell you, you do not condemn it. Does this mean that you approve of it?

[Answer] We are trying to understand it, and there are many elements that allow us to understand the situation.

[Question] All the same, Mr Juquin, the PCI, the PCE condemn the Soviet intervention. You have also seen the attitude of the Romanian Communist Party.

[Answer] Well, it is very circumspect.

[Question] They must have information which you do not have but you could very well have, above all after the Marchais-Berlinguer meeting.

[Answer] We are in a situation where we have neither to approve nor to condemn. We are trying to understand. And in order to understand, I refer again to our previous analysis of the situation. Georges Marchais is currently busy with international trips. This is a decision we have taken freely at our congress which was held some months ago, and Georges Marchais, with much generosity and activity, is traveling throughout the world. In recent months he has met Tito, Fidel Castro, the new president of Nicaragua, Gierek in Poland, President Chadli of Algeria twice; he has just met Berlinguer and is leaving for Moscow.

[Question] Is he preparing to be a presidential candidate?

[Answer] This has nothing to do with it. The question is that the struggle for peace is a very important struggle.

[Question] Before talking about domestic political questions, can you, Mr Juquin, mention a single point of disagreement between the PCF and Soviet diplomacy?

[Answer] Now listen, we are going to meet a delegation at the summit. Our party is going to meet a delegation at the summit in Moscow, a delegation of the CPSU. The delegations will be headed on the one side by Georges Marchais and on the other by Leonid Brezhnev. This is a visit that has not been moved forward. It has been programed for a long time. It has been prepared and what I can tell you that there are differences, and differences on important points.

[Answer] On the question of democracy under a socialist regime; and there also converging views and points of rapprochement. Maybe our views have moved closer even in this or that field over a number of years. As far as Soviet diplomacy and activity is concerned, it must be examined as a whole.

MARCHAIS TO TALK WITH BERLINGUER, THEN VISIT MOSCOW

LE MONDE: USSR INTERVENTION LOGISTICS VIEWED

ID071027 Paris LE MONDE in French 4 Jan 80 p 3 ID

[Jacques Isnard article: "The Soviet Airlift: A Military 'Excursion'"]

[Text] In addition to their two motorized divisions supported by combat aircraft, the Soviets have sent into Afghanistan one of their seven airborne divisions, most of which are mainly stationed in European Russia and which constitute elite units selected on the basis of the men's physical, moral and professional qualities and their political loyalty. This intervention force is independent of the reinforcements it could draw from the Soviet troops massed on the border with Afghanistan, comprising two other mobile divisions placed in a state of readiness and several airborne battalions mobilized specially.

The Soviets are pioneers in military parachuting and in airborne troops since the Red Army set up its first parachute corps in 1930 and in 1935 received a French mission when France wanted to set up a parachute unit. However, the Soviet Union did not take advantage of this advance. Despite the use of several detachments which met with defeat in World War II, the Soviets used their airborne troops principally as conventional ground units.

Since then the Soviet General Staff has managed to learn from its experience and take advantage of the aeronautical industry's progress in everything related to radius of action, navigation accuracy, capacity to drop heavy equipment and the assault landing of modern transport aircraft.

The real value of these Soviet intervention units on the tactical level was not really known before the invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968 and, more recently, the airborne logistical support operations in Angola (1975-1976) and Ethiopia (at the end of 1977). At the beginning of 1978, the Red Army's Berezina maneuvers in Belorussia enabled the Western military attaches invited to attend to see that the USSR is capable of dropping 1,300 paratroopers and 27 vehicles over an area 3 km long by 1 km wide in 20 minutes.

In Afghanistan, the airborne divisions involved were brought to their positions by Antonov-12 and Antonov-22 aircraft at a rate of 300 trips in 3 days using up to 7 different landing sites. Like many other foreign forces which make use of requisitioned civilian equipment to bring their transport squadrons up to complement, the Red Army can use the Aeroflot Company's aircraft and crews in its far-flung expeditions. Moreover, photographs held by the American services show that some of the Aeroflot transport aircraft have an observation window and a machine-gun post at the front and rear tips of their fuselage.

Protected From Any Air Threat

All the Soviet paratroop operations organized so far show noteworthy differences in the technical plane.

The invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 was preceded by Warsaw Pact maneuvers in Czechoslovak territory which enabled the Soviet General Staff to leave troops and equipment on the spot to welcome on 8 August the first Antonovs and the airborne forces responsible for the surprise occupation of the country. The operations in Angola and Ethiopia were carried out without any government in the states which Soviet aircraft overflew (without prior authorization) protesting this violation of their national airspace. These operations benefited the Cuban troops which the USSR uses as an expeditionary force in Africa and they seemed more like a "military excursion" or a simple logistical support airlift just like any regular or charter airline would have organized.

In Afghanistan the Soviet air transport expedition was also an "excursion" on a purely tactical level in the absence of any response from the local air defense. The airlift from the Soviet Union was never threatened and it is probable that the USSR would not undertake any large-scale airborne operation in Europe without absolute air control in the sector where the intervention was planned.

The problems start after this military "excursion." Afghanistan's mountainous and rugged terrain limits--aside from street combat in the main cities--motorized and armored maneuvers even if they are supported by an air force carrying out reconnaissance and bombardment of zones. The Soviet forces can count on reducing the proportion of the Afghan regular armed forces joining the rebels with arms and equipment but hopes of destroying the Muslim resistance in the provinces depends on different military tactics. The fighting still going on in Ogaden and Eritrea in the Horn of Africa seems to indicate that the Soviet General Staff--like the U.S. and French general staffs which were ensnared in their own foreign interventions in past decades--has not yet found the answer to the various indirect guerrilla actions.

COSSIGA, PSI'S CRAXI MEET TO DISCUSS AFGHAN, IRANIAN EVENTS

[Text] Rome, January 5 (ANSA)--Italian Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi and Premier Francesco Cossiga met yesterday for talks on the international situation.

A "PSI" communique reported that Craxi asked for information on the results achieved in international meetings and contacts of Italian Government representatives in reference to the latest developments in Afghanistan and increasingly strained international relations. In the course of the talk Craxi confirmed the "PSI's" condemnation of the Soviet military intervention in the Asian nation and backed the firm stand taken by the Italian Government as well as the need that the Soviet Union be confronted with the responsibility for the serious consequences of its act with respect to the detente process.

The "PSI" secretary also called for an "active initiative" by the Italian Government for an international effort aimed at putting a brake on mounting tensions at a time when uncontrolled situations and irrational reactions could seriously threaten peace.

The communique also said that Craxi called for renewed Italian pressure on the Iranian Government to overcome the crisis situation and secure the release of the fifty Americans held hostage since November 4 in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Cossiga assured the Socialist secretary that the Italian Government's actions are in line with the firmness and prudence required by the situation and informed him on the results of Italian initiatives on the political and diplomatic level.

PARTY LEADERS CRITICIZE SOVIET INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] Rome, January 5 (ANSA)--The Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan and its repercussions on the delicate East-West balance has all but monopolized political debate in Italy. The Italian Communist Party leadership convened last night to discuss recent Italian Government economic measures and the international situation in the wake of developments in Afghanistan and increasingly strained international relations. A communique on the meeting should be released today.

In anticipating the "PCI" document, Senator Gerardo Chiaromonte said last night that it should not only confirm the critical position on the Soviet action which already appeared in an editorial in the party paper L'UNITA, but should also stress the "gravity of the international situation and the risk of a return to cold war".

In an interview aired on television last night, "PCI" Secretary Enrico Berlinguer said that the international political situation causes "much concern" with the "Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan", the United States decision "to suspend ratification of the SALT Two treaty", along with "the serious crisis in Iran". Berlinguer said that "there are great forces in all countries that must act first of all to attenuate tensions" and that in this light "Europe can have a very important function: a function of moderation, of equilibrium and positive initiatives towards the two major powers and, more generally, towards the other countries in the world".

Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi said that "the temperature has risen to very high degrees" and that "in this moment it is necessary to prevent the situation from degenerating out of control" and that "new hot spots be prevented from appearing. Should this happen, peace would truly be in danger".

Christian Democrat Party Deputy Secretary Giovanni Galloni, the last to be interviewed on the television program, said that the country must be "vigilant and careful towards a worsening military crisis which is dangerously approaching the Mediterranean," and called for "the country's unity in solidarity (?with) the Western world against any form of aggression or expansionism which directly threatens peace and civilization in the world."

In other statements Republican Party Secretary Giovanni Spadolini said that "we are faced with the most serious crisis of the detente process" and he spoke of the "brutal violation of Afghan borders" by the Soviet Union and the West's need to "strengthen its ties of political and economic cooperation".

Liberal Party Secretary Valerio Zanone stressed "the gravity of Moscow's challenge, a new stage in the Soviet Union's manouever to tighten in a strategic vise the entire Middle East and its vital oil resources".

In other reactions to the Afghan crisis, Marco Pannella, leader of the small but vocal Radical Party polemically protested the fact that Senate Foreign Affairs Commission Chairman Giulio Andreotti failed to convene the commission for a discussion of the international situation.

The "MSI" Neofascist Party filed a motion at the lower house requesting the government to "call for an urgent convocation of the North Atlantic Council".

In Milan, the provincial secretariat of the Federated Metal Workers Union (FLM) issued a document condemning "the blatant violation of the fundamental principles of international co-existence" on the part of the Soviet Union.

PCI Statement

[Text] Rome, January 5 (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) today reiterated its condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, but also urged the Carter administration to withdraw its acts and threats of reprisal in order to avoid a further deterioration in international relations. The "PCI" statement, published by the party's press office this morning after a leadership meeting last night, also called on the Rome government, currently duty chairman of the European Economic Community (EEC), to promote an "immediate, high-level" meeting of the Nine to "propose and assert a joint European position in favor of detente and peace.

According to the "PCI", the largest communist party in the West, the Soviet intervention was a "violation of the principles of national independence and sovereignty." Recalling the resolutions of the fifteenth party congress, the statement said that it was "inadmissible" to "violate the integrity and sovereignty of states in order to support reactionary regimes" forestalling more or less hypothetical threats. At the same time, the party came out against the "measures of reprisal predisposed or proposed by the Carter administration, including the suspension of ratification of SALT-II and the request for negative changes in relations with the Soviet Union." These moves, the statement charged, "further increased the tensions already exasperated by NATO's decisions of the missiles (in Europe) rejecting negotiations."

"By taking this path, the American Government assumes heavy responsibilities. So there is full justification for the alarm expressed these days by European statesmen, various political forces and, from the height of his authority, the pope."

The statement went on to urge a "halt to this grave and rapid deterioration of international relations" in order to avoid a return to the "cold war" between the Soviet Union and the United States.

According to the statement, the most urgent task is to achieve a resumption of negotiations and agreements on arms control "in order to arrive at balanced disarmament and in the end, a ban on all nuclear weapons." In this context, the "PCI" called on the Italian and European government to move "actively and without delay" to defend "the great cause of detente and, first of all, for the resumption of Soviet-American dialogue."

Accordingly, the "PCI" urged the Rome government, "which has so far shown an attitude of passivity and acquiescence, above all within the Atlantic alliance to follow a firm line that makes no concessions to measures that may lead for further embitterments."

"In particular," the statement concluded, "the Communists propose that the Italian Government should promote an immediate, high-level meeting of the nine EEC countries to propose and assert a joint European position in favor of detente and peace."

BERLINGUER DISCUSSES POSSIBLE PCI GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION

LD041417 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 24 Dec 79 pp 1-2 LD

[U.S. report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 23 December speech in Palermo: "Prerequisites for Government of Regeneration"]

[Excerpts] Palermo--"If the Communists increase in Sicily, so will the political weight of Sicily and the entire south of Italy in national life."

Lengthy and enthusiastic applause greeting these concluding words of Comrade Enrico Berlinguer's closing speech at the 13th regional party conference at the great Politeama Theater, filled from the stalls to the balcony with comrades and citizens, many women and girls.

Many of you, Berlinguer said at the start of his speech, will certainly recall that 6 months ago, immediately after the 3 June elections and on the eve of the European parliamentary elections, I felt the need to come here to Palermo, where I spent 2 days meeting with workers and comrades at the sections and holding a rally at Politeama Square. At that time I gave an initial analysis--party critical--of the causes of our party's setback in the elections which had just taken place and said I was sure that the party would recover. This regional conference, which is now coming to an end, has shown that the party is indeed recovering in Sicily as well, as demonstrated by the many effective mass initiatives and struggles and also by the membership drive in your region.

At that time, Berlinguer continued, I also made another point. Many leaders of other parties and the majority of the press were then jubilant at the election results, which were negative for the PCI, and were thinking and saying that they would no longer have to come to terms with the Communist issue and the problem of the PCI's entry into the government. [paragraph continues]

On that occasion I expressed the belief that they were wrong, that the Communist issue would become topical again very soon; I added that our party would remain in opposition to any government solution excluding the PCI's direct participation, that the other parties were obviously free to form a government without the Communists but that, whatever form it took, it would inevitably be short-lived.

As you can see, the facts soon proved us right. On the national level the issue of the PCI's government participation is once again very topical, is being discussed in a very lively manner by the Italian Socialist Party [PSI] and is also being debated by the Christian Democratic Party [DC]. Also, the government crisis is already open in Sicily, following the PSI's withdrawal from the majority and the end of the center-left formula--an especially significant fact inasmuch as the DC is stronger here than in the rest of Italy and a very large center-left majority had existed here for 18 unbroken years. But why, we must ask ourselves, has the Communist issue resurfaced so quickly, sooner than even we could have imagined?

We have, Berlinguer said, played our part in recent months as an opposition force, proclaiming the errors committed by the national and regional governments. But at the same time we have always tried to contribute as effectively as possible to finding positive solutions to the problems that emerged--whether the problem of the evictions or of the grave decision on the "Euromissiles." We have always presented our own precise proposals, differing from, improving on and contrasting with the government's proposals and sometimes--as in the case of the university teaching measures--securing a majority behind them; and the government has had to accept our proposals or withdraw its measures.

We have therefore played our opposition role, but the government has not performed its own role: It has not governed, either in Rome--where it is unable even to get its bills passed and where it continuously displays impotence and inability--or here in Palermo. Indeed, in Sicily, despite the existence of a large government majority, everything was blocked, paralyzed, for months. It is by no means true, as the DC leaders now assert, that the PSI's exit from the majority interrupted an ongoing positive process. In fact the truth is that the Socialists' decision confirmed the intolerability of a situation of inertia and immobility and raised a decisive political issue: The Socialist comrades clearly stated that solutions which in any way reproduce those of the past can in no way be reproposed and that the PSI will be prepared to participate in a new regional government only if it includes the PCI.

So far, Berlinguer said next, it is not equally clear whether the PSI will adopt the same stance on the national plane: If this does happen the DC will have no more scope for its divisive and discriminatory maneuvers with respect to the left; it will no longer be able to avoid facing and resolving the problem of its government relationship with both working class parties, the PSI and PCI.

And if the Socialist comrades adopt a clear and unequivocal stance on this political issue, they will leave no scope either for those people within the DC who proclaim the need for a national unity policy and positive relations with the PCI--perhaps even with sincere conviction--but who do not reach the logical conclusion of the need for the PCI's full participation in the country's government. Naturally, if the others do not reach this conclusion, it will then be up to us to assess whether the conditions for our government participation exist. But meanwhile, as long as the PSI abandons its doubts regarding its option and its conduct, the DC will be deprived of any excuses and will have all its escape routes blocked. As far as we are concerned, we will not provide any excuses or escape routes. We fervently hope that the PSI will clearly do the same.

The international and domestic situation is clearly becoming increasingly grave, Berlinguer pointed out next: The fundamental problems, which for years we have been saying cannot be shelved, now appear in an even more dramatic form and with pressing force; for years we have been saying it is vital for the country to have a guaranteed new political leadership. Neither of these things has been done and the country has paid and is still paying dearly for the DC's continuous refusal to allow PCI government participation. Nevertheless, despite the stubborness of this refusal, for 2 years--from 1976 through 1978--the Communists did agree to back an experiment which created in different ways from in the past a certain degree of cooperation among the peoples and democratic forces.

I do not want to dig up now that whole period again, Berlinguer said. That experience did bear some fruit and therefore we do not repudiate it. (Berlinguer especially pointed out the most dramatic moments of that experience: the exit from the 1976 financial crisis and the "no" to those aiming at a capitulation of the democratic state during Moro's kidnaping in 1978.) But when the time came to actually initiate a policy of transformation, of striking out at certain privileges and power centers, the maneuvers, the overt sabotage, the coups de main and the erosion activity began against us. Thus any possibility of regeneration disappeared and the policy of cooperation and democratic solidarity entered a state of crisis.

At that point, as the responsible and consistent people we are, we condemned the dishonesty, withdrew our support for the government, declared any experiment of that kind closed and said: "Either government or opposition." Well, the other parties formed a government and we went into opposition, and it is now the others, the ones who mistakenly believed they could manage on their own, who are starting to express the need for a government equal to surmounting the country's crisis, and some of them are saying that what is needed is a government with our participation.

So it is not we who are asking to join the government, but they who are saying it. On the one hand, a kind of appeal for help is being addressed to us, while on the other hand, there remain the fears of the innovations which would have to be introduced if we joined the government.

I am reminding you of all this, Berlinguer said, simply so that some people--both journalists and politicians--will cease to portray matters--as they have already begun to do--as if the PCI could not wait to have some ministerial seats. This is not the case. Obviously we are and we remain convinced that a coalition government including the PCI remains the only truly valid solution for guaranteeing the country's real and effective governability, and that any other solution can only prove to be makeshift and therefore a failure; so if the hypothesis of that coalition government does make progress, we are ready to assume our responsibilities.

Why do we say we are ready? Berlinguer asked. We say this not only because we are convinced that it is consistent with the country's needs, but also because the PCI's function and very characteristics could not be safeguarded if--confronted with a solution meeting the necessary requirements sufficient for really tackling and surmounting the country's crisis--we were narrowminded and shortsighted enough to decline, thus leaving the way open, at that point, to authoritarian and rightwing solutions, which would certainly be possible. Our only concern--and this is why we are still wary--is that the new government really will meet those requirements and that they be clearly visible to the working masses and the country. This is why we say that such a government must guarantee, first, equal status for all the forces participating in it and that this participation be direct and complete and reflect the respective political weight of each force; and second, such a government must be based on a clear and specific program with a precise timetable under continuous democratic monitoring by the working masses and the country.

If, as we maintain, the difficult and dramatic situation which we are experiencing demands a policy of rigor, severity and savings, to whose success all Italians must be urged to contribute, it cannot be divorced from an equally severe action to strike out at and reduce privileges, parasitism, luxuries, wastefulness and corruption.

A government lacking these requirements could not have the authority and foundations of consensus essential for governing a country in a state of crisis such as our own. And if this were the case there would be no point in the PCI joining it.

Comrade Berlinguer devoted another part of his speech to the now dramatic energy issue, the cost and shortage of energy. Recalling the recent conclusions of the Caracas OPEC conference, the party secretary general stresses the gravity of the new situation which has come about, further impinging on an already disastrous world energy situation. With regard to the threat facing the world and which directly affects the Western industrialized countries and primarily Italy--a weak link--our government has missed two major opportunities. It has missed the opportunity to make an autonomous foreign policy initiative with respect to the Arab countries, having lacked the courage even to recognize the PLO at last and showing itself to be subordinate to the plundering policies of the multinationals and the wealthiest Western countries, led by the United States.

On the domestic level it has also missed the opportunity to promptly introduce an energy plan programming consumption in accordance with a new hierarchy and initiating the necessary efforts to find alternative sources to oil, within the framework of a policy of rigor and intelligent exploitation of resources. All that the government and some political forces have managed to show us has been the pitiable spectacle of the National Hydrocarbons Agency [ENI] scandal which--irrespective of what responsibilities emerge from the current inquiries--has already borne its poisoned fruit with the stop on the advantageous contract with Saudi Arabia--another invaluable favor to the multinationals.

These are the real, vital problems which are worrying people and which everybody should discuss, which we Communists are discussing and to which we are making a commitment, unlike those dallying with jumbles of formulas, currents and alinements. We call on the masses to struggle against, and the parties to exchange views on, these real problems, because it is on the basis of such problems that the political decisions from which valid and innovatory governments will spring must be made.

TERRORISTS KILL SICILIAN DC OFFICIAL

[Excerpt] Palermo, January 7 (ANSA)--The Christian Democratic president of Italy's region of Sicily, 44-year-old Santi Mattarella, was shot to death Sunday near his home here. Mattarella was hit six times by two gunmen who fired into the automobile he and his wife and son were riding in. The president of the region died a short time later in hospital and his wife was treated for a gunshot wound in the hand received when she grabbed her husband's head just before the killers opened fire. An anonymous telephone caller speaking to the ANSA bureau in Palermo one hour after the killing, when the news had spread through the city, claimed responsibility for the assault for the "revolutionary fascist nuclei". A short time later, another unidentified caller told the Messina, Sicily Daily, LA GAZZETTA DEL SUD, that the killing had been carried out by the "Red Brigade" urban guerrillas and yet another anonymous call to the Rome bureau of CORRIERE DELLA SERA claimed responsibility for "Prima Linea" (front line), an ultraleft terrorist organization with suspected links with the Brigade."

GOVERNMENT RECALLS AMBASSADOR FROM MOSCOW

[Text] The Portuguese Foreign Ministry has decided to recall to Lisbon for consultations the Portuguese ambassador to Moscow. An official note issued by the Presidency of the Council of Ministers and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs explains that this measure was taken in view of the fact that the Portuguese Government took cognizance with very serious concern of the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops and of the support given by the latter in the overthrow of the regular government of that country.

The official note further adds that the Portuguese Government considers itself dutybound to express its most vehement protest and to manifest its strongest condemnation of this blatant violation of international law which constitutes, without any doubt, a serious threat to international peace and security.

UN REPRESENTATIVE INTERVIEWED ON AFGHAN SITUATION

[Text] As we reported earlier, Spain's permanent ambassador to the United Nations, Jaime de Pinies, today spoke in the UN Security Council to explain Spain's stand on the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops, which had previously been announced during the Council of Ministers session in the Moncloa Palace on 29 December. About an hour ago, Madrid Radio managed to track down Mr De Pinies in New York. He gave the following exclusive interview on the Afghan problem to our editor Antonio Casado.

[Casado] We are going to play only the most interesting passages from this very long interview, from the point at which we were talking about the aspect of the affair raised by the USSR, an interested party, as to whether the USSR had invaded Afghanistan because the Government of Afghanistan itself had asked them to. This is what Jaime de Pinies said:

[Begin recording] [De Pinies] Really, it is a bit absurd to think that the Soviets are justifying themselves saying that they went in because they were called in by the Afghan Government. Really, it is nonsense insofar as the Soviet troops started to move in, and President Amin, who was killed afterward, was in fact killed when the Soviet troops were already in his country. Really, no one is going to believe that a government invites foreign troops in to be annihilated by them. It does not stand up.

All this has really created in such a sensitive region as this, so weighed down with problems and worries, it has created a really grave and tense situation. It has violated the border, territorial integrity of Afghanistan, the self-determination of Afghanistan itself. In short, if there really had been a dispute, perhaps one would have thought that they would have resorted to finding a settlement to their differences by peaceful means. The charter provides [words indistinct] for situations which compromise international peace and security. There is also a set of provisions for settling conflicts which may arise between countries by peaceful means.

Then we cannot help but recall that at the moment, at the last assembly, that is the assembly which is still in session, the USSR raised a question entitled: the inadmissibility of the policy of hegemonism in international relations. And in fact, the only thing that has happened to date is the exact opposite of what it was promising.

[Question] In short, Mr De Pinies, one can say that Spain today officially condemned the invasion of Afghanistan by the USSR?

[Answer] Well, I would say that we at the United Nations have various degrees of action. And I, in my speech, specifically spoke of the fact that my government deplores this Soviet military intervention. I think that is quite clear enough, saying that we deplore something without having to go into specific condemnations which is the job of the principle organ of the United Nations. It would be up to them to do this. We have sown the seed so that others can deduce the conclusions.

[Question] One final question from us, taking advantage of your privileged position in the international arena. This is why we ask you this: Do you believe that there are definite indications of the possibility of a World War III?

[Answer] I think, fortunately, that there are not. But the situation is grave. The situation is tense. But I frankly do not see this. That is, we cannot allow them to go on ahead, to establish positions of advantage which could lead to the absolute domination by one sector of the world or by one political or philosophical system over the other. If there is detente, let there be detente, and let us never accept the advances others may wish to impose. [end recording]

PSOE CONDEMNS USSR INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] In a press note issued early tonight, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] says: After the first days of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and while this invasion continues, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party wishes to make the following observations public:

The activities of Soviet forces on Afghan territory are condemnable from the standpoint of international law and the ethics that should govern international relations. Both of these have been deliberately violated by such acts. They are an attack on the independence of a sovereign state and on the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of the same.

The PSOE note goes on to say that the party, which has on every occasion rigidly opposed all imperialist policies wherever they may arise, believes that in the case of Afghanistan the Soviet Union was not called upon by that country's government to intervene, a government that was toppled and replaced with another at the time of the Soviet actions on which we are commenting.

The PSOE recalls that another of the basic principles of international relations, together with that of nonintervention, is that of the right of peoples to free self-determination. The Socialist Party, which has also condemned certain Western powers' scorn for this right, now does the same with regard to the Soviet Union, since it believes that, independent of any geostrategic considerations, the Afghan people's right to self-determination is being violated.

Finally, the PSOE believes that Spanish and world public opinion should become aware of the dangerous current tendencies which might lead to a cold war and that they should make every effort in their own fields to avoid this.

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERS MEASURES AGAINST USSR

[By Tom McMullan, PRESS ASSOCIATION diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Britain is now examining a series of measures that can be taken against the Soviet Union to emphasise Western annoyance at the invasion of Afghanistan, the Foreign Office indicated today. These actions, mainly in the diplomatic field, are being worked out with our North Atlantic alliance partners. They are intended to support steps taken by President Carter, such as the curtailment of grain exports to Russia.

In a statement, the Foreign Office said: "President Carter's measures represent a firm U.S. response to Soviet aggression in Afghanistan and demonstrate that East-West relations and Soviet aggression in the developing world cannot be artificially separated. "We welcome these measures and are ourselves considering urgently with our allies measures which we and they should take."

It was confirmed in Whitehall that a visit by Soviet Foreign Minister Mr Andrey Gromyko, planned for February or March, will not now take place. Officially the Soviets indicated that the dates suggested by Britain were not suitable. But in Whitehall this was seen as pre-emptive action since it was intended to make clear that Mr Gromyko would not be welcome.

A package of measures is likely to be announced in a few days. This is likely to mean curbs on ministerial and official contacts with the Soviets and a halt to any negotiations for cultural or other agreements. But, unlike the U.S. Britain does not seem to be in a position to impose major economic sanctions against the Soviet Union. And it seems that Britain is not planning to cut back on the size of Soviet representation in London.

Next week Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington starts a tour of countries now feeling particularly anxious about Soviet activities, including Saudi Arabia, it was confirmed today. The foreign secretary's tour is mainly intended to offer Western support to countries, such as Turkey and Pakistan, which may feel threatened by the Soviet action in Afghanistan. Britain is already a major arms supplier to countries like Saudi Arabia.

Lord Carrington also hopes to visit India on his tour, but this arrangement will only be confirmed after the new Indian Government is elected. Officials said today that more countries may be added to the list.

IRELAND PROTESTS USSR'S INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] Ireland tonight added its protest to Russia's move in Afghanistan. The newly appointed Irish foreign affairs minister, Mr Brian Lenihan, expressed his department's "concern" at the Soviet intervention.

A statement from Mr Lenihan said the Russian charge d'affaires in Dublin had been told that in view of the dangerous development in a sensitive region, and the serious increase in international tension which had resulted, Ireland would welcome consideration of the issue by the United Nations Security Council.

PRESS COMMENT ON AFGHANISTAN FIGHTING, SANCTIONS

TA060718 London BBC World Service in English 0600 GMT 6 Jan 80 TA

[From "Review of the British Press"]

[Excerpt] Afghanistan continues to preoccupy most national newspapers. The latest developments are covered on the front page of THE OBSERVER, THE SUNDAY TIMES and THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH. All reports talk of fighting between Soviet troops and Afghan rebels and the growing international action against the Soviet Union.

THE TELEGRAPH speaks of Afghan guerrillas hitting at Soviet troops from the mountains and says there have been heavy casualties on both sides. It quotes reports of two truckloads of bodies being removed from one scene of a fierce clash in the southwest of the country.

THE TELEGRAPH also deals with the possibility of sanctions against the Soviet Union by the British Government along with other Western nations. It says that the immediate sanctions could include the suspension of cultural relations and ministerial exchanges and a refusal by most Western nations to negotiate new agreements with the Soviet Union.

A boycott of the Olympic Games in Moscow is another possibility, but the paper points out in an editorial that although the British Government has expressed its opposition to the proposed tour of South Africa by the British Lions rugby team, it has not declared comparable official opposition to Britain's participation in the Olympic Games. It does not doubt that President Brezhnev will use the occasion for propaganda purposes.

THE TELEGRAPH concludes: What athletes and sportsmen in the free world should ask themselves now without waiting for prompting by governments is whether they truly wish to be involved in Olympic Games which exist largely for the greater glory of a brutal, totalitarian aggressor. The lure of medals and renown is strong and rightly so, but there are other, more valuable prizes at stake in 1980.

THE SUNDAY TIMES argues that the Afghan crisis and the gold panic are a dreadful omen for the 1980's. It says that the two expose the truth about the whole paralyzed Western approach to global order. It goes on: If there is any value in either development, it is that each should galvanize the non-Soviet world to action it has too long delayed. The paper says that President Carter has already begun to take the first action: economic sanctions, which are immediately available against what the paper calls a cynical Russian shift of the world balance.

THE SUNDAY TIMES also says that the Western world must do more. It must draw lines which the Kremlin would not dare cross, particularly around Pakistan and Turkey. THE SUNDAY TIMES calls for the collaborative linking of the entire non-Soviet world and the introduction of a new international reserve currency, but it acknowledges that this is a long way off. It says that the Western world must make the dollar work and it sees no reason why Britain should not now join the European monetary system. And the paper suggests that Western diplomacy must rethink its relations with the oil-producing countries and with the Islamic world in general.

IRAN SLASHES OIL SALES TO BRITISH PETROLEUM, SHELL

[Roland Bribben report: "Iran Lifts Oil Price to 30 Dollars and Cuts Sales"]

[Text] Iran has slashed the amount of oil it sells to British Petroleum [BP] and the Royal Dutch Shell group and raised the price to $30 a barrel. Details of new contracts with the two major oil groups emerged yesterday amid growing indications that spot market prices may be starting to tumble as the talk of a temporary oil glut gains added currency.

But conclusion of the deals is being criticised in United States official quarters where the contracts are seen as a weakening of Britain's support for sanctions against Iran.

BP will take 125,000 barrels of light oil a day from Iran at an average price of $30 a barrel under the terms of a contract which covers only the first nine months of this year.

Company negotiators have also agreed under pressure from Iran's state oil company to buy fuel oil products rather than crude and process an undisclosed quantity of Iranian oil in BP refineries.

The BP contract total compares with just over 365,000 barrels a day being bought from Iran at the tail end of last year and the 1,020,000 barrels a day average taken in 1978 before the revolution that rocked the oil world and BP's crude base.

Shell has been forced to settle for 95,000 barrels a day at an average price of $30 a barrel for light oil. Last year Shell was lifting 195,000 barrels a day from Iran compared with 500,000 barrels a day during the shah's reign.

The agreed price compares with the $36 a barrel Iran was demanding in early negotiations and with the $28.50 fixed during the abortive OPEC price fixing conference and $23 in the autumn.

The indicators provided by the Iran deal are predictably confused. The two companies have at least got continued access to Iranian oil--at a price--and the noises about British sanctions against Iran in support of the United States have not so far resulted in counteraction.

The deals provide little insight into future Iran production levels but suggest that the volatile leadership has dropped its price ambitions while continuing to spread its customer base and earmark more oil at spot market prices.

But a 160,000 barrel cargo of Iranian crude on offer at $38-39 a barrel in the spot market yesterday found no buyers because the price was considered too high, said Europoil, the London price monitoring service.

The loss of more oil means extra supply problems for both BP and Shell who have virtually cut out all sales to noncompany customers. BP said yesterday that it has been meeting company needs over the last few months and was still able to maintain a small number of third party deals.

It is nearing the end of negotiations for getting more oil from the British National Oil Corporation [BNOC] and Mr Howell, energy secretary, says there are some "faint indications" that BP will be able to again buy Nigerian oil following the nationalisation of its assets last year.

ROLANDHIS LODGES PROTEST WITH UN ON VAROSHA SETTLEMENT

NC041805 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 4 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Cyprus has protested to the United Nations against the intentions of the Turkish Government and the Turkish Cypriot leadership to send settlers into Varosha and has asked that necessary measures be taken to frustrate the Turkish plans.

In a protest note addressed to UN Secretary General Waldheim and handed today to the secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Galindo Pohl, Foreign Minister Rolandhis said that recent statements by the Turkish Cypriot leadership and by high-ranking officers of the Turkish Government in Ankara had made it absolutely clear that they intended to open Varosha to settlers.

Mr Rolandhis added: Denktas' often extended invitation to the Greek Cypriot hoteliers to reopen their facilities in Varosha under Turkish Cypriot administration--an invitation recently repeated by Mr Atakol--is nothing but a smokescreen that is aimed at hiding his true goal: the settlement of Varosha. The deadline given to the Greek Cypriot hoteliers for accepting the invitation as well as the farfetched argument that the hotels will be ruined due to inactivity if they are not reopened are obviously aimed at paving the way for the settlement of Varosha and at simultaneously creating a pretense for justifying such an arbitrary and illegal act.

Foreign Minister Rolandhis continued: The fact that the most recent statements by the Turkish Cypriot leadership on the matter were made immediately after Mr Cagatay's visit to Ankara and the signing of agreements between Turkey and the so-called Turkish Federated State of Cyprus is not simply a coincidence. It undoubtedly proves that the decision to settle Varosha has been taken in Ankara with the approval, if not with the encouragement and instigation, of the Turkish Government.

In the note, Mr Rolandhis refers to a statement made to the Turkish paper HURRIYET by the deputy leader of the Justice Party in Turkey, Mr Saadettin Bilgic, regarding the settlement of Varosha and its water supply, stressing that this statement not only shows Turkey's complicity but also the careful study and preparation involved in this unilateral act by the Turkish Government and the Turkish Cypriot leadership.

He pointed out that in addition to being illegal and immoral, this unilateral and arbitrary action by the Turkish side was also a flagrant violation of points five and six of the 19 May 1979 agreement on the priority given to achieving an agreement for the resettlement of Varosha by its legal inhabitants under UN auspices. In any event, stressed Rolandhis, this action does not promote good will, mutual trust and a return to normality, and will undoubtedly endanger prospects for the talks.

In this connection, he concluded, the timing of this action is indicative of the true intentions and position of the Turkish Cypriot leadership toward the talks.

PRC, PAKISTANI ENVOYS CONFER WITH ZAIMIS ON AFGHANISTAN

AT042014 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 4 Jan 80 AT

[Text] China's ambassador to Athens He Yang stressed to Deputy Foreign Minister Zaimis, whom he visited at noon, that Soviet troops must be withdrawn from Afghanistan or international peace will be in danger. The Chinese ambassador briefed the Greek side on his country's position on this issue and expressed his government's complete disapproval of the Soviet intervention.

Zaimis was also visited by Pakistani Ambassador Husain on the same issue, and was briefed on Pakistan's position. Zaimis seized the opportunity to reiterate the Greek position which opposes all foreign armed intervention that is fraught with danger for the peace and security of the area and the entire world.

PASOK DENOUNCES USSR INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

AT041445 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 4 Jan 80 p 2 AT

[Text] PASOK supports an active nonalined policy and permanently opposes the cold war blocs. The official opposition party position on the issue of the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan was expounded yesterday by Papandreou in a conversation with political editors. Papandreou added: PASOK condemns any military intervention regardless of the direction in which it is made and PASOK opposes the military intervention in Afghanistan regardless of the reasons for it.

PASOK condemns the Soviet invasion for two reasons: First of all, because the action as such constitutes an intervention, and second, because as a concrete act it endangers international peace.

Papandreou also claimed that, because of this Soviet invasion during the current particularly tense phase in the international arena, the green light is being given to the United States to intervene in a corresponding manner in the critical areas of the Persian Gulf and the Middle East.

The United States and the NATO countries have no right to accuse the USSR since for 35 years they have been violating borders, harassing people and endangering international peace. Carter cannot, Papandreou said, feign the white and innocent dove when there have been U.S. bombings of Vietnam and U.S. interventions in Chile, Guatamala and elsewhere. Neither can the Western European countries condemn the Soviet act in Afghanistan when as colonialist countries they oppressed people in the past.

With the NATO decision, which was imposed by the United States, to install missiles in Western European countries, a new cold war period began--with unforeseen consequences. The Soviet Union in turn, according to Papandreou, follows the game in which the tougher the game becomes the more it leads to Soviet intervention. With the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, Moscow has sent a "message" to the United States that it will not tolerate the U.S. expansionist influence that will jeopardize Soviet interests. There was no external danger to justify the Soviet intervention.

In conclusion, Papandreou predicted that Moscow's action may cause it immense difficulties because the Islamic countries will wage the battle for their independent course outside the two blocs and will clash with the two superpowers should they attempt to intervene. In addition, the PASOK chairman expressed the view that there had been no previous consultation between the United States and the Soviet Union regarding the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

Regarding events in Iran, Papandreou disapproved of the act of detaining foreign diplomats as hostages, and added that in Iran a profound social and economic revolution has taken place with the broad support of the masses. Thus, it concerns a true revolution which will have repercussions beyond Iran.

Scores Government Action

[Excerpt] Greece's recourse to the Security Council together with 48 other countries in order to condemn the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan caused a strong reaction late last night by leader of the official opposition Andreas Papandreou who stated that "Greece's alinement with the hawks of Western imperialism exposes the nation to innumerable dangers." Papandreou also rebuked the government for concealing its decision from the Greek people. The full text of his statement is as follows:

"The Greek Government has concealed from the Greek people the fact that it is alined to the 49 countries which have asked for the immediate convening of the Security Council to condemn the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. This is something we learned from foreign news agencies.

"The government concealed this because it lacked the courage to tell the Greek people that it is obeying U.S. instructions. How many times and on what occasions has the Greek Government demanded the convening of the Security Council because of U.S. interventions in many parts of the world?

"Greece's current alinement with the hawks of Western imperialism, who are responsible both for the Cyprus invasion and for the genocide against the Indochinese people, exposes the nation to innumerable dangers."

U.S. INITIATIVE ON KARAMANLIS-DEMIREL MEETING REPORTED

[Text] Under the pretext of predictable international tension in 1980, the United States and NATO are pressuring the Greek Government to rekindle its relations with Turkey by sweeping aside the Cyprus dialog and limiting discussions to the Aegean issues about which the Atlantic alliance is also directly interested. Through initiatives by the U.S. ambassadors in Athens and Ankara and through other consultations, a direct summit meeting between Greek Prime Minister K. Karamanlis and Turkish Prime Minister Demirel is being prepared for the first 3 months of 1980 in Bonn, or, more likely, in Brussels, with the participation of foreign ministers Rallis and Erkmen.

A well-informed foreign source in Athens has referred to the extraordinary U.S. diplomatic activity, headed by Ambassador McCloskey, which has recently developed in Athens to secure the Greek Government's green light for further movement in this direction. The same source mentions that, on the occasion of the holiday festivities, McCloskey met repeatedly with Foreign Minister Rallis and other government officials, without this being mentioned in the U.S. Embassy's information bulletin or in the regular government announcements.

In any case, the government now believes there are "encouraging" prospects for the continuation of the dialog with Turkey, without, of course, clarifying what the plan of the new talks will be.

However, there is no doubt that in the preliminary consultations, which are being held in absolute secrecy, U.S. diplomacy is playing the principal role, especially if one takes into consideration Turkish Ambassador in Athens Tezel's meeting with McCloskey on the eve of his departure for Ankara.

In more detail the reports mention that both the United States and Turkey are currently trying to separate the Cyprus question from the framework of the Greek-Turkish talks, under the pretext that, given the current reality, Cyprus is now connected to a broader international geopolitical area and consequently its problems should not be viewed only in light of the existing Greek-Turkish dispute. For this reason the talks that are being prepared in Athens and Ankara should necessarily be limited to the Aegean on the basis of the new formula which the Turks and the Americans have proposed.

Reports state that the first phase of the new preliminary plan for the talks sets forth Turkey's demand for the resolution of certain issues that they refer to as "secondary," but which contribute to the aggravation of the crisis between the two countries. These outstanding "petty differences," according to the U.S. conception, can be resolved without causing more general complications and can actually help in the smooth course of all settlements.

In the first phase, as is being stated, Greece is asked to make "technical" concessions to Turkish ships in the Western areas of that country, which are suffocating inside the limited corridors of the straits of Lesvos, Khios and Samos, with the result that often Greek territorial waters are violated and Greek patrol boats are placed on alert. In addition to a slackening of Greek naval alertness in the above areas, the Turks also demand Greek toleration in cases of Aegean air and naval exercises which essentially are approved by NATO itself.

In the preliminary plan of the talks now being formulated, it was learned that no mention is made of island continental shelves or of undersea areas, obviously for fear that this would cause the failure of the talks and the prolonged suspension of all issues.

Foreign observers in Athens who follow these behind-the-scenes diplomatic activities do not hide the Greek Government's optimism, which is now clear following the last meeting between Rallis and Erkmen and the latter's statement that Greece and Turkey should come to an understanding because they are neighbors and have common needs in the security sector.

To these statements by Erkmen foreign observers add the views of the Greek Government, which the well-known government commentator of ERT [Greek Radio and Television] analyzed in an Athens morning newspaper, an excerpt of which was also broadcast by Bonn and the BBC. Among other things, the government commentator said that "because of this state of affairs it will become necessary to have a meeting between the two prime ministers and, if we suppose that during this meeting much good faith is shown, then another step forward will have been taken.

"We do not claim--the commentator continues--that in all the points of differences we are absolutely right and the Turks absolutely wrong. It is possible that we may have to make certain concessions and it is not right to refuse to recognize Turkish rights whenever and if they are justified."

U.S. OFFICIALS ARRIVE IN ANKARA FOR DEFENSE TALKS

[Text] U.S. State Department counselor Matthew Nimetz and U.S. Defense Department Deputy Assistant Secretary James Siena arrived in Ankara today for talks regarding the signing of the new defense cooperation agreement between the United States and Turkey. Nimetz and Siena were received at Esenboga Airport by Ambassador Faruk Sahinbas, the Foreign Ministry secretary general's assistant for common security affairs.

In an airport statement, Nimetz said he was in Ankara in order to continue the talks held between the foreign ministers of the two countries in Brussels. Nimetz said that during his talks relations between Turkey and the United States would be discussed in general.

The foreign ministers of the two countries met in Brussels during the last NATO meeting, where agreement was reached on a new impetus to be given to the signing negotiations of the new defense cooperation agreement before the temporary working status of the joint defense installations in Turkey expires on 9 January. The two U.S. officials, who arrived in Ankara in line with this agreement, will begin their contacts in Ankara tomorrow. It has been announced that Nimetz and Siena are expected to stay in Ankara until 9 January. In talks to be held during this period efforts will be made to finalize the documents connected with the new defense cooperation agreement between Turkey and the United States.

OECD SECRETARY GENERAL ARRIVES IN ANKARA FOR TALKS, DEPARTS

TA041710 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Jan 80 TA

[Text] OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep has arrived in Ankara. He was received at Esenboga Airport by Foreign Ministry and Finance Ministry officials. Emile van Lennep is also the chairman of the "aid to Turkey" consortium established within the OECD. In a statement to the TRT on his arrival at Ankara airport, Van Lennep said that he would listen to the views of the new Turkish Government on continuing the productive cooperation started between Turkey and the OECD last year.

He added that Turkey's financial requirements during the new year would also be discussed during his talks in Ankara. He pointed out that it was out of the question to organize a new aid program for Turkey.

Van Lennep will be received by Prime Minister Demirel tomorrow. He will also meet Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen, State Minister Ekrem Ceyhun and the deputy under secretary of the State Planning Organization, Turgut Ozal. Van Lennep is expected to leave Turkey tomorrow evening.

[Text] OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep continued his contacts in Ankara today as well. Van Lennep met with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen at 0930. The meeting lasted for about an hour. Van Lennep called on Minister of State Ekrem Ceyhun in his office at 1030. He later met with State Planning Organization Deputy Under Secretary Turgat Ozal. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel received Van Lennep at 1130. After the meeting, which lasted for 40 minutes, Van Lennep replied to questions by TRT correspondents.

In reply to a question, Van Lennep said that there was no new approach to the relations between the OECD and Turkey but that he had been briefed by various officials on the issue of continuing the good relations established in previous years. He added that Turkey's interim financial needs were discussed during these meetings. Van Lennep, who is also the chairman of the aid to Turkey consortium established within the framework of the OECD, will meet with Erkmen again this afternoon. Demirel Cites Parliamentary Delays

In a statement to the press after the meeting, Prime Minister Demirel said that they had discussed the internal and external problems of the country. Demirel said that the government was energetically trying to insure peace in the country and to do this it was remaining on legitimate ground and working within the existing law. He pointed out that there were certain deficiencies in the existing law, that when it came to power the RPP government had said that the law was not deficient but that it had realized the existence of these deficiencies later. Demirel said:

[Begin Demirel recording] We stated at the beginning of our government declaration when we came to power how we were going to fight anarchy. We stated it at the beginning of our 100-day program as well. We said that we will try to obtain an agreement [in parliament] on the law of the state security courts and on the law of the state of emergency. The other relevant bills had already been submitted to parliament by the government before us. Our party had made the necessary contributions in the committees where the bills were debated. Consequently, we wanted those bills to be ratified as soon as possible. There was opposition to that in parliament. This opposition caused a crisis. In fact, that is what lies behind the issue of the generals' note.

There is bloodshed in the country. The parliament can no longer reject the passing of laws. I hope that these laws are passed soon and that new authority is granted to the administration and to the martial law, that is, to the legal forces of the state, in insuring public order and peace by remaining on legitimate grounds. [end recording]

Prime Minister Demirel also stated that the country was faced with economic difficulties. He said that the several measures taken would yield results, but that this was not a matter of days. He stressed that Turkey would be saved from these problems.

Answering a journalist who recalled the rumors that the generals' note might lead to the resignation of the government, Demirel said: The note has absolutely no connection with the government. It is impossible to say "you did that but you did not do that," to a government that has been in power only 30 days. Our concerned councils are continuing to assess this situation. Our General Administrative Council will convene tomorrow. What is necessary will be done. An assessment is being made.

Ecevit Calls RPP Meeting

Ecevit reiterated that Turkey was facing grave problems. He said they [he and his colleagues in the RPP] had anticipated that the way the government had been formed and its general stand would soon worsen the situation, transforming it into a serious crisis. Ecevit said this was the reason why they had warned the government with good will and in a constructive way. Ecevit noted that the government had not responded in any way to their insistent calls. He mentioned that these calls were made because it is his party's conviction that when problems and crises reach a certain dimension then party interests cannot be taken into consideration, and because of his party's sense of responsibility.

Ecevit recalled that production in Turkey was approaching a complete stop and that the economy was in a [word indistinct] stage. Noting that the people were worried about the winter and that the foreign exchange and energy bottlenecks would apparently worsen in the coming months, he said there is no indication that the government is taking realistic and efficient measures. Ecevit continued:

[Begin Ecevit recording] In the international field, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the new stand adopted by the United States have made the world crisis which is developing in our region very important from the viewpoint of our country. The circumstances and the crises we are facing make imperative the assessment of all domestic and foreign issues in an interrelated way. The sensitivity of the Turkish Armed Forces, which has become more pronounced lately, must be considered an assessment made from such a broad viewpoint.

No matter how grave our problems, the Turkish people will agree to seek solutions only within the democratic framework. I have no doubt that the Turkish Armed Forces, which are bound to democracy, agree with this stand. [end recording]

Ecevit said: Despite the present domestic and foreign realities, Prime Minister Demirel, who is the man responsible, assessed the problems and the situation from a very narrow viewpoint. He added: In his statements yesterday, the honorable prime minister said in connection with the views expressed by the Turkish Armed Forces that the letter was submitted because of the delay in passing the bills [on public order]. This shows to what degree he has simplified the problems and the crisis. This is unfortunate. Ecevit also said that his views and assessments of the latestdevelopments would be announced in detail later.

Replying to a question by a journalist, Ecevit said he was concerned about the incidents in Afghanistan from two viewpoints: First, as forceful intervention in the internal affairs of an independent state, and second, the chain repercussions such an intervention can cause in the region and the world. Ecevit added that he was concerned about the escalation of the incidents.s

[Text] The republican Senate presidentially-appointed senators group has issued a statement calling on political parties to jointly seek remedies and to jointly assume responsibility when necessary without being affected by sentimentality in order to put an end to the crisis in the country and to insure state and national unity.

The statement in connection with the group's meeting held yesterday dealing with the letter submitted to the president by the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders and with anarchy was announced today.

Noting that the incidents created by foreign sources and the domestic circles instigated by these foreign sources have dragged the country into the gravest crisis of the republic, the statement added: Our group, as it has clearly said in its previous statements, believes that a joint stand to be adopted by constitutional forces forming the state and especially by the two big political parties is a major factor in insuring the effectiveness of the legal measures to be taken against organized and armed acts of violence. The statement further said that a decision has been taken to hold talks with the leaders and administrators of political parties within the framework of these principles.

National Unity Group Statement

[Text] The republican Senate National Unity Group has issued a statement saying that the letter submitted to the president by the chief of the General Staff and the armed forces commanders would be viewed as a reasonable and a constructive step. The statement signed by the Unity Group Leader, Fahri Ozdilek, calls attention to the drawbacks of deviating from the intention and aim of the letter and adds: We believe that it will be very beneficial to view within the framework of the requirements of the constitutional system and without deviating from the aim of the assessment made by our armed forces--in accordance with their duty--in view of the grave conditions in the country and submitted through the president to the lofty parliament--the greatest representative of the national will and the center of the country's administration--with a frankness and honesty based on sincerity.

NPA Defense

[Text] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes said that the fact that the timing of the armed forces' letter coincided with the term of the current government has nothing to do with the government. Turkes noted that this government is not responsible for not enacting the desired bills.

In a press statement during the extraordinary meeting of the NAP General Administrative Council in Ankara today, Turkey said that his party considers it a national duty necessitated by the conditions of the country to support the current government. Pointing out that the Turkish Armed Forces are forced to issue a statement to the president and to the public under Turkey's current internal and external conditions, Turkes said: We do not consider the fact that the letter submitted by our armed forces coincided with the term of the new government as related to the current government. Under present conditions, we believe that it should be just the opposite. The requests made in the letter are the [word indistinct] comprised in the government program and (?supported) by our party.

Turkes noted that petty political calculations should be avoided in order to prevent Turkey from facing great dangers and to strengthen the multiparty [word indistinct] democratic system. Turkes said: We believe that the government should be supported and strengthened with the hope of sharing the honor of its victory.

Noting that all legal measures should be taken against secessionism and destructiveness and that new laws should be enacted, Turkes asked that assistance be given to the current government on these issues. Proposing that the authority and extent of martial law should be increased in accordance with the needs, Turkes expressed the necessity to hold early elections, in a bid to eliminate the discrepancy between parliamentary mathematics and the national will and to strengthen the democratic system. Referring to the coup in Afghanistan, Turkes said that this country was first seized internally and then invaded by aggressive troops and its independence was thus trampled upon.

FRENCH, ITALIAN CPS' OPINIONS ON AFGHANISTAN CITED

[Excerpt] Paris, Jan 6, REUTER--French Communists today stood alone as the only major Western European communist party supporting the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan.

French Communist leader Georges Marchais said today: "We have arrived at a different opinion on Afghanistan than that of others interviewed after returning today from talks with Italian Communist leader Enrico Berlinguer."

A statement issued by the French party's Politburo yesterday endorsed the right of all countries to ask for help from allies to prevent foreign interference.

The statement set the seal of approval on the defense of the Soviet intervention by the official party newspaper, L'HUMANITE, which has said it was a response to a call for help by Afghanistan.

Italy and Spain, the two major communist parties in Western Europe, have condemned the military intervention as a violation of the principles of independence and sovereignty.

Italy's Communist Party, the country's second-biggest political group, said today: "It is inadmissible to violate the integrity and sovereignty of states to aid reactionary regimes or to export revolution."

The Italian party's executive, in a statement on the front page of the communist newspaper L'UNITA, called for a European initiative to restore detente.

The Communist Party also opposed President Carter's retaliatory measures, including a cut in grain shipments, saying they would exacerbate tensions.

KANSAN UUTISET CRITICIZES CARTER'S POLITICAL 'HARDNESS'

LD042236 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1720 GMT 4 Jan 80 LD

[Press review: KANSAN UUTISET on Carter's Policies Regarding Afghanistan]

[Text] According to KANSAN UUTISET President Carter and his supporters have realized that the time has come to decisively improve his chances in the presidential election campaign. Carter's chances seemed rather slight a few months ago. The President was primarily accused of softness and inefficiency. Now he has decided to be hard and through hardness secure his victory in the campaign, KANSAN UUTISET remarks. According to the paper, this can be seen above all in the line of action he has chosen ragarding the Soviet Union since the Afghan conflict. This series of events is very serious and difficult in itself and it has aggravated the international situation to such a degree that no deliberate aggravation in the interests of the presidential elections is necessary, KANSAN UUTISET writes. The hard-line seems to include the recall of the ambassador from Moscow, threats not to ratify the SALT treaty, threats to stop grain deliveries and to boycott the Moscow Olympics. Carter also accuses the Soviet leader of lying. Outsiders have often found the U.S. presidential election campaigns slightly ridiculous, but this time the campaign is clearly becoming too hard, KANSAN UUTISET notes. According to the paper, it is no longer just a battle of words but something much more serious. The U.S. Navy which has long been kept on alert is on the move in the Persian Gulf and in the area of the Arabian Sea.

EC HALTS GRAIN, DAIRY SALES TO USSR

[Text] Brussels--The European Community [EC] will not for the time being export grain or dairy products to the USSR. The EC Commission made arrangements today to suspend export subsidies and licenses for grain and dairy products exports. The export of barley and wheat from EC member states to the USSR is very small. But dairy exports, particularly butter, are very high this year and are likely to exceed 100,000 tons. The suspension of export subsidies and licenses will affect future exports. It is not clear how current contracts will be handled.

The USSR will presumably be struck from the list of countries for which the EC grants export subsidies for agricultural produce. Most member states have asked the EC Commission to take this step in order to show their solidarity with the United States. Direct action concerning an export ban falls exclusively within the competence of the Commission. Its special committee for agriculture will discuss this week an EC export embargo for agricultural produce and the EC Council of Ministers will discuss it on 14 and 15 January.

Because of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the EC Commission has suspended food aid to Afghanistan effective immediately. No quantities had been fixed for the 1980 food aid program. But Afghanistan was still entitled to quantities held over from 1978 and 1979.

Further Reaction to U.S. Embargo

[Text] Brussels--The European Community currently has a surplus of some 3.5 million tons of wheat and some 2-3 million tons of barley, which is being supplied under contracts to Third World countries. This was learned from EEC sources in Brussels today after President Carter's invitation to the Western world's major grain exporters to attend a Washington conference to insure that the U.S.-imposed sanctions on grain exports are not bypassed. The EC, however, has no way of controlling grain exports by European exporters, it was emphasized.

In Brussels it is not yet known whether the EC Commission will respond to Carter's invitation or whether individual EC member states will send representatives to Washington.

KREISKY CONDEMNS USSR ROLE IN AFGHANISTAN, DISCUSSES IRAN

AU071425 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1121 GMT 8 Jan 80 AU

[Edgar Sterbens and Herbert Hutar report on Chancellor Kreisky's press conference following the Cabinet meeting in Vienna on 7 January--portions recorded]

[Summary] "The invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet forces extremely endangers the policy of coexistence and of detente between East and West that has been built up painstakingly over the past 25 years. This is the essence of what Chancellor Bruno Kreisky said about the current political situation." The chancellor assesses the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan as follows:

[Begin Kreisky recording] "I have declared clearly and plainly that, from the viewpoint of political morals, it is an invasion of a country by a foreign army which must be rejected as a matter of principle, and most sharply. No one believes these silly statements that were made repeatedly that the forces were called in to render aid. The question is who called them to his aid? When were the Afghan people able to express such a wish, and through whom? Those are the usual pretexts that were used in the past to justify such an encroachment." [end recording]

Asked whether Austria in view of the U.S.-Soviet crisis would continue to unconditionally support the policy of detente, Kreisky says:

[Begin Kreisky recording] "There is no 'unconditional yes' to the policy of detente--all we did was to welcome the policy of detente asthe policy of the past decade, and to make our contribution to it. But the policy of detente is not a policy one could pursue independently of events. Thus, if the Soviet Union, for example, is now becoming involved in a guerrilla war, then this will result in a state of tension anyhow. And if SALT II will not materialize for the time being, an element is lacking that would have led to progress in the policy of detente. And I have no idea what will happen at the Madrid conference. You see, the policy of detente is not something that depends on one's own volition--it is made possible or impossible by events. But basically the policy of detente remains desirable, it is something we need. It is only a synonym of the formerly used term coexistence. This term describes a policy, a value per se--it does not lead to a so-called permanent peace. There is no such thing as solidarity of the two superpowers in the face of world political developments, because they are both primarily guided in their policies by their own interests." [end recording]

Asked whether he agreed that the deterioration of U.S.-Soviet relations has brought the world closer to cold war once again, Kreisky says:

[Begin Kreisky recording] "Yes, rather. The climate has deteriorated so much that there is the danger of our again getting into a very cold world political climate. That need not mean cold war, but it could at any rate bring a state of increased tensions. This is safe to assume." [end recording]

In reply to the question of what these developments will mean for Austria, Kreisky states:

[Begin Kreisky recording] "To pursue a policy marked on the one hand by firmness and on the other hand by careful consideration of every step so as to make sure that not merely demonstrative steps are taken." [end recording]

"In this context Chancellor Kreisky declared that Austria would support sanctions that might be adopted by the United Nations against the USSR.

The chancellor indicated that Austria would reconsider the country's position regarding the UN Security Council votes, particularly in light of the fact that Cuba approves of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. For this reason, some thought should be given to the question of whether or not Austria should continue to vote for this country's membership in the Security Council."

AU071206 Vienna ARBEITER ZEITUNG in German 6 Jan 80 p 1 AU

[Georg Hoffmann-Ostenhof report on interview granted to ARBEITER ZEITUNG by Chancellor Kreisky in Munich--no date given]

[Text] Munich (AZ)--In view of the particularly difficult world situation at the beginning of the 1980's "the Social Democrats must keep a cool head," Chancellor Kreisky declared in an interview with ARBEITER ZEITUNG in Munich. The latest international developments have initiated a period of cooler relations. No one knows how long the cooling will last. "Thus, SALT II is dead. And what is going to happen to the Helsinki follow-up meeting to be held in Madrid?" In Kreisky's opinion, the moderate politicians in the United States who work toward a military balance are being crowded out by those who want superiority. "The European allies will go along with that policy." But the Social Democrats "must see to it that that remains a short-term disturbance in the policy of detente. A revival of the cold war cannot do Europe any good."

Commenting on the intervention of Soviet forces in Afghanistan, the chancellor said that in view of Afghanistan's borders with China, Pakistan and Iran that cannot be sealed off, this military operation is inexplicable. The Soviet Union will probably become entangled in a long guerrilla war. Kreisky draws a historical parallel with Yugoslavia at the end of the 1940's. The latest events are all the more astonishing since, on the occasion of Yugoslavia's defection, Moscow abstained from intervening because it wanted to spare its army a war in the Yugoslav mountains.

Kreisky defends the unsuccessful Tehran mission of UN Secretary General Waldheim: "It was his duty to carry out this mission. Obviously, Waldheim's good faith has been abused."

Asked whether an international commission for investigating the shah's regime, as demanded by Iranian quarters and prominent international figures, might not have a positive influence on solving the hostage affair, Kreisky replies: "Certainly there could be such a commission. I have already discussed that with Olof Palme. But such a commission would have the flaw that it would only be investigating a dictatorial regime that has already been overthrown, and not the still existing dictatorships as well." However, Kreisky would be in favor of an investigation commission if it served to improve the situation. But Kreisky remains skeptical: Before the Iranian presidential elections slated for the end of January no one in Iran will stick his neck out very far. Moreover, the situation in Iran is very involved. "There are so many forces and decisionmaking centers acting simultaneously--it is the special aspect of the revolution in Iran that no political force has emerged that can articulate a political line."

BELGIAN, DUTCH PAPERS COMMENT ON SOVIET ACTIONS IN AFGHANISTAN

LD071419 [Editorial Report LD] Brussels LE SOIR in French on 30-31 December 1979 carries on page 3 a 500-word Pol Mathil commentary on the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. After comparing this intervention with the Soviet invasions of Hungary and Czechoslovakia, Mathil points out that Afghanistan is a very different case and that the Kremlin is certainly aware of the risks involved. However, Mathil maintains that "contrary to some analyses, Afghanistan will never be a Soviet Vietnam" owing to the long-standing Soviet presence in the country, to the fact that the United States is powerless to take effective counteraction and to the "the indifference of Western opinion."

Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch on 2 January 1980 carries on page 7 a 700-word editorial on recent events in Afghanistan, describing President Carter's reaction to the Soviet intervention as "surprisingly harsh." After pointing out that the Soviet action "is in complete conflict with the principles of the detente policy agreed between President Nixon and party leader Brezhnev in 1972," the editorialist comments that "the goal of Western reaction must be to remedy the situation in such a way that the detente policy can be pursued."

FOREIGN MINISTRY ISSUES STATEMENT ON AFGHANISTAN

LD071549 Brussels LE SOIR in French 1-2 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "Condemnation by Belgium"]

[Text] The Belgian Government has been following events in Afghanistan with a keen concern, a Foreign Ministry communique states.

It has studied most attentively the explanations addressed to it by the Soviet Government and is examining them with the greatest care.

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the events in question arouse the greatest anxiety for peace and stability in the region and in the world.

The government believes that, whatever the circumstances, the Afghan people have the right to choose their own government and their own fate in complete sovereignty and without any outside interference whatsoever.

GENSCHER ADDRESSES AFGHAN CONFLICT AT FDP MEETING

DW080921 Bonn FDP PRESS SERVICE in German No. 5, 6 Jan 80 DW

[Prerelease of speech by Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP federal chairman and federal foreign minister, at a 6 January FDP party meeting in Stuttgart]

[Excerpt] The Afghanistan events have demonstrated again how far we still are from a world system in which interests are pursued with peaceful means and contradictions are overcome by negotiations.

Peace policy for us is not a propaganda formula; peace policy for us is not regionally limited. We want to have peace policy always and everywhere, and not just where the use of military means would be too risky. The Soviet Union must know that detente can develop only if it remains indivisible.

He who believes he can gain unilateral advantages through military intervention aggravates East-West relations. He will create mistrust, he will obstruct understanding and arrangements. The postponement of the ratification of the SALT II treaty by the U.S. Senate shows where that leads to.

It indicates the American President's sense of realities and his sober assessment of the situation--that he is of the opinion, as before, that the treaty will serve the national security interests of the United States and of the whole world, and that he therefore continues to strive for its ratification. The other decisions the U.S. President has made in this difficult situation also demonstrate his circumspect attitude as well as his determination. The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan violates the principles of peaceful coexistence among people, of self-determination, and of the indivisibility of detente and the nonalined attitude.

Only a joint policy by the Europeans and the United States would be in accordance with the seriousness of the situation. We will not permit any shaking of European-American solidarity. Turkey needs our help now more than ever.

Our policy must also recognize and promote the interests of the Third World. Only in such a way will it do justice to the conflict of the Soviet Union with the states of the Third World. The West must promote the independence of the states of the Third World through a clear strategy of peace and independence for a world of states which have equal rights and which are equal partners. Africa and Asia must not lose the independence they have just achieved to some new predominance.

The states of the Third World who demand the withdrawal of the Soviet Union from Afghanistan will find us at their side.

Economic aid and political cooperation must enable the states of the region to maintain their independence. The states of the European Community ought to examine whether similar forms of cooperation can be found with the states of that region as with the ASEAN states who are guarding their independence and who are facing in Southeast Asia dangers similar to those of the Middle East. The nonalined principle is involved here. It is not the Soviet Union which wants to subordinate Afghanistan to its rule, that is the natural partner of the nonalined; it is we who must be the fair partners who do not merely respect the nonalined, but who consider the plurality of that movement a significant factor of world political stability. Whoever in Africa or Asia wants to preserve his independence will find us a fair partner.

In this difficult situation our responsibility for peace will keep us from awakening emotions which would contribute to a vicious circle which, in the end, would not merely endanger but would lose peace.

Sober and responsible decisions are called for now more than ever before. Those who indulge now in dogmatism and in knowing it all, those who want to change foreign and security policies will be acting as dangerously as those who consider good conduct a political means. We will not follow those who believe that the policy that has been initiated since 1969 must be replaced by another policy now. We will not promote a relapse into cold war. We liberals have never left any doubts that a policy of peace and arrangements with the East will be possible only on the firm foundation of the European Community and the Western defense alliance. Nothing will be changed about that.

Those who hesitated when it was necessary to preserve the alliance's ability to act through defense efforts, so as to preserve the basis of our security, must change their attitude. Maybe some people have begun to ponder now, people who a month ago criticized NATO's decisions to close the arms gap.

They who see a chance now to undo the policy of the past 10 years must also change their opinion. We will continue in a self-confident way and with a cool head along our path of a realistic detente policy. We will not permit the achievements of the past 10 years to be jeopardized. They must much rather be exploited for transferring sensibility and realism to other parts of the world as well and for prompting the Soviet Union not to violate principles in other parts of the world, principles that, here in Europe, are subjects of treaties and agreements.

So it is not a matter of whether our peace policy, our policy of making arrangements and achieving understanding with the East should be continued or not. We want to do this. It is a matter of whether that policy can be implemented beyond Europe, in a worldwide way.

On 12 and 14 December 1979 the alliance, together with its decision to close the arms gap, suggested negotiations on confidence-building measures and troop reductions in Central Europe as well as on limiting nuclear medium-range arms. These negotiating offers will not become obsolete due to the Afghanistan events; they will become even more urgent if instability is also to be avoided in Europe. The postponement of the SALT II debate in the U.S. Senate does not deprive last year's arms control offer of the alliance of its basis, nor is there any reason why it ought to obstruct the actual beginning of negotiations on medium-range arms. The Federal Government did not and does not believe that there must be a necessary linkage between the SALT II ratification and the beginning of negotiations in the medium-range field. The alliance's negotiating offer on the basis of the double decision of 12 and 14 December 1979 remains a realistic basis for negotiations.

A few days ago the Soviet Union refused to negotiate with the United States on medium-range arms. We will stick doggedly to our will and our preparedness to negotiate on these and other problems.

We consider the policy of detente a long-term policy. The offer by the West remains as it is. It is a serious offer aimed at avoiding an arms race. Every day that is lost will make it more complicated.

We will do everything to achieve a balance on as low an arms level as possible. We do not want to sanction subordination for some and superiority for others; we want to create and safeguard equality. We want to create confidence.

Mistrust is the enemy of any kind of understanding. Therefore, confidence-building measures are, right now, of central significance also for arms control and disarmament.

The Soviet Union must realize that its action in Afghanistan did not help to make the suggestions it has made with regard to confidence-building measures very convincing. The Soviet Union will now be challenged particularly in this field. Predictability and foreseeability regarding the other side are prerequisites for building confidence. That calls for more openness and frankness, also in military matters.

Our military budget is open. It is discussed in public. Every other state can form an exact picture of the kind and volume of the envisaged defensive measures and the means that have been made available. I ask: Is it not time that the Warsaw Pact states also created the same degree of frankness?

NATO's decision to close the arms gap as a consequence of the Soviet arms lead has been widely discussed by all states of the Western alliance and beyond that. Nobody will be surprised, and we will have 3 to 4 years at our disposal until the first American missiles are stationed. I ask: Is it not time that the Warsaw Pact states also discussed arms decisions with equal frankness and timeliness in their own countries as well as internationally? We would have been spared much had the Soviet Union acted in its advance armament as we did with our decision to close the arms gap.

Early last year we had a stormy discussion on whether the arms of the Warsaw Pact were offensive or defensive. I hope that now, after Afghanistan, nobody will doubt any more that an offensive use was also considered. That discussion was dominated very much by arms technology considerations and comparisons of strength. These and other criteria, however, are only consequences of the basic military doctrines. They must become the subject of West-East discussions.

The Western defense strategy is mapped out in order to preserve peace through deterrence and, in case of war, to prevent the success of an aggression through foward defense. That doctrine is the standard of our defense efforts. I ask: Is it not time for the Warsaw Pact states to make their doctrine and their military efforts the subject of similar public discussions and standards?

Arms exports are such things that endanger world peace. It is a first-rate peace task to curtail them and make them more open and controllable wherever they take place. I back the statement of an African statesman who said that Africa does not need guns but tractors. I ask: Is it not time also for the Warsaw Pact states to attribute more significance to supplying peaceful tools to the Third World? I ask the entire community of states: Is it not time to set up an arms export and arms import register with the United Nations where all arms exports and imports must be reported? This could be the first step toward a worldwide restrictive arms export policy.

Afghanistan shows how important the principle of the indivisibility of detente and of worldwide creation of confidence is. It goes to show that it is not enough to envisage confidence-building measures just for 250 kilometers along the Soviet Western Border.

What we need is an airtight system of confidence-building measures to create security against surprise attacks, against attacks without warning. But what we need above all is the will of all those taking part in the detente process to preserve peace, not only in a particular region but on a worldwide basis.

We do not want any zones of influence. We do not want to impose our form of government and society on anybody. What we want is for the states of the Third World to develop in a way they deem appropriate, in a way allowing them to retain their national and religious identity.

Our strategy of independence must not make itself the henchman of decayed systems nor the sympathizer of racial discrimination. This is why we support the British efforts toward an independent Zimbabwe-Rhodesia in which the races can live side by side with equal rights. We want the peaceful solution of conflicts in Africa and not racial strife. We want a comprehensive peace solution in the Middle East which will guarantee Israel's right to exist and which will make it possible for the Palestinian people to exercise their right to self-determination. We call on all parties involved to make intensified efforts, in view of the challenge of Afghanistan, toward a comprehensive solution of conflicts with the participation of the Palestinians.

Shortsided policy today may well jeopardize the security and independence of the peoples of this region on a long-term basis. Hence, this is the time for a realistic policy of peace by all.

On the threshold of the new decade we feel more clearly than ever that peace needs to be preserved anew and secured daily. Nothing can be achieved without peace. This is particularly true for our highly armed continent. Europe, which has so often been the theater of wars, from which so many wars have emanated, must become a continent of peace, a continent which does not export conflicts, ideologies and arms but peace, stability and help. If we had our way, the eighties would become a decade of arms control and disarmament. This requires, however, that the Soviet Union and its allies cooperate in this effort.

At this point we must remind the Soviet Union and its allies of their responsibility. Our people have learned their historical lesson. We want peace, not only in our country but all over the world.

Being a man whose heart keeps beating in and for his central German home country, I say that nobody would suffer more from a relapse into cold war than would the German people who are forced to live in two states.

We ask the citizens of our country to work with us for peace, for peace within and without, for social justice, for tolerance, and for freedom.

We do not approach the voters with material promises, yet we guarantee courage for freedom, courage for responsibility.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN, OTHER OFFICIALS COMMENT ON AFGHANISTAN

LD071800 Hamburg DPA in German 1547 GMT 7 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Federal Government supports U.S. countermeasures against Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. But, in view of the current NATO consultations, the government remains cautious about the possible extent of its participation in such sanctions. Political observers believe that the Bonn government is trying to harmonize its loyalty as an ally of the U.S. with its special interests in continuing the policy of detente.

Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald told the press in Bonn today that, as seen today, there is no reason to change the policy of detente. He referred to statements to this effect made by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at an FPD meeting yesterday and criticized comments by CDU/CSU politicians which suggest disunity in the opposition camp.

Genscher today briefed CDU Foreign Affairs Spokesman Werner Marx, CSU politician Richard Jaeger and FDP defense expert Juergen Moelleman about the situation in Afghanistan. Marx considers a "radical change" in the Federal Government's detente policy is necessary. CDU Deputy Elmar Pieroth called on the government to practice "active loyalty as an ally" in regard to Washington's countermeasures to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

SPD Vice Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski described Moscow's action in Afghanistan as a "serious event". In an article in the SPD weekly VORWAERTS he said, however, that nothing would be more harmful than "ill-considered excitement or hectic response".

Government Spokesman Gruenewald said that the offer to negotiate on arms limitation, made by NATO at its December meeting in Brussels, would be maintained in spite of adverse reaction from Moscow. "The offer stands," he said.

Strauss Interview

DW071132 Bonn DIE WELT in German 5/6 Jan 80 pp 1-2 DW

[Manfred Schell interview with Franz Josef Strauss, CSU chairman, CDU/CSU chancellor candidate and Bavarian minister president--date, place not given]

[Text] WELT: Mr Minister President, in your speech during the Bundestag budget debate you drew attention, as in past years, to the developing crisis in Afghanistan. Did you have information already at that time about the escalation in Afghanistan?

Strauss: For years I have been drawing attention in my speeches, articles and interviews to the three areas of world politics where storms brew: the Far East, Latin America and the Middle East, from the northern border of Afghanistan down to southern Africa. In these areas of crisis, in particular, developments come to pass which are of a veritable tragic, fateful significance for the economic and military security of Europe, including especially the FRG. Afghanistan represents an important geostrategic position. Afghanistan is the bridge from the Soviet Union to Iran. Through the occupation of Afghanistan, Iran has been largely encircled by the Soviet Union. Afghanistan constitutes a step forward in the direction of the Indian Ocean. The distance from the south of Afghanistan to the Indian Ocean is a mere 500 kilometers. Pakistan is being pressured, and Turkey is a very troubled country anyway.

WELT: What is Moscow's principal goal?

Strauss: The Soviet Union wants to, and will increasingly lay its hands on the Middle East and Africa because it thereby insures oil and raw material sources for itself. It even wants to intensify the dependence, not to mention the susceptibility to blackmail, of the Europeans with their delicate political, economic and social systems. But I am used to people reacting to such warnings with laughter, abuse and irony instead of thinking about my being right. This is probably not attributable to my own personality but to the fact that my political analysis of world policies, my assessment of the strategy of the Soviet Union and my forecasts do not fit into the wishful landscape conjured up by Brandt as well as by Schmidt, with the support of the SPD and FDP, for the purpose of deceiving the citizens.

WELT: What can Bonn do in the situation that has now emerged?

Strauss: Granted, the Federal Republic is not the center of the world, yet a consolidated European policy which is also a policy of solidarity with the United States cannot materialize without the FRG's politically farsighted leadership toward the stabilization of conditions and for the prevention of even worse damage. It is a pity that the chancellor does not come up with any other ideas than to have a television team flown to Mallorca with an air force plane so that he could insert into his meaningless New Year's speech the passage about his being concerned because of the situation in Afghanistan. Behind a barricade of words of attack against the policy of the Soviet Union, the federal foreign minister, too, avows the unchanged continuation of detente policy, as if nothing had happened.

WELT: What do you advise?

Strauss: I have never advocated a ponderous opinion with respect to the question of whether the Soviet armament is dangerous or not, but I have said: 1. The intentions of the Soviet Union are not aimed at a third world war. 2. The Soviet potential is dangerous and allows all military options. 3. The long-term strategic goals of the Soviet Union as the continuer of grand Russian imperialism command the greatest of care.

Why do people refuse to listen to me? What I said about detente policy was this: Detente policy must not lead to political neutrality and the paralysis of defense readiness. Detente policy is geographically indivisible. But it was the chancellor who, at the time, deemed detente policy geographically divisible in his well-known smart representation of detente policy which, however, bypassed the facts as usual. You cannot pursue detente policy in Europe and imperialist policy of conquest and neocolonialist policy of exploitation in the Middle East and in Africa.

WELT: Does the situation make it compulsory for Bonn to make a serious attempt at commiting all parties to a jointly supported foreign and security policy?

Strauss: If you ask me about a common stance of the parties, then I will be the last man to oppose joint responsibility; by the same token, however, I shall be one of the last people who, considering the experiences gained, continues to believe that a real common platform can still be achieved with the SPD/FDP and the incumbent government which they support--unless they are prepared to bid farewell to the illusory components of Ostpolitik, the treacherous illusions of detente policy and the sham tunes of a false peace policy. I am for genuine detente policy, for real peace policy. After all, you cannot change reality by means of an imagination running wild. A common platform is desirable, yet is is possible only if they are prepared again to pursue a policy based on historical experience and fact-oriented commonsense.

WELT: Reportedly, people in Bonn are pondering the question of whether an all-party government is necessary.

Strauss: I do not think that an all-party government could cope with the tasks now confronting us, either by itself or for itself. As the opposition, we are prepared to support the Federal Government's energy, raw material and security policies in a more cohesive way than the government parties, above all the SPD, are doing. This requires, however, that the chancellor come down to reality.

WELT: As a reaction, the U.S. President has stopped SALT II for the time being. Do you deem this decision appropriate?

Strauss: This is a very interesting development. Unlike the Federal Government, I have exercised complete abstention in this respect. I do not think it is the task of a German politician to give the U.S. Government of the U.S. Senate advice in favor of the ratification of SALT II. The people responsible for U.S. policy themselves must know that. If I were a U.S. senator I would know indeed how I should vote.

So far, however, official Washington as well as official Bonn have represented the situation in such a way that SALT II is a great advantage for the security of the United States and its allies and that SALT II is a compromise which has been carefully negotiated, which is balanced and which does not put anybody at a disadvantage. Though I am not convinced of the correctness of this representation, I use it as a basis. If Mr Carter now threatens the procrastination of ratification and perhaps even the rejection of ratification, then under the laws of logic this ought to be a bad thing for the Russians. But here the reckoning no longer pans out somehow. Either SALT is for mutual interest--then there is no reason to change the attitude toward SALT II--or SALT is primarily in the interest of the Soviet Union--in which case the proscrastination or even the end of SALT II would have to be judged differently from that which has been represented to us so far. But maybe the U.S. President's changed approach to SALT II must be seen in connection with his recent statement that he assesses the Soviet Union differently than he did before. The question, however, is: Can or may an American President who is responsible not only for the security of the United States but also for peace and security in the whole world afford to make such a wrong assessment that he then has to correct because of an event which was quite foreseeeable?

WELT: Consideration is being given in the United States to lifting the arms embargo against China....

Strauss: I do not know how far-reaching the U.S. arms embargo against China is. I believe, however, that after the establishment of full diplomatic relations and the integration of the People's Republic of China into a joint peace and security policy, such an embargo does not make sense any more.

WELT: Would the military strengthening of China serve the interests of the West in the present situation?

Strauss: I believe that nobody intends to set up a military alliance between the West and China; it would not make any sense. But the People's Republic of China must also be in a position to defend itself with conventional arms. The People's Republic of China has a certain task to observe in the other hemisphere of the world, namely maintaining a military balance as well as peace. I believe that in this sense the People's Republic of China could perform a useful function. That function would not serve getting equal with the Soviet Union, but the stability of peace and the avoidance of setting up regional hegemonies.

WELT: Mr Minister President, what do you think of boycotting the Olympic Games in Moscow?

Strauss: Reading the report about this confirms my doubts about the capability for critical thinking on the part of many people who report and comment on this. So far nothing has happened except the German NATO ambassador, an expereinced diplomat, obviously mentioned such a step as a possible psychological reaction--naturally with political aftereffects. The speech that was given in a confidential circle was the ambassador's personal contribution, a contribution that must be taken seriously. But it is simply not permissible to conclude in a general way the the Federal Government suggested boycotting the Olympic Games in Moscow. If I were the federal chancellor, I would agree with every joint stance of the West, even if I personally were of a different opinion. But I do not believe that boycotting the Olympic Games in Moscow would stop the power policy of the Soviet Union.

WELT: So you don't think much of it?

Strauss: I recall a long talk I had about 4 weeks prior to the Warsaw Pact troops' invasion of Prague with the then U.S. Secretary of State Rusk in the State Department on the occasion of my financial negotiations in Washington. At the time the talks were taking place, we knew that the military preparations for an action against Czechoslovakia had been concluded. But nobody knew whether the military preparations were supposed to be the stage for exerting pressure and for creating some intimidation, or whether they would really develop into military action. Mr Rusk told me that the Russians must decide: If they make an invasion, they will get Czechoslovakia under control again. But they would run the risk of touching off the scorn of world public opinion and of damaging their reputation in the world. I told him--and I am saying this for the first time in public--that the Soviet Union was probably confronting a decision to either face the wrath and protest of world opinion, or the dissolution of its imperium from the inside through Dubcek's Stalinism. I said further: Facing the choice between maintaining the imperium, including the GDR and its function as a clamp with regard to Poland and Czechoslovakia, and concern for world opinion, I believe that the Kremlim will decide in favor of maintaining its imperium without caring a bit for the opinion of the world. By the way, the decision was not that dramatic at all, because a few months after the invasion of Prague that action was forgotten, and 1 year later Willy Brandt, Herbert Wehner, Helmut Schmidt and Egon Bahr were pursuing a German Ostpolitik that in the end amounted to compliance with the Karlsbad demands of the communist parties headed by the CPSU. In other words, the demands dictated by Soviet policy vis-a-vis the Federal Republic were fulfilled step by step. One ought to ponder how much all that has contributed to encouraging psychologically Soviet expansion in the Middle East and Africa, and how much that facilitated it politically and supported it technically.

WELT: The Soviet military action caused particular concern in Yugoslavia. Do you see dangers for Yugoslavia and in the long run also for Central Europe?

Strauss: Yes, without any doubt. One must see the overall picture: humiliation of the Americans by the fanatic occupiers of the Tehran embassy; disregard of the big power America by the Khomeyni regime; the recklessness with which Brezhnev invaded Afghanistan while stressing his peace and detente policy; the strategic aims of the Soviet Union to come closer to the "warm seas" and getting a stronger foothold in the Mediterranean area than before.

We have been asking ourselves for years in public and in various circles what would happen when Tito has to relinquish his rule over Yugoslavia. I believe that only an energetic, tangible reaction by the United States of America and its alliance partners as a consequence of the events in Afghanistan could make the Soviet Union maintain some restraint. However--and I stress it again--nothing will be achieved with psychological arguments alone. According to the law the Soviet Union adheres to, it will always give the highest priority to the law of its power, unless certain circumstances make it advisable not to apply that priority in every case.

WELT: You mentioned an energetic and tangible reaction by the West. What might that be like?

Strauss: I would give an answer only if I were holding a responsible position in the circle of those who make the decisions. In order to eliminate every misunderstanding I would say the following: I do not mean military action, be it against the Soviet Union or its troops outside the Soviet Union.

WELT: Mr Minister President, are you concerned by developments in Turkey, a NATO country?

Strauss: In my speech at the conference of NATO parliamentarians in Lisbon in late November 1978, I warned against developments in the Mediterranean area. Naturally, Iran, the hotbed of insecurity, and the new Russian power branch in Kabul exerts influence on neighboring Turkey, whose strategic significance is of particular worldwide significance in view of the overall situation including Afghanistan as well as Yugoslavia, in view of the unsolved Arab-Israeli problem and the difficult situation of As-Sadat. It is now particularly important to bring the Turks closer again to Europe and the Atlantic entity. But even the most concerned and benevolent policy of the Americans and the Europeans cannot be a substitute for Turkish domestic policy.

WELT: One last question: It is customary in the United States that in an election campaign the President and his political challenger discuss important issues involving national interests. Has such a connection existed in the past days between Mallorca and Munich?

Strauss: No. But since Helmut Schmidt considers himself the greatest of all living statesmen, the calling of conferences--such as the great nuclear council and the crisis staff--for him means the securing of his own position and the projection of his image rather than the working out of grave decisions. If all works out fine, he claims the laurels. If it does not, he wants to have scapegoats who are involved in the joint error. Naturally, I am prepared to talk with Helmut Schmidt at any time.

SPD Representative

DW071030 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1200 GMT 5 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from reporter Kemper interview with Peter Corterier, SPD Bundestag deputy and member of the Bundestag Foreign Policy Committee; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The tenor of many statements indicates that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is threatening the policy of detente. What are the interests of the Federal Republic in this situation?

[Answer] The interests of the Federal Government demand that all possible sanctions must be examined together with the allies and particularly with the United States. Such an event cannot remain unanswered, an event that is a grave violation of the people's right of self-determination, a grave intervention in the internal affairs of a sovereign state, an intervention that can upset the whole balance in the Asiatic area. Second, a great worldwide conflict must be avoided between the East and the West which could develop from this situation.

[Question] What must the Western side do to turn the Soviet action into a political defeat for the Soviet Union?

[Answer] We must discuss with the states of that region how to avoid the future involvement of such states as, for example, Pakistan, Iran or others, and how one could prompt the Soviet Union to withdraw from Afghanistan.

[Question] The U.S. President postponed the ratification of SALT II as some sort of countermeasure. Does it make sense as a means of sanction to postpone a treaty that would serve not merely Soviet but also Western interests? Would that not mean cutting off one's own nose?

[Answer] I do not consider it so much a countermeasure. At the moment, the psychological climate does not exist for a ratification of the treaty by the U.S. Senate after the attack on Kampuchea that was launched with Soviet support, after dubious action by the Soviet Union in Iran and now after the invasion in Afghanistan.

I can only point out that the U.S. President clearly said he believes in the treaty as before and that he plans to submit it for ratification at a later and more promising date. I think we should not have the illusion of being able to punish the Soviet Union by tearing up such a treaty. The survival of man is involved, which means that our own interests are also involved. We, as the Federal Republic and as an ally, ought to press for ratification at some later date.

[Question] You believe in SALT II? You still consider the treaty to be desirable?

[Answer] That is right, because SALT II is a necessary prerequisite for further arms control negotiations that are of particular interest to us Europeans and to us Germans, namely SALT III. The Vienna MBFR talks also hang together somehow with SALT II.

[Question] Do you see the danger--because you just mentioned MBFR--that the Vienna talks and the CSCE followup conference in Madrid could suffer from the present situation?

[Answer] The danger is naturally quite obvious. Yet I believe that we must try to continue these negotiations. Since you just mentioned CSCE, the establishment of so-called confidence-building measures is involved, such as the announcement of more movements of troops in order not to surprise the other side. I believe that Afghanistan showed how particularly important it would be to achieve such an agreement.

[Question] The Federal Republic is particularly interested in detente policy simply for geographic reasons. Consequently, the end of detente policy or a violation of detente policy must hurt the Federal Republic particularly. That is only logical. Has the era of detente policy come to an end because Soviet troops have invaded Afghanistan?

[Answer] No, I believe that making such a statement would be gross exaggeration. But it is clear that detente policy has suffered a great setback. It is now a matter of not turning that setback into a catastrophe for this policy. It is a matter of limiting this conflict and of trying to make the Soviet Union give in and of promoting the policy of detente in due time, particularly in the field of arms.

[Question] And you think this will be possible?

[Answer] I hope it will be possible again in the not too distant future.

LE FIGARO ASSESSES IMPLICATIONS OF AFGHAN INVASION FOR USSR

LD041655 Paris LE FIGARO in French 2 Jan 80 pp 1,5 LD

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Risks for the USSR"]

[Text] Judging from certain signs, it would be possible to reach the conclusion that everything has changed suddenly in the international sphere. The Soviet Union has now become the subject of general censure. Iran, which too many observers who were either panic-stricken or inclined to oversimplify matters believed to be unavoidably toppling over into the communist camp, has also condemned it. Even the students watching over the American hostages have stigmatized both Moscow and Washington in the same breath....

Certain analysts are already pondering the possibility of a broad change of front: Provided the problem of hostages can be resolved through negotiations, events in Afghanistan could enable the United States to reestablish its influence in several countries in the region, something which it has patiently been trying to achieve, and make the Islamic states adopt an essentially anti-Soviet attitude. Even Iran could gradually embark on this path, as it already seemed to be preparing to do last summer....

In fact, all oversimplified or exaggerated analyses of Soviet successes or setbacks and American disasters or counterattacks are equally absurd and, as always, it is more advisable to assess things cooly.

The Soviet Union had to face up to three problems simultaneously--ratification of the SALT II agreement by the American Congress which is of great importance to the Soviet Union because it would enable it to limit its efforts in the arms sphere which represent a terrible burden for its economy, whose potential is limited; Iran, where it had an opportunity to destroy American influence, and, furthermore, undermine the West's position in the region; and Afghanistan, whose incorporation into the communist camp dates from the February 1978 revolution but whose regime was confronted with large-scale military resistance.

Soviet diplomacy could apparently maneuver between SALT agreements and Iran without unduly jeopardizing its various objectives. By allowing the UN Security Council to adopt American resolutions it facilitated the ratification of the SALT agreements while its chances of a certain political and economic penetration in Tehran were increasing as a result of a continuous deterioration of U.S.-Iranian relations. However, the Afghanistan affair has suddenly endangered these quiet and hopeful plans.

The fact is that despite the aid which it had been receiving from the start, the Kabul regime was on the verge of collapse and only a sufficiently strong military intervention could improve the situation. As already mentioned, since February 1978 the Soviets saw Afghanistan not as a distant and precarious ally with an uncertain future which they should perhaps be prepared to lose (like Guinea and Somalia, for example) but as an integral part of their camp. They reacted accordingly, using we know what methods, and believing--probably rightly--that in this kind of situation you must either "go whole hog," as they say, or resign yourself to losing.

However, what they risked was losing all the rest--the SALT agreements, whose ratification the Americans, who are determined to counterattack in all spheres could delay for a very long period of time; Iran, where the anti-Soviet reaction could either match or exceed any anti-American feelings; and the entire Arab-Muslim Near East, where hostility toward the Soviet Union has always been latent and occasionally dominant. Therefore, assuming that the Soviet Union could not act in any different way if it wanted to keep Afghanistan in its camp, what it had to do was to assess the possible consequences of its action and face up to them.

One thing is certain--its relations with the United States are and will be one of its main, perhaps its chief, concerns. The Soviet leaders realize that the present phase is only a phase. Once it is over, it will still be necessary to deal as before and as always with the problems connected with the Moscow-Washington dialog, especially with the problem of arms control. Therefore, it is necessary to plan for the future and insure that nothing irreparable jeopardizes it and that, in particular, nothing jeopardizes the ratification of the SALT II agreement even if this ratification has to be postponed.

The Soviet Union must also limit any reactions to the Afghanistan affair. It can rely on the passing of time to achieve this--the subject will probably no longer be mentioned in a few weeks' or months' time, provided no new event occurs. In practice, this presupposes a stabilization of the situation on the borders between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Moscow believes that the latter is faced with too many internal difficulties and that its regime is too fragile to allow it to risk any serious complications by supporting an Afghan rebellion which would this time be confronted with the Russian Army itself. But above all, it should be realized that the American reaction has been understood as a stabilization guarantee. In fact, Mr Brzezinski stated in a "hawkish" tone and manner that America would not tolerate any threat against Pakistan. A quite clear "signal" seems to have been given in this way--do not interfere with Pakistan and we will no longer bother about Afghanistan. Was this what was really meant? At any rate, the Soviet Union has reason to believe that this was the statement's import.

In view of this, the Soviet Union can try to continue to play its game in Iran by letting relations between Washington and Tehran deteriorate and by taking advantage of the situation as far as possible in the field. Henceforth, however, the rules of the game will be more precise and strict. If the problem of hostages is not resolved by next week, the USSR will have to veto the sanctions proposed by the United States in order to erase the effects of the Afghanistan coup from the Iranians' minds. This would undoubtedly lead to a serious deterioration in its relations with Washington and to a postponement of the ratification of the SALT agreements for a long time. Refraining from using its power of veto while offering Iran aid through economic assistance or even arms supplies remains a possible but increasingly difficult option.

This means that the Soviet Union still can either win or lose. It can also be afraid of losing everything in the event of a change of regime or policy in Tehran and of the ratification of the SALT agreements being definitely jeopardized. Or it could partly win by increasing its influence in Iran to a certain extent and by obtaining the ratification of the SALT agreements at a later stage.

Therefore, nothing can be taken for granted and, like almost always in politics, the Soviet Union has neither definitively lost nor decidedly gained--it is now engaged in a contest with the United States in that part of the world like two stags confronting each other whose antlers have been entangled.

LE MONDE VIEWS FRENCH POSITION ON UN SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

[Maruice Delarue article: "The United States Hopes To Obtain From the Security Council an Embargo on Arms and Sophisticated Civilian Equipment"]

[Excerpt] A White House official said on Thursday 27 December that the United States has high hopes of obtaining the nine votes necessary for limited sanctions against Iran at the UN Security Council meeting without the USSR using its veto. According to the CBS Television Network Mr Carter has discussed the matter with several leaders allied to the United States as well as with Mr Brezhnev and the Chinese leaders. Washington will apparently only request an embargo on supplies of arms, munitions, military spare parts and sophisticated civilian equipment (computers, communications equipment) aside from equipment for the oil industry. This list would not pose too many problems for countries, which like France, do not want to oppose the Iranian revolution but are anxious to condemn the seizure of hostages. In any case since all Iranian arms are American nobody could easily replace the United States for "after-sale service."

At Thursday's Cabinet meeting Mr Giscard d'Estaing said: "France, which from the start recognized the reality of the Iranian revolution, will support the international community's efforts to obtain the release of the hostages still being held in Iran contrary to the UN Security Council's decisions and the unanimous decision of the International Court of Justice."

The French Position

By making this statement the president of the republic wants to point out: 1--That France will not pass judgment on the Iranian revolution--the Iranian people have the right to do what they want in their own country; but 2--That France condemns the seizure of hostages and the violation of international law in detaining diplomats; unless diplomatic immunity is respected no international relations are possible. Consequently, France would not support a unilateral intervention against Iran but will support sanctions taken by the United Nations. In other words, if France is to support these sanctions, they must have the support of a majority of the Security Council which implies that they must be moderate and limited in scope.

This is a subtle position but does not look fundamentally different from that of the other Europeans. However, it is a delicate position since France, together with Britain, is a permanent member of the Security Council and, hence, has to vote. It is also a difficult position which requires discretion since France still has major interests and several hundred nationals in Iran. (Before Christmas and New Year--when many families returned to France--1,138 French nationals were in Iran in addition to 1,900 West Germans, 1,750 Italians, and 480 Britons). Furthermore, the Tehran government has apparently shown an interest in reviving trade with France.

PCI'S INGRAO: SOVIET INVASION NO WAY TO COMBAT IMPERIALISM

[Text] Rome, January 7 (ANSA)--One of Italian Communism's most prestigious leaders, Pietro Ingrao, said that the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan was not the way to combat to imperialism since it only imbued the policy of rearmament and war with renewed vigor.

Ingrao, who resigned as house speaker to resume active life in the leftwing ranks of the party, said that he criticized the invasion on three basic fronts:

-1) The people's right to freely choose their own path.
-2) Revolution as not importable through foreign interference.
-3) Defense of world peace.

Immediately after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan Ingrao officially denounced it in the Italian Communist Party daily L'UNITA.

GOVERNMENT PLANS MEASURES TO TAKE AGAINST USSR

[John Bulloch report: "Britain Set To Reduce Links With Russia"]

[Excerpt] Britain is planning to reduce official contacts with the Soviet Union until Russian troops are pulled out of Afghanistan. It will also cut trade and discourage unofficial visits between the two countries.

All the measures are expected to be announced within the next few days. The delay in making public the actions is only so that Britain can co-ordinate its moves with European and NATO partners.

One of the most serious of the "reprisals" being taken by Britain concerns trade.

Britain now imports raw materials worth almost 700 million pounds a year from the Soviet Union, and exports high technology and general products worth about 423 million pounds.

Sir Harold Wilson, when he was prime minister, offered Russia trade credits of about 950 million pounds, half of which have been taken up so far.

The second half of this package is due to be negotiated next month, and it is clear the planned credit facility will be withdrawn or made so unattractive that Russia will refuse it.

Mrs Thatcher and her ministers appreciate that the trade curbs will hurt a number of British companies, and undermine devoted work done by businessmen and exporters.

But just as President Carter felt that grain shipments had to be cut off despite the damage to Iowa farmers, so in Britain, principle is being put before individual harm.

A projected visit by Mr Gromyko, Russian foreign minister, has already been cancelled, and a number of other Russian ministers and officials who planned to visit London will be told they are no longer welcome.

Outstanding negotiations on trade deals, visa regulations, and anything else pending will be abandoned, and the possibility of ordering cuts in the 45-strong Soviet Embassy in London is being considered.

The likeliest quick diplomatic move is the recall of Mr William Hillier-Fry, Britain's ambassador in Kabul. One option still being considered is that "advice" should be given to athletes not to take part in the Moscow Olympics.

ROLANDHIS, UN ENVOY DISCUSS REVIVAL OF DIALOG

[Text] A meeting was held at the Foreign Ministry this morning between Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Mr Galindo-Pohl, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus. The meeting lasted for about 1 hour and was held within the framework of the new round of efforts by the UN secretary general toward the revival of the intercommunal dialog.

In a statement after the meeting Foreign Minister Rolandhis said that a new round of consultations started today to find a way of resuming the intercommunal talks, which have been suspended since last June. He added: I cannot say that this is an easy matter. It is difficult, but very serious efforts will be exerted and at least we--the government and the Greek Cypriot side--will do everything we can in this direction because we believe that, particularly at this critical stage, the two communities must be reunited and there should exist this bridge of communication, the bridge of the intercommunal dialog. Mr Rolandhis said that he also discussed with Mr Galindo-Pohl the question of Varosha, which is a very serious issue. He added: I understand that the relevant memorandum that I handed to Mr Galindo-Pohl, which he has sent to the UN secretary general, is being studied. We expect that the United Nations will become active and move very quickly in adopting measures with regard to the Varosha issue.

Answering a question about the prospects for the new efforts, Mr Rolandhis said that it is very premature to make any forecast because today's meeting was the first one. He added: What I can say is that there are difficulties but we will do everything to overcome them.

In his statement, Mr Galindo-Pohl said he exchanged views with Mr Rolandhis on the handling of the Cyprus problem during the forthcoming weeks and added that he will convey these views to UN headquarters in New York. He concluded: I expect to continue consultations and I hope we will have a satisfactory result.

KIPRIANOU RECEIVES COMMONWEALTH SPEAKERS STANDING COMMITTEE

[Text] President Kiprianou received today the standing committee of the Commonwealth speakers of parliament. The officials were accompanied by Mikhailidhis, speaker of the Cyprus House of Representatives. In reply to an address by speaker of the Australian Parliament, Sir Billy Snedden, the president referred to the blows that Cyprus had sustained from the Turkish invasion, and particularly to the most tragic aspect of the Cyprus problem, the missing persons.

Mr Kiprianou stressed: Our goal is to find a Cyprus solution as soon as possible that is based on the framework of the UN resolutions and that would safeguard, among other things, the unity of the state and people.

Mr Kiprianou said: All the British constitutionalists during the period of British rule precluded a federation as a solution because Cyprus is a very small island. Nevertheless, he added, in an effort to facilitate the situation, we agreed upon a federation. However, it must be a true federation and not two separate states--which, he stressed, would be the destruction of all of Cyprus.

Mr Kiprianou also said that, in the final analysis, the Cyprus problem was not a domestic one, and that he was certain that if the problem was the welfare of the Turkish Cypriots, it would have been solved very easily a long time ago. However, there is pressure from Turkey, which is trying directly or indirectly to impose a partitionist solution.

Despite these difficulties, Mr Kiprianou said, we will continue our efforts, together with the help of the peace-loving countries that understand our problem, until we create the prerequisites for a peaceful, lasting and viable solution that will give all the Cypriot people--both Greeks and Turks--the chance to coexist peacefully and create a better future for the coming generations.

DENKTAS SAYS VAROSHA HOTELS WILL OPEN

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas said that the Turkish Cypriot proposal to allow Greek Cypriot owners to open their hotels in Magusa's [Famagusta] Maras [Varosha] region is not tantamount to opening the region for Greek Cypriot settlement.

In a statement to the EAST MEDITERRANEAN NEWS AGENCY, which has its headquarters in the Greek Cypriot sector of Lefkosa [Nicosia], Denktas noted that if the Greek Cypriot hotel owners do not begin operating their hotels by the end of February, the Federated State will take the necessary measures to operate the hotels. Pointing out that certain foreign organizations are willing to manage the hotels in the Maras region, Denktas added that Greek Cypriot hotel owners can lease their hotels to foreign organizations. Noting that if the Greek Cypriot hotel owners are obsessed with a political view which prevents them from returning to Maras, Denktas said: Maras is now subject to the laws of the TFSC and will remain that way until a solution is reached.

DHROSOS ANALYZES EAST-WEST SYSTEM OF 'DETENTE'

["Political Issues" column by G.N. Dhrosos: "Inequality in Coexistence"]

[Text] For many years the world, or rather two worlds, have been living in what has been called a state of detente or peaceful coexistence. That is, each side tolerates the other, no war is made to impose communism or capitalism and the people have the chance, and the right, to compare both systems. The logical inference is that little by little they will have the right to choose the system that proves best and most beneficial, or in other words, a system that best serves the people's interests.

The system is simple, logical, peaceful and allows large margins of time to be tried to give results. After all, the existence of peoples and of the world is not counted in months or years. Perhaps centuries may be needed for such choices. Meanwhile, both systems undergo changes. Communism especially has undergone many variations and various developments and Moscow no longer controls the communist movement. But it always remains the great communist power which is the only one capable of dyanamically confronting capitalism.

It was thus that the system of peaceful coexistence started years ago. Since then, however, the rules of the game have not been adhered to fully. Both sides, especially the Soviets, tried to exploit time and push their positions forward. Thus, in an important area the possibility and the means of measurement were proven that regardless of the humanitarian or democratic superiority of the Western system, communism as a political system is much more drastic and decisive. It makes decisions quickly and implements them immediately. It has greater flexibility, ease of movement and can justify everything, even though most of the people and some of the communists themselves laugh at the arguments that are used.

After all, there is a plethora of such arguments. They keep many such arguments in a drawer, and every time they need the one which seems most suitable for the occasion, it is taken out. In the past, the arguement of "lebensraum" was in force. It was abandoned, however, obviously because Hitler had used it. Now we have the Soviet Union's "interests," the "danger of imperialist invasion," and the need for the restoration of order "at the invitation of some government." That is, we intervene because we suppose that some other people intend to intervene. In the case of Afghanistan we have the strangest of cases: We are invited by a government which we slaughter immediately after our entry in order to install a different government! All these things cannot stand up to any logical scrutiny but they have happened, are happening and obviously will happen again in the future. We have seen it in Ethiopia, Angola, Kampuchea and, in less recent times, in Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Now it is happening in Afghanistan.

A makeshift answer or objection that possibly can be expressed is that the other side can do the same. But this is the snag: It cannot do it, its system does not permit it. For instance, if the United States someday believed that its interests and security dictated the invasion of some small country by U.S. troops, the issue would be discussed by the Pentagon, the secret services and the administration, and then the relevant proposal would be taken up by the legislative bodies. There would be discussions in committees, subcommittees, plenary sessions, possibly a joint session and then a decision; let us suppose it is positive. [paragraph continues]

Meanwhile, the other side will have learned of everything and will have reacted and intervention perhaps will be impossible. Even more: During the successive discussions various viewpoints will have been expounded. Not everybody will agree with the purpose of the intervention that is being planned. Many arguments against it will have been heard and a segment of the people and the information media will have been convinced that the intervention should not take place. Not only will there not be a consensus, but the morale of the country's armed forces will have been undermined.

As regards the other side, however, the critical decision will be made by a small group of men and, if among them there are those who disagree, no one will ever learn either of their disagreement or of their reasons for it. The relevant orders will be conveyed where necessary and they will be executed immediately, without discussion or questions. The people will be given the official line and rationale. The press and the radio will support precisely those positions and the people will have been convinced of the correctness of the arguments, whether they nod their consent or not, and opponents will not have learned of the leadership's intentions and it will be too late for them to react.

All of these things in practice constitute a clear superiority of one system over the other, and as long as this superiority continues, one faction will constantly gain ground at the other's expense until in the long run there will come a time when the system that is constantly winning points will be in a position to dictate its demands to the other, or almost so.

Thus, we see that what we call detente or peaceful coexistence operates to the benefit of one side and to the detriment of the other. This is an analysis and this analysis does not contain any advice that this unequal status be ended suddenly. War is not an alternative, but the West should do something. It should react somehow because, otherwise, little by little, it will lose everything except perhaps honor and democracy. But honor and democracy without all the other things are benefits of very dubious value.

AKROPOLIS: KARAMANLIS TO RUN FOR PRESIDENCY IN MARCH

AT061610 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 6 Jan 80 pp 1, 14 AT

[By P. Kamvisis]

[Text] All authoritative political sources claim that by next March Karamanlis will announce his decision to "move on" to the presidency of the republic. They base this belief on existing concrete indications and on reports from people who are in a position to know--to the extent possible--the manner in which Karamanlis thinks and reacts.

The same sources add that one thing should be made clear above everything else: The unique starting point for Karamanlis' decision and his exclusive motive of the country's interest. In no other case will he take the above step.

At this point, it can be stated authoritatively and responsibly that, after Karamanlis has completed his work, and specifically after he has solved--or at least led--critical national issues to a point where they will no longer be dangerous for the country, he will want to go home to his family residence in Macedonia and rest.

Karamanlis believes that he has discharged his national duty fully and that, consequently, he is entitled at some point to withdraw and rest. However, his sense of national duty and his profound feeling of responsibility to the country are the things that influence him and guide his actions. Given the current critical nature of the international situation--with its inevitable repercussions for Greece--all responsible factors in the government and the opposition believe that Karamanlis' presence at the head of the state is indispensable.

It is indispensable because first, he is a leading personality who is respected and not questioned in Greece by anyone, whether friend or foe. Second, he is an internationally established personality. He is the only one who has the prestige that is so necessary at present for the protection and promotion of our national interest.

Consequently, everybody and everything coincide in the assessment that Karamanlis' decision about the presidency will essentially constitute the acceptance and implementation of the more general assessment regarding the need for him to continue offering his services from the position of head of state.

It should be stressed--the same circles add--that if the public did not believe that Karamanlis was indispensable he would have "gone home."

Just how correct this last statement is can be established from the fact--which today AKROPOLIS responsibly reveals--that last June, immediately after the ceremonial signing at Zappion of Greece's treaty of accession to the EEC, Karamanlis at that time, which was so historic for the country and so splendid for him personally, pondered very much whether he should withdraw from politics. Ultimately he did not do so because he could perceive that very difficult days would dawn for the entire world and naturally for Greece, too. He decided to disregard his--legitimate and human--interest which was to withdraw from politics at the time of glory and honor and he remained on the battlements.

On the basis of the above and in conjunction with the fact that the truly successful term of office of current President K. Tsatsos ends on 22 June, authoritative political sources take for granted that by next March, Karamanlis will have announced his final decision to seek the presidency of the republic. The above sources are completely certain of this and they even define the political procedures and developments that will follow:

1. In all certainty, after the announcement of his decision, Karamanlis will resign as prime minister and as chairman of New Democracy.

2. The party will elect, through democratic procedures, the man who will become chairman of New Democracy and prime minister.

3. According to the Constitution, the president of the Chamber of Deputies will convene the body on 23 May for a special session to elect the new president of the republic.

As is well known, a two-thirds majority, that is, 200 deputies, is needed to elect the president of the republic. If the candidate does not receive 200 votes, another ballot will be held 5 days later. If on the second ballot the candidate does not receive the necessary majority, a third vote will be held in which he will need only 180 votes. If again there is no positive result, then, according to the Constitution, the Chamber of Deputies must be dissolved within 10 days and elections declared.

The new chamber will repeat the vote for a president and (at this fourth time) the candidate who receives a three-fifth's majority, that is, 180 votes, will be elected president of the republic. If, however, there is no result, the vote will be held again (within 5 days) and the president will be the candidate who receives an absolute majority (151 votes). If even this vote does not produce any results another ballot will be cast 5 days later between the two candidates who received the most votes, and the one who receives a plurality will be considered to have been elected president of the republic.

Referring to the election of the current prime minister, the same political sources take for granted that Karamanlis will be elected president of the republic with a great and comfortable majority, a fact which means that he will be elected by deputies from almost all political parties. It is also added--as has already been reported in AKROPOLIS--that on the basis of reports which have been verified, Karamanlis "has in his pocket" the majority of 180 deputies and he will receive a much greater majority.

Finally, another issue which must--once again--be clarified is that Karamanlis is interested in guaranteeing New Democracy's unity, but his interest is and will remain an interest above partisan politics. New Democracy interests him as a strong and democratic party necessary for social and economic stability and for calm, democratic development in the country. When he has been elected president of the republic it is certain that he will treat all parties equally and that he will not become a partisan president.

SHIPYARDS TO BUILD NAVY SUBMARINES, DESTROYERS

Already--it was emphasized--from the technical viewpoint Greek shipyards are ready to respond to orders to begin shipbuilding. They have the necessary infrastructure, the modern technology and the specialized personnel. The start of the building program for large ships coincides with the completion of the delivery of six missile boats by Greek shipyards, the delivery of the last of the four ultramodern submarines from Kiel and the delivery of seven naval support helicopters made in Italy.

Thus, viewed from a more general political-military vantage point, the start of the new shipbuilding program will result in the changed position of naval forces in the Aegean in Greece's favor, thereby minimizing the outbursts and demands of the Turkish chauvinists without our country having to change the peaceful positions which the government has repeatedly declared. Already, after an objective comparison of the Greek Navy with the Turkish it emerges that despite the numerical equality--in vessels--essentially our country is superior because of the qualitative superiority of its naval units and men.

PARTY LEADERS COMMENT ON EVENTS IN AFGHANISTAN

NSP Call for Islamic Summit

TA041701 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Jan 80 TA

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] deputy leader Recai Kutan said that Turkey must call an Islamic summit meeting in connection with the Soviet Union's military attack against Afghanistan. In a written statement in Ankara, Kutan said that defenseless people were being evacuated from their homes and were being forced to live in mountains or massacred in Afghanistan. Kutan said: If a Muslim country had done the same thing against Israel, the UN Security Council would have convened immediately and sent troops there on the double.

Kutan reiterated that all the Muslim countries must establish their own United Nations or their joint security organizations. Otherwise, he said, they will not be able to show their real power in such cases.

NAP Wants Olympics Boycott

In a statement issued in Ankara today, Okuyan said that the Soviet troops, which are invading Afghanistan, are annihilating thousands of Muslim Afghans, dropping napam bombs on the people and changing the currency to rubles, and that the world is remaining passive in the face of these bitter facts. Okuyan added that Turkey should express solidarity with the Muslim Afghan people and condemn an invasion directed against an independent country by boycotting the Moscow Olympics.

Ecevit Speech to Parliamentary Groups

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said: I do not think it is possible that Turkey will seek solutions and a way out within a framework outside the democratic framework. I do not believe this is probable and I do not believe that the Turkish Armed Forces believe otherwise.

In a speech at his party's joint parliamentary group meeting to discuss the developments regarding the commanders' letter, Ecevit said that there is no doubt that the desire to involve the Turkish Armed Forces in internal politics has now increased among certain persons and circles. Noting that signs clearly show that these wishes are increasing and are already emerging, Ecevit said: However, I do not believe that it is possible that the Turkish Armed Forces will be influenced or are inclined to be influenced by such appeals or provocations. On the contrary, at a time when the developments and threats in our region have increased in such a manner, I firmly believe that the Turkish Armed Forces, rather than becoming involved in internal politics, are actually longing to reach a stage where they will no longer have to shoulder the responsibility of martial law.

Ecevit noted that the commanders' letter cannot be isolated from the already existing crisis in Turkey and that it is a part and a reflection of this crisis. As a party that established the state and democracy, the RPP's duty is to eliminate the crisis existing in Turkey despite this letter, to seek ways to overcome the crisis and to determine the RPP's contribution to the solution.

Ecevit stated that, until now, there was an irresponsible game being played outside his party and that his party has no time to waste on this game. Pointing out that this game consists of throwing a ball of fire which says "this is written to you and not to me" from hand to hand, Ecevit said that so far his party has not participated in this game and should refrain from doing so in the future.

Ecevit also stated that the blatant facts, the bitter daily events, the ever increasing economic problems and the social and political crisis constitute a much greater and clearer warning [than the commanders' letter]. Noting that it is the political parties' duty to find solutions to the problems and the crisis within the institutions and rules of democracy, Ecevit continued: The political parties and the politicians should assist the Turkish Armed Forces in giving their entire attention to their own basic work. It is not necessary to make concessions at the expense of democracy or discard our democratic way of life to assist in this. On the contrary, we should fulfill the fundamental duties that fall on us, the political parties, within the multiparty democratic system, in a responsible manner.

Reiterating that until now his party had not received a reply to the honest appeal to establish a dialog with the Justice Party, Ecevit declared that, until the text of the letter submitted to the president was read to him, his party had absolutely no knowledge that such a letter was written or was going to be written.

KREISKY ON POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF EVENTS IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] Bonn--It is the opinion of Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky that, as far as detente and disarmament are concerned, the West will have to reckon with a "cold spell" for some time. In a Deutschlandfunk interview today on the events in Afghanistan, he also voiced the fear that the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference due to take place this year would "probably be in doubt."

The Austrian chancellor stressed that the West's position must be conveyed to the Soviet Union with "firmness and toughness," but that at the same time it must not "jump head over heels into a policy of cold war."

It is Kreisky's view that this is one adventure undertaken by the Soviet Union in which it has least considered the final outcome because of the complexities of Islam.

FISCHER-PAHR TALKS CONTINUE; 'LITTLE AGREEMENT' REACHED

AU081107 [Editorial Report AU] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 8 January 1980 carries on page 2 a report on GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer's activities in Vienna, headlined "Little Agreement on GDR Visit to Austria." The paper points out that at the talks between Fischer and his Austrian counterpart Willibald Pahr, which centered on humanitarian questions, detente, and the Afghanistan conflict, the two sides' assessments of the international political situation were "unusually far apart." The paper says in this context: "While Fischer attempted to induce the Vienna government to criticize the NATO complementary armament plans, Austrian Foreign Minister Pahr placed the main emphasis of his statements on the forthcoming Madrid CSCE follow-up conference. There Vienna--as has been repeatedly reported--intends to take initiatives in the fields of information and energy."

The semi-official WIENER ZEITUNG in German on 8 January 1980 carries on pages 1-2 an APA report noting that the first working talk between the two ministers dealt primarily with the state of detente--"over which both sides expressed concern"--and with the forthcoming Madrid CSCE follow-up conference. In this context the possibilities for dealing with the individual "baskets" of the Helsinki Final Act were discussed, and Austria referred to its intended initiatives regarding "better access to information" and an "all-European power grid," according to WIENER ZEITUNG.

Both DIE PRESSE and WIENER ZEITUNG carry summaries of the toasts delivered by Pahr and Fischer at a dinner given by the Austrian host at the Vienna Pallavicini Palace on 7 January. According to DIE PRESSE, in his toast Pahr appealed to the GDR to contribute to a further improvement of bilateral relations through the greatest possible elimination of travel restrictions between the two countries. "Until this goal has been achieved, there will be humanitarian hardship cases which are to us a special concern," Pahr said. According to the paper, WIENER ZEITUNG states in this context that Pahr urged a settlement of the still pending humanitarian cases by pointing out that the solving of such cases in the past has been conducive to the good climate of Austria-GDR relations.

In their coverage of Fischer's toast both papers note his remark on Afghanistan--not contained in the referent ADN reports--citing him as saying that his government "regards the aid measures of the Soviet Union, taken upon the request of the party and state leadership, as a step toward stabilizing the situation, and consequently toward peace and security, in this area."

MINISTER OF STATE ON UNSC VOTE ON AFGHANISTAN

DW091052 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 1025 GMT 8 Jan 80 DW

[Text] [Question] Must one speak of the UN Security Council's helplessness, or how do you assess the situation?

[Answer] First of all, it must be said that this was a most important forming of opinion in the Security Council. It is of considerable importance that all members of the Security Council, with the exception of the Soviet Union itself and the GDR, have criticized and condemned the measures of the Soviet Union--the invasion of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan--and have demanded that the troops there be withdrawn. That seems the decisive point for me.

We have experienced over and over again the United Nations' inability to come to agreement in the Security Council as well as in the General Assembly. But that does not mean helplessness on the part of the United Nations; it means that the United Nations is a body where contrasting interests and differences of opinion can be discussed without, however, producing binding commitments, so to speak.

[Question] What value would a joint resolution of the UN General Assembly have, with a view to its practical effects?

[Answer] World opinion is of great importance. It is a considerable result--if I may get back to the Security Council--that the Third World condemned such an intervention of the big power, the Soviet Union, and that it rejected it. I believe that the same result will be achieved in the General Assembly. An important world opinion will be shaped there, particularly among the developing countries, which will have to be heard and adhered to.

ENVOY IN MOSCOW TO JOIN BONN TALKS ON AFGHANISTAN

[Text] Bonn--Hans-Georg Wieck, German ambassador to Moscow, will take part in the Federal Government's talks on the Afghanistan crisis. A Foreign Ministry spokesman today confirmed a report to this effect by KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU and said that Wieck will come to Bonn on Tuesday or Wednesday.

The Foreign Ministry stressed that it was not recalling the ambassador. A recall is considered to be an act of diplomatic disapproval of the host country.

KOHL COMMENTS ON IMPACT OF AFGHAN ISSUE ON DETENTE

[Text] Bonn--CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl believes that the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan has not removed the need for a policy of detente between East and West, but Moscow's behavior should finally result in a realistic assessment of Soviet power politics as well as a joint, determined, balanced attitude by the West and a "policy of detente based on realities." Kohl also said in Bonn today that the events in Afghanistan must finally destroy the illusions of those people in the West and in the nonalined countries who believed that they could separate detente policy from the political realities of Soviet policy and, with its help, even change Moscow's power interests.

Kohl stressed that the illusions of those who stated that Soviet aggression in the CSSR in 1968 was merely an "industrial accident" within the Soviet sphere of hegemony have been laid bare. The illusions of those who believed that Moscow would be satisfied once it achieved military parity have also been destroyed.

PARLIAMENTARIANS ASSESS SOVIET INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN

CDU Bundestag Deputy Mertes

DW070902 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1200 GMT 5 Jan 80 DW

[Correspondent Pusch interview in Bonn with CDU Bundestag Deputy Alois Mertes, member of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Your experience includes more than 3 years of professional and diplomatic activities in Moscow. Based on this experience and on other findings you may have had, how do you assess the Western reactions so far to the developments in Afghanistan?

[Answer] What I consider the most important Western reaction is the statement by President Carter on New Year's Day that the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan had opened his eyes to the true world-political objectives of the Soviet Union. I consider decisive the long-term reactions to the expansionist Soviet security policy and to the world revolutionary leadership claim of the Soviet Union. There must be direct reaction now, however, and what matters with regard to this immediate reaction is the cohesion of the West and the fact that it really must involve a substantial reply.

[Question] Quite often you have come out for more common efforts in Bonn foreign policy by the coalition and the opposition. Can Bonn develop some initiatives of its own aimed at a partnership of solidarity in the alliance at large and solidarity with the United States in particular so as to have detente policy or--in other words--is officially manifested understanding for President Carter's current policy, his reaction to the Soviet Action, enough?

[Answer] You have asked me two questions. Out of state-political responsibility I am definitely an advocate of more intensified, concerted efforts by the government and the opposition. By that I do not, however, mean a show of harmony but a cohesion in the substance of our national interests in general and our foreign and security policy interests in particular.

Your question concerning understanding for President Carter's actions is probably a hint about the postponement of the ratification of the SALT II treaty. As you know the CDU/CSU has always opposed the German parliament intruding into this internal American ratification debate. We do not want to be king's evidence for either the opponents to or the advocates of SALT II, notably for a political reason. What the quarrel is all about is the question of whether SALT II benefits the Soviet Union more than the United States or vice versa, or whether both profit equally from it. Judging that this is a sovereign decision of the U.S. Senate, the decision of the President is inherent in this overall connection.

[Question] How do you assess today's remark by SPD chief Willy Brandt that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan goes to show that the world is suffering from too little rather than from too much detente? What about detente policy?

[Answer] Perhaps the events in Afghanistan are an opportunity for the SPD to finally think about what the words detente and cold war mean. I think German politics needs a disenchantment regarding these terms which East and West, after all, interpret completely differently as far as their contents are concerned. Colleague Wischnewski demands that the Soviet Union not be defeated politically. I am positive that the Soviet Union will consider this an act of cold war. On this issue, by the way, I share Wischnewski's view. The chancellow's advocacy of the Western alliance decision to close the arms gap was declared an act of cold war by the East. What is more important than this quarrel over words is the joint analysis of the political reality in the world, and especially of the Soviet objectives. In this respect I would like to say that you can accuse the Soviet Union of many things, but you cannot accuse it of having made a secret of its political and military strategy. It is obvious. The West simply wanted to close its eyes and ears to it.

CDU/CSU Spokesman Marx

[Correspondent Behnke interview with Dr Werner Marx, foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag faction; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Yesterday you made an urgent demand that the course of German foreign policy be corrected. But will it not be dangerous, or perhaps even negative, for the interests of the Federal Republic if the results achieved so far through Ostpolitik in Europe are risked because of some justified embarrassment caused by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan?

[Answer] Naturally it would be unwise and a sign of a policy of emotionality if embarrassment were to be a leading factor in our thinking. That must not happen. We must view all developments with great sobriety and coolness but, naturally, we must bear in mind our own interests. Our own interests demand that we base policy on a sense of realities and on insight into existing facts. We must not permanently and erroneously assess a partner or adversary--depending on how one views the Soviet Union--or create erroneous hopes and ascribe to it [the partner or adversary] the pursuance of a policy which it does not want to pursue. One must not believe that one's wishes also comprise the adversary's policy.

What I said--namely, to correct the course--does not mean changing German foreign policy. But one must change the ideological bases that existed in 1969, for example, when Willy Brandt and Walter Scheel founded a new government that was based on--and I repeat--an erroneous assessment of Soviet aims, intentions and methods. That policy is being continued today although in a weaker form.

The Soviet action demonstrates--you just said yourself that it unfortunately caused a dramatic deterioration of the situation in the world--that the Soviet Union has planned things completely differently from what has been ascribed to it. It was the Soviet Union that enforced, so to speak, a considerable correction of the course.

The discussions that are going on in the West now would have been unthinkable 6 months ago because, at that time, we did not believe that the Soviet Union would attack a country outside its camp--a country further away than Czechoslovakia--and subordinate it to its own power. In addition, it had the boldness to tell the whole world--including the UN Security Council--that this was not intervention but aid that was given upon request and that the Soviet Union maintained international solidarity. A partner who acts like that cannot expect the world to learn nothing from this and to believe its assurances with regard to detente and disarmament. The same world must realize that the Soviet Union does not pursue detente, but that it creates the reasons for tension, that it does not disarm but that it rearms enormously, as has been discovered.

[Question] The SPD/FDP coalition obviously has some fears with regard to the continuous existence of the current Ostpolitik, of detente policy. Deputy SPD Chairman Wischnewski literally said that nothing would be more harmful than ill-considered, rash, reactions, and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher said that there is no alternative to detente policy. Is not the situation, the political situation, possibly a divided one? Is Asia on one side and, perhaps, Europe on the other? I would point to the island-like position of West Berlin, for example, and to inner-German relations. [sentence as heard]

[Answer] Well, let me comment on the individual points: First, Wischnewski is correct in warning against rash reactions. I already mentioned that in my introduction. Rash and ill-considered reactions in politics are always wrong. One must pay for them later on.

What I want to say and what I appeal for is as cool and clear calculations as possible. This is exactly the reason why I arrived at the conclusion that it is about time for our policy to base political considerations on real insight, not on one's own hopes and wishes.

Second, alternatives. The Soviet Union itself showed the alternative to detente policy--namely, a policy of tension. It has demonstrated this not merely in Afghanistan; I have also mentioned armament in the field of missiles. What the West has discovered since 1974 with regard to the enormous Soviet armament in the field of missiles demonstrates that there is no detente in Europe and tension in Asia; it demonstrates that in Europe, too, elements of tension and threat are being set up, elements against which no Western means will exist for a long time.

Third, it has always been said--and it is correct and I support it--that detente is a global matter, that it is indivisible. We cannot let the Cubans take action in Africa in our presence and have the GDR take actions in order to more or less incorporate other countries into their camp and expect that the West will believe that this is a completely different form of policy which it must accept. Either detente is the basis of global policy along with peaceful coexistence in all political competition--which naturally will exist--or everything is just a smokescreen used by the other side to lull the West in order to take one position after the other away from it, and to blackmail the West some day with the help of the other side's acquired political positions. One must make up one's mind, either one way or the other.

[Answer] We believe that a change of course must consist of the Federal Government's saying goodbye to the illusion pampered since 1969; the considerations of our foreign policy must be firmly based on real insight. European political cooperation, for example--I am under the impression that this has been tried lately--must remind the European as much as possible of his own tasks and duties. The alliance must not be merely a verbal cover; it must be a military and a military-political, foreign-political organization in which one can rely on one another.

I mentioned Berlin. Americans have been stationed in Berlin for a long time. They are stationed here in Western Europe to preserve our freedom, and we have always been grateful for that. Now since the Americans are in difficulties themselves, a lot will naturally depend on the actions of their allies in Western Europe. If they want to ignore the American problems now, if they want to ignore the world problems that have been created by the Soviet invasion, the day will come when America will ask itself about the actions of its alliance partners and will draw the conclusions.

We must understand this correctly, we must strengthen the alliance now at a moment when it is important, we must do our duty in the alliance together with the other states--then the Soviet side will not consider undertaking something in Europe. But if it has the impression that the Europeans are negligent and do not care about their duties, I am rather pessimistic--and I said that yesterday in my speech to the CDU/CSU--also with regard to Yugoslavia and other parts of Europe.

[Question] Well, that is almost an indirect appeal to France because the French Government obviously seems to be very reserved at least vis-a-vis the suggestions of U.S. President Carter made in connection with the Afghanistan situation and measures to be taken against the Soviet Union.

[Answer] We know that the French have always been a bit more difficult in this matter, that they were a bit more independent. I do not want to appeal to them now. I am thinking along more moderate lines. First of all we ought to clean our own house. We still have much to do in our own camp in order to see to it that our policy becomes absolutely realistic again, and that such assessments as have been made by Messrs Bahr, Brandt and Wehner on vital political problems will not be voiced any more.

DPA VIEWS MOSCOW'S MOTIVES FOR AFGHAN INTERVENTION

[By DPA correspondent Franz K. Drewer]

[Text] Moscow--The speculation in Moscow about the ramifications of the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan at this particular moment has continued over the weekend. The interest concentrates increasingly on USSR-United States relations and the East-West relationship.

The Soviet Union, it is said, must have arrived only during the last few weeks at the conclusion--which has had such momentous consequences--that no talks would come about in the foreseeable future either with the United States or with NATO. And last month's missile decision is seen as the final "proof" of the rigidity in the East-West conflict. The Soviet leadership had previously seen no prospect for a ratification of SALT II by the American Senate, and the Kremlin's search for another sphere of activity began with this "recognition."

One Eastern bloc diplomat said: "They (the Soviets) had known for some time that SALT was dead and obviously a reaction had to follow." The Kremlin leadership's interest had logically concentrated on Iran in the hope that should the United States intervene to free the hostages the USSR could itself step in. The Kremlin quickly recognized United States' inability to act, Western diplomats in Moscow believe, and also the vacuum in that region, with Afghanistan being the weakest spot.

Another reason for Moscow's intervention in that country is thought possible. The Soviet military has been urging that action be taken in order to end as quickly as possible the killing of the 'units of advisers' which is suspected to have been taking place on a large scale. The generals demanded a "logistical underpinning" in order to stabilize the situation on the restive southern border in favor of the Soviet Union.

According to some diplomats, the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan could well prove to be a "boomerang" for Moscow. They point out that the Soviets have taken action against an Islamic country, thus importing the "Islamic sickness" into their own home (between 30 and 50 million Muslims live in the USSR).

Observers believe that the Soviet leadership may possibly have underestimated the spreading of "pan-Islamism." It is said that top Soviet officials, in talks with Western diplomats, have emphasized that Hafizollah Amin, Afghanistan's executed head of state, had proceeded brutally against the Muslims in his country. His successor, Babrak Karmal, will bring peace to the clergy, they say. However, diplomats believe that the danger of an Islam-dominated solidarity against the USSR cannot be ruled out. So far broad Arab assent to Moscow's action is still wanting. Only the Syrian communists and a minor left-radical Beirut newspaper have voiced open assent.

To assess the Federal Republic's position in this international conflict is regarded as difficult. Bonn's viewpoint was made plain by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher: condemnation of the intervention and its irreconcilability with indivisible detente. So far, the Soviet Union has made no public comment on this. It has been said that the Soviet Government sees Bonn in the front line of the opponents to its Afghanistan policy.

CORRESPONDENT VIEWS U.S. REACTION TO AFGHANISTAN

[Jan Reifenberg Washington article: "Carter's Sobering"]

[Text] Washington, 7 January--The Soviet occupation of Afghanistan had the same effect on President Carter as the first meeting with Stalin had on President Truman during the Potsdam Conference. The eyes of Roosevelt's successor, however, were more quickly opened in 1945 with regard to the true character of Soviet power policy than Carter's today. President Carter hoped despite all signs on the political horizon, particularly since his meeting with Brezhnev on the occasion of the signing of the second SALT agreement last June in Vienna, that a sensible basis could be found for a cooperation with the other superpower particularly with regard to limiting strategic arms and the extension of bilaterally profitable technical enterprises. The President was looking for a midpoint between Secretary of State Vance, who always prefers negotiations to confrontation, and the impetuous stance of security advisor Brzezinski, who is always skeptical with regard to Soviet action. Carter ever hoped to change the approach of the ruler of the "Brezhnev doctrine" with the "power of positive thinking."

From the very beginning the party chief in the Kremlin interpreted this as a weakness in his American partner--erroneously, however, as it now turns out. Although Moscow continued the "SALT" negotiations, Brezhnev believed he could exploit every weakness of the United States in strategic border zones without being punished. The Kremlin also underrated the America's inner strength of resistance, that typically Anglo-Saxon action in a serious crisis. Carter, say his advisors, has begun to present the bill to the Russians. In the coming weeks, the Soviet Union will have to realize that for violating strategic-political zones of world political significance it will have to pay the high price of losing those Western advantages of it had hoped to gain through the detente policy of the seventies.

For Carter, it means abandoning the most important foreign and security policy plans he had planned to accomplish during his first term in office. The President, assure his aides, will stick to his conviction that the arms control measures formulated in "SALT" will continue to hold their vital commonsense value [vernunft-wert] for Washington and Moscow. But nobody in Washington believes that the treaty will be ratified prior to the end of Carter's first term in office. [paragraph continues]

The Senate shares the bitter sobering which the President currently feels vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. Afghanistan also means that Moscow--as was announced by Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin last Thursday--is not prepared to take part in talks on limiting strategic arms systems in Europe, as has been suggested by America and the NATO partners. The only thing one can hope for now is the Soviet Union's quiet adherence to the agreements of both "SALT" treaties. The other possibility would be an arms race that ought to hurt Moscow considerably when the sanctions announced by Carter in the technical, diplomatic and agricultural fields become effective.

White House, Department of State and the Pentagon circles do not believe, however, that this could prompt Brezhnev to withdraw from Afghanistan in the near future. That is contradicted by experience since 1945--with the exception of the state treaty with Austria. It is now important to prevent the Soviet Union from exploiting the chaos in Iran that would come about after Khomeyni's resignation [as published] in order to establish itself as the dominant power in the Middle East, with all the attendant political-strategic consequences. For these reasons, a Pentagon study demanding the establishment of American bases in Kenya, Somalia and Oman, as well as a considerable reinforcement of the presence of the U.S. Navy in the Indian Ocean in close cooperation with the Western allies, attracts great interest.

The close political-strategic cooperation between Washington and China that has been demanded by Brzezinski since his first visit to Beijing is the main issue of U.S. Secretary of Defense Brown's talks with Hua Guofeng and the Chinese leadership this week in Beijing. High ranking aides of Brown say that this is a clear "signal" for Moscow: The United States and the greatest power in Asia consider how one could counter most effectively the advance of the Soviet Union in Asia. Moscow's invasion of Afghanistan clearly demonstrated the urgency of an arrangement with Beijing. "In the past 10 days the Russians forced us to see the world through Chinese eyes," said an American official. Moreover, Brown will discuss intensified technical help for China from Washington: involving things that could serve the modernization of the Chinese Armed Forces. Today Washington recognizes the necessity of a modern Chinese arms arsenal unlike before the crises in Iran and Afghanistan. It was simultaneously confirmed that arms assistance to Beijing will be intensified and that Carter considers making available technical nuclear data, that could end up in the development of nuclear arms to its neighbors, Iran and Afghanistan; thus Brezhnev forced the President to abandon his second pet project, namely, the extension of the nonproliferation policy.

The American political leadership realizes that the measures against Moscow can be successful only if Washington's Western partners cooperate in preventing the Kremlin from obtaining grain, technology and tools through other channels. The White House hopes that it will be recognized in Western capitals that Carter is serious, that he experienced some power-policy sobering (which he admitted, according to many American experts on the East, with considerable naivete in his television address). It is simultaneously believed in Washington that the Soviet Union will not undertake anything dangerous at the central front in Europe; the truce that followed the lesson of the missile crisis involving Cuba in 1962 is still valid here for reasons that are of vital importance to both sides. But the conflict about the border zones, containing considerable dangers for the eighties, has just begun. "I met Mr Stalin in Potsdam. He will not shy away from anything. He will come to know me." Carter may have in mind that analysis by President Truman when he returned from defeated Germany, regardless of how different the world may look today and how limited America's power may have become in the meantime. [paragraph continues]

The security of Western Europe and West Berlin at that time was based on the courage developed in 1945 by "the little dealer in clothing from Missouri." Now Carter wants to demonstrate that he, too, is capable of laying down security zones clearly. That is the meaning and the contents of the American policy that has been generated now by the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. So it may become after all a "costly victory" for Brezhnev, as James Reston of the New York TIMES stated.

COMMENTARY SAYS USSR MUST BE CONCERNED OVER BROWN'S PRC VISIT

[Article signed Ein.: "China Involved in the Game"]

[Text] Now China is involved in the game. The visit of the American secretary of defense to Beijing sets a new tone to the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. The visit had been planned for a long time. Without the Soviet interference in Kabul probably only routine talks would have taken place. But now the meeting has become dynamic. The Soviet act of strength has brought the two countries closer to each other in the Washington-Beijing-Moscow power triangle. That is of special significance; in contrast to the time of the Russian attack of Czechoslovakia, a harmonious strategy between China and America can now take place after Nixon's opening move. They can isolate the third. It means in practical politics that an unknown number of underdeveloped countries can come closer to the Chinese, and Pakistan can, without losing face, obtain American arms through China. The Kremlin must be very concerned by the fact that Secretary of Defense Brown already in the initial talks went far beyond the cooperation promised by Vice President Mondale in August 1978.

SCHMIDT URGES CONTINUED EAST-WEST DIALOG

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has advocated that the East and West continue their dialog despite the crisis in their relations resulting from the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. In a Deutschlandfunk interview today, Schmidt said his basic view was "that especially at times of crisis, states should continue to talk and responsible people should remain in personal contact." When people stop talking, it becomes serious.

Schmidt said he was opposed to canceling various bodies and meetings where East and West are in dialog, including the CSCE follow-up conference, planned to take place this fall in Madrid. Developments could, of course, arise during the year which might lead to a different opinion, but at present he did not see this. Schmidt said the Federal Republic had played a large part in preparing the CSCE follow-up conference in Madrid, particularly with regard to confidence-building measures to be adopted there.

The chancellor added, however, that he understood the concern in Spain and of Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky that the Madrid conference might appear to be in jeopardy.

FRANCOIS-PONCET STATEMENT ON AFGHANISTAN, IRAN

ID091051 Paris LE MONDE in French 8 Jan 80 p 5 ID

[Unattributed report: "France Does Not Envisage Retaliation"]

[Text] The following are the main statements on events in Afghanistan made by Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet to the Europe 1 Press Club on Sunday, 6 January.

"The Soviet Union informed us on 27 December of the Soviet military operation which began on 24 December 1979. We were told that the reasons for it were both the existence of foreign interference and the existence of a pact, an alliance between the two countries.... The information we have on the events, which were carried out in three stages--first, an airborne operation from 24 through 26 December; second, a coup staged 27 December, and finally the deployment of Soviet troops throughout the territory--does not corroborate what we were told. This leads us, and led us right from 28 December, to express the deep concern which this action has caused the French Government."

France, the minister said, will vote in favor of the draft resolution now being discussed in the UN Security Council.

Questioned on the possibility of France taking "retaliatory measures," the minister replied that such measures invoke "the question of detente." It was France, he said, which took the initiative in detente, "has taken it furtherest" and stressed that it ought to be "all-embracing." He continued:

"The events which have occurred undermine the all-embracing nature of detente. It is clearly a serious situation. What stance should France adopt? Should it conclude from this situation that the cold war be revived and that we should hurriedly take a series of initiatives, you spoke of reprisals or retaliation, which would be likely--and this is what would happen--to anticipate possible developments and create a situation in which the prospects for detente would in fact vanish? For our part we think and have always thought that detente is balanced, that it has advantages which are reciprocal and mutual for the two sides involved and that, before drawing the pessimistic conclusions you ask me to draw, we must pursue a dialog with the Soviet Union to show it what we might do and how we and other sections of the world might react. Consequently, we are not envisaging reprisals, as you call them, but we do plan to have talks with the Soviet Union which will show it that we are committed to detente and are committed to it deeply, without weakness or complacency, in the hope that the Soviet Union will adapt its behavior to this need for detente, which it has frequently claimed to obey itself."

[Question] Would France take over from the United States in supplying grain to the USSR?

[Francois-Poncet] "France does not have grain which could be exported to the Soviet Union, and for a very simple reason: French commercial outlets for grain are exclusively, or almost exclusively, directed toward the EEC, and the prices which we obtain in that community bear no relation to world market prices. Consequently, there is no grain available for the deal you mention....

"Commercial relations between the United States and the Soviet Union have always been dominated by political concerns. This is true to the extent that the United States has never granted the USSR the most-favored-nation status which is accepted throughout the world.

Why? Because in exchange they wanted a modification of the Soviet Union's emigration policy. This is true in all other spheres, and even in the structures of trade, amounting to around Fr10 billion--which is not much, a little more than France but not much more.

"The relations we have with the Soviet Union are normal economic relations in which we export all kinds of advanced equipment, but not necessarily very sophisticated equipment, and buy in return a wide range of products, especially oil--we buy more oil from the Soviet Union than from Iran--cotton, and various raw materials. Consequently, relations are entirely different and, to go further and answer your question directly, I will add that France follows the principle of not using the trade relations it has with states for political ends.... That means two things: First, that we do not intend to modify our trade relations with the Soviet Union and also that we cannot contemplate modifying these relations to replace a country which, by definition, abandoned relations for political reasons, since that would be just another way of following political ends.

"When talking about detente--and as everybody knows, the opposite of detente is cold war, in other words, the arms race--you have to look carefully at what you are saying. It is easier to talk about a firm line....

"We think that the Soviet military operation in Afghanistan constitutes a serious attack on the all-embracing nature of detente. In the talks we are going to have with the Soviet authorities in the next few weeks we will explain this viewpoint and make sure that the Soviet Union has assessed the consequences which this attack could have on a policy which has formed the very framework of international relations for 15 years. Depending upon the Soviet Union's behavior, we will decide what France's definitive position should be in the long term and not necessarily in the short term, in the next few days or weeks....

"You ask me who benefits from detente. I will honestly tell you that, in my view, it benefits all parties, that this detente has consequences in the commercial sphere, consequences which are balanced whether in the political or, especially, the military sphere, in which all countries have a common interest in insuring that the arms race is, if not stopped (who could say that it is?) At least contained within limits and curbs. It seems to me that it would require enormous irresponsibility to sacrifice this achievement in a few days and launch into an escalation within a few days, knowing only too well where it could lead us. This does not mean we must view the situation with complacency or react feebly.

"I did not say that France's attitude would necessarily be restricted to words. We have a foreign policy which involves a number of directions and attitudes. It is these attitudes. It is these attitudes which are at stake in the future and in the prospects opened up by the events in Afghanistan."

Iran

"The situation in Iran has not developed favorably. It is very worrying. With regard to Mr Waldheim, to whom I would like to pay tribute for his courage and coolness and for the dignity he showed in carrying out his mission, I would like to say how much I deplore the way in which he was received and to express my amazement at it inasmuch as he did not go to Iran to defend the interests of any power, such as the United States, but to represent the whole international community."

Iran, Mr Francois-Poncet stressed, raises a problem "which is outside detente. We must not place all problems in this framework. I said earlier that there is a tendency to do this too much, even in the Afghanistan affair, which is a regional matter with the Soviet Union opposing the Muslim world, at least as much as it is an East-West affair. It is even more true to say that the Iran affair is not primarily an East-West issue."

Regarding sanctions, the minister wants to see the exact text to be put to a vote in the Security Council before he takes a decision but he added: "France is a priori of the opinion that international sanctions are appropriate in such a clear case of violation of accepted international rules."

LE MATIN CRITICIZES SOVIET HYPOCRISY IN AFGHAN AFFAIR

ID081633 Paris LE MATIN in French 31 Dec 79 p 2 ID

[Editorial: "The Kabul Coup"]

[Text] By trying to justify with uncharacteristic rapidity its coup in Afghanistan--first through TASS and later, as early as Friday, through the intermediary of the Soviet ambassador to Bonn--the Kremlin has once more extended the borders of cynicism in the sphere of foreign policy. In fact, it was in the name of "friendship and cooperation treaty" signed by Nur Mohammad Taraki in Moscow in December 1978 that Soviet troops have occupied the streets of Kabul. We are not naive enough to believe that things were in any way different in the past. Invaders of all kinds have always been able to put forward good reasons for justifying their actions. What is new is that public opinion now can see through the lie--on the one hand it listens to Leonid Brezhnev's moralizing and sees Babrak Karmal pose as Afghanistan's protector, and on the other it sees 25,000-30,000 Red Army soldiers trampling over an entire people.

In fact, the Kabul operation is a new version of the "Prague coup" of August 1968. At that time Svoboda and Husak, both imposed by Moscow after "Dubcek's spring," signed a "mutual aid, cooperation and friendship treaty" with Leonid Brezhnev. We know what has happened since then: Czechoslovakia has been under the Soviet yoke ever since and has recognized the Soviets' right to intervene militarily on its territory in the event of even the smallest threat "against the cause of socialism."

Furthermore, it is necessary to recall that the Soviet leaders in general and Brezhnev in particular were the protagonists of the Helsinki conference of 31 July 1975 which solemnly inscribed in its Final Act respect for the rights inherent in sovereignty and respect for human rights and fundamental freedom, not to mention all the great principles concerning cooperation and disarmament--in short, peace. This is how Roland Leroy, who was PCF Politburo member at the time, commented on it: "The holding of the final session of the European conference marks the triumph of progressive public opinion in Europe and the world over circles which are already trying to belittle its significance. Such a reaction shows again the need for all men of good will to make continuous efforts to insure that the principles adopted in Helsinki are implemented." Would anyone dare to conclude that the presence of Soviet tanks in Kabul is a logical consequence of the Helsinki proclamations?

It seems that this latest Soviet military intervention shows that the Chinese authorities have been right. The Chinese believe--andwaste no opportunity to restate this--that Soviet implantation on all continents has been taking place both at the expense of Western countries and to the detriment of "fraternal countries."

Some people readily compare Russian imperialism with American imperialism and explain, as Michel Jobert has done in our columns, that the two superpowers have continually been dividing the world between themselves in accordance with an agreement duly reached in June 1973. In any case, some people now believe that the Kabul operation can help Jimmy Carter extricate himself from the Iranian trap. Indeed Khomeyni's Iran is now condemning the USSR, which only yesterday seemed to be its main ally.

It will be recalled, however, that the affair of the hostages is only one episode of a much more important crisis affecting the West's economy, namely, the oil and financial crisis. Now from this viewpoint the Kremlin's intervention has only added to the disorder that prevails in that sensitive and essential part of the world, and it is difficult to see what diplomatic or economic advantage either Washington or any other Western capital could derive from it.

LE MONDE VIEWS RAMIFICATIONS OF POSTPONEMENT OF SALT II DEBATE

[Editorial: "The 'Freezing' of SALT II"]

[Text] Although it may be ratified some day, the Strategic Arms Limitation Agreement (SALT II) signed in Vienna last June by Mr Brezhnev and Mr Carter will not be ratified by the U.S. Senate before the next presidential elections in November. This is the first--negative--result of the coup which the Soviet Union has just launched in Afghanistan. Since this document no longer had any chance of obtaining the support of two-thirds of the senators, President Carter asked the Senate Thursday, 3 January, to postpone its examination by the full Senate until better days.

According to White House explanations, this move by the President in no way constitutes a rejection. U.S. leaders are still in favor of the ratification of SALT II, which limits to 2,250 the number of intercontinental nuclear missile launchers which each of the great powers can possess. Of course, this is a very high ceiling. The aim is to limit the growth of strategic weapons, not to pave the way for a real arms reduction. The agreement, which is the result of 6 years of very difficult negotiations with many developments, nonetheless symbolizes a certain political will and a certain code of conduct between Washington and Moscow. It is in this context that Mr Carter's move should be seen; the rules of this code, which were laid down by Mr Brezhnev and Mr Nixon at a time when the Vietnam war was still raging, are less and less respected and also less and less accepted in both camps.

If the postponement of the debate were to continue for long it would certainly have serious consequences on the arms race proper: The protocol accompanying the treaty is due to expire at the end of 1981 no matter when it comes into force. Therefore, as time goes on it loses some of its significance. The restrictions it contains--essentially a ban on deploying and testing new mobile missiles and on deploying cruise missiles with a range exceeding 600 km--are more severe for the United States than for the USSR. The Kremlin, which has already launched a very vigorous campaign against the plans to modernize NATO's theater [nuclear] forces, would therefore be justified in seeing the gradual burial of SALT II as a disruption of the balance achieved by negotiation.

Will the Kremlin go so far as to declare null and void the SALT I agreement which expired in October 1977 but was temporarily extended by mutual consent? Or will it now feel free to break away from SALT II's limitations, for instance, by testing new missiles or arming its supermissiles with more than the 10 independent warheads allowed at present?

This is an important question in that the program for new U.S. land-based missiles--mobile missiles of the MX type--would lose a great deal of its significance if the Soviets were free to increase unrestrictedly their nuclear warheads, thereby neutralizing the advantage which the Americans expect their new system to give them.

Were the Soviet leaders who urged the invasion of Afghanistan also trying, by helping to "kill" an already moribund SALT II, to free themselves from this additional constraint so as to counter in advance the MX missiles whose construction had just been announced? Some people are asking this question in Washington. Of course, the Americans can respond by increasing the number of MX missiles, but that would result in a giddy proliferation of new weapons and weapons to counter these new weapons. This would destroy what little progress has been made on the path of limiting strategic arms.

BARRE DEFENDS PETROLEUM PRICE INCREASES

[Unattributed report: "TV Interview With Prime Minister Barre on Oil Situation"]

[Excerpt] Raymond Barre, speaking yesterday evening on French TV Channel 1 and Radio Network 2, began his campaign to explain the sacrifices asked of the French people as a result of the latest oil price increases. The prime minister's argument, in answer to our colleague Emmanuel de la Taille's questions on TV Channel 1, can be summarized thus: One cannot avoid increases in the cost of petroleum processing, but the least privileged in France should be spared from them, and, thus, measures have been taken on their behalf; as for help to businesses, the policy is to allow them to create jobs; a country is weak when its industry is ailing.

Question: Immediate energy price increases, social assistance for low incomes, aid to businesses so that they can quickly pull France out of its foreign trade deficit and economic recession...Are you not asking too great an effort by the French people?

Answer: I shall answer you quite simply on this. We import our oil. We have to pay the price for it.... Each day we consume this oil, and it would be unusual if we were to buy it in France for less than we pay to the producers of crude oil. And then experience has shown that when events of this kind occur, it is better to act quickly, not to equivocate, not to alter the application of the necessary measures.

You say that perhaps an excessive effort has been imposed on the country. I do not think so. What the president of the republic asked the government yesterday was to make the French people realize that the decisions to be taken are not being taken against them. We do not wish to make the French people suffer. Clearly there are some people who will say that the government is conducting a policy of austerity, of extreme austerity. This is not true, however. What we intend is to enable France to face up to the impact of oil and for that it is necessary to pass on the rise in crude oil prices...

Question: Is not this price-honesty campaign too brutal especially when linked to the decontrol of prices?

Answer: One should not confuse the issues. On the one hand, there is the campaign to pass on the increase in crude oil prices within the cost of domestic oil products and within the cost of energy-related products. This is not excessive since we are paying for processing. Nobody will pay for it for us. It is a matter of commonsense.

You speak to me next of decontrolling prices. The government is conducting a policy of responsibility and of freedom. I have heard it said that the government is to encourage price rises by businessmen leading then to a price spiral. But let's face facts. Do you think that price controls were effective? Do you think that a price monitor could be assigned to every businessman? Why not make an appeal to the businessman's sense of responsibility?

... This is the language that the government intends to use with businessmen rather than saying to them: "We are going to persecute you."

COMMUNIST CRITICISM OF PCF LEADERSHIP UNCOVERED

LD071229 [Editorial Report LD] Paris LE MATIN in French on 24 December carries on page 3 a 400-word unattributed report on a radio interview given by Communist historian Jean Elleinstein on 23 December in which he criticized the PCF leadership and stated that he would "refuse to sign any appeal in support" of PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais in the 1981 presidential elections unless the PCF "changed" its policy.

LE MATIN also publishes on page 3 a 600-word unattributed report on a letter recently written by former PCF Paris Federation Secretary Jean Gajer to Georges Marchais refuting accusations leveled at him by the PCF Politburo in connection with his support for Henri Fiszbin and explaining the reasons for his resignation from his post. Gajer accuses the PCF leadership of trying to "silence" him and warns the party against pursuing Stalinist policies.

LE MONDE of 25 December 1979 carries on page 3 a 1,00-word Jean-Francois Doumic commentary on dissentions within the PCF, citing both Elleinstein and Gajer and referring to an article by Jack Ralite in L'HUMANITE attacking Elleinstein. However, Doumic writes, Ralite "omitted to mention" some problems raised by Elleinstein and distorted some of his statements. Doumic also mentions an article by "Communist intellectual" Jean Rony published in LE MONDE in which Rony criticizes, among other things, the PCF's attitude toward the French Socialist Party.

SCHMIDT, SUAREZ DISCUSS VARIETY OF ISSUES

[Excerpts] Madrid--There was a "high degree of agreement on all international-political questions discussed" when Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez met today for 3 and a half hours. It was learned from German circles that the two heads of government discussed Spain's economic and political development, Spanish membership in the European Community and related questions; Spanish interest in fisheries problems, the transitional period for the complete removal of customs tariffs, and the question of application of freedom of movement for Spanish workers within the European Community.

The discussion of international-political problems included the coming CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid. Both the Federal Republic and Spain reaffirmed that the meeting this year should take place in Madrid. There was also agreement that talks should take place at foreign minister level. Both sides were also agreed in their rejection of a preliminary conference proposed by the Warsaw Pact states.

A number of matters within the spheres of interest of the two foreign ministries were discussed by Foreign Minister Oreja and "chancellery head" Alberto Aza from the Spanish side and by Departmental Chief Berndt Von Staden from the German side. Mutual relations were described by both sides as "excellent."

The two heads of government also agreed in their assessment of the situation in the Near and Middle East. Schmidt and Suarez discussed the relationship with the United States in the current critical world situation. Both of them underlined the necessity of a common stand of solidarity. Suarez expounded his government's stand on the possibility of Spain joining NATO, which was noted by the federal chancellor.

Suarez is giving a dinner for Schmidt tonight. After a press conference at 1130 local time tomorrow, Schmidt will return to Bonn.

FRG CHANCELLOR MEETS WITH PSOE LEADER GONZALEZ

[Text] German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt had a meeting this evening in Madrid with Socialist leader Felipe Gonzalez. Here is Diego Armario:

During the program of activities for the second day of his visit to Spain, German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt this evening received Felipe Gonzalez, secretary general of the PSOE [Spanish Socialist Workers Party]. The meeting lasted 2 hours and, according to Gonzalex, was held in a cordial and relaxed manner, something which the PSOE secretary general said is not all that normal in meetings with the German chancellor. The conversation between the two politicians dealt basically with Spanish membership in the Common Market, international crisis points--Iran, the Middle East and Afghanistan--and also with an analysis of the two parties' policies. Felipe Gonzalez summed up the meeting as follows:

[Begin Gonzalez recording] We discussed at some length problems in the field of international politics. Naturally, the Afghan problem is in the forefront at present. Other problems which were of interest for us, apart from the repercussions of the crisis opened up in the Middle East and a little further away in Afghanistan, included broaching once again the subject of the Common Market. The will for solidarity on this question remains, though that is not to say that we did not raise some of the problems which might arise in the course of negotiations for Spanish entry to the Common Market--problems of various kinds, for instance matters affecting countries of Southern Europe, matters affecting countries in Northern Europe.

These were the two main areas in the international political sphere about which we spoke. Then we also exchanged views on the situation in our respective countries, and on their prospects for the coming year. So much for the contents of our talks. [end recording]

Apart from what you have just heard, Felipe Gonzalez said that attention had also been turned to the situation of Spanish workers and emigrants in Germany, particularly to matters concerning the education of the children of such emigrants.

He went on to stress that Chancellor Schmidt had totally separated the subject of the Common Market from that of NATO because, said Gonzalez, regardless of reports which have recently appeared in the press to the effect that Germany, in the person of its chancellor, intends, among other things, to exert pressure on Spain to join NATO, Chancellor Schmidt totally discounted any pressure of this kind, for he wholly respects this decision as one which must in the final analysis be taken by the Spanish people. Gonzalez repeated that the talks ended with an analysis of the two parties' policies and their prospects for the coming year.

We conclude this late dispatch by adding that in the next few minutes Chancellor Schmidt is due to leave for the Viana Palace where Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez is to host a dinner for him.

MADRID VIEWS U.S. POSITION IN LIGHT OF AFGHAN EVENTS

[Text] The U.S. President yesterday asked the Senate to postpone the debate and ratification of the SALT II treaty with the USSR. This is the first concrete measure to be taken as a sort of reprisal or reaction after the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. The Soviet attitude is a clear violation of the UN Charter and is a flagrant contradiction of the spirit and letter of the Helsinki accords. All this is clear, and the tension of the past few days is growing, if this is possible, as Soviet troops continue their offensive against the Afghan rebels and approach towns near the border with Pakistan, according to the latest reports.

At one time, Carter was intending to sign the SALT agreement despite wide opposition in Congress. As events instigated by the Russians force him into a position of mistrust, he is now asking that the debate on the SALT agreements be deferred. It is not enough for agreements to be embodied in a document. The attitudes of the signatories must also conform with formal pledges.

We are therefore faced with the most serious crisis of confidence of recent years, when [words indistinct] is at its lowest level and tension is therefore at its greatest with all the risks for everyone that this entails. The responsibility of the two superpowers is now at stake on a global level and it may jeopardize an already precarious peace, hence the caution of foreign ministries, the need not to make hasty predictions and the reluctance to speak, which should be interpreted not as lack of concern but rather as a sudden excess of worries.

The advance of Soviet troops continues, and it is clear that the Americans are not going to sit idly by. Vital interests are at stake. American public opinion is also a factor and one should not underestimate American patriotism at this stage. Finally, the fact that 1980 is an election year is another dangerous factor. The candidate standing for reelection is gambling on his own future, and there is always the possibility that he might act to defend his image without the calm expected of a politician upon whom rests the gravest responsibility for an uncertain future, in which war should be avoided at all costs--not just for the good of the United States but for the good of all mankind.

FINLAND

VISITING DANISH FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE

LD081740 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 8 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Danish foreign minister, Kjeld Olesen, intends to have a discussion this evening with the minister of trade and industry, Ulf Sundqvist, about the possibilities of refining in Finland the oil bought by Denmark from Saudi Arabia. Foreign Minister Olesen's press conference, which ended a moment ago, also dealt with international issues. Tapani Lausti reports on Foreign Minister Olesen's press conference:

[Begin Lausti recording] Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen said he had had talks with Finnish Government representatives on, among other things, the worrisome changes which have taken place in international politics. The effects of the events in Afghanistan were discussed in the talks which Foreign Minister Olesen had yesterday with Foreign Minister Vaeyrynen, and Afghanistan also came up at the press conference which ended a moment ago. When asked whether Denmark was planning alone or within NATO any countermeasures against the Soviet Union, Foreign Minister Olesen gave a negative reply. He emphasized that Denmark is a small country and was at present appraising the effects of Soviet policy. He said that Denmark was not planning any countermeasures. Nor does it regard NATO as the correct forum for the planning of countermeasures.

Olesen was also asked whether the countries of the European Economic Community might start exporting more grain to the Soviet Union now that the United States was using grain sales as a countermeasure because of the Soviet policy in Afghanistan. The foreign minister said that he did not consider this possible. He said that the starting point for Western Europe was solidarity with the United States now that it is in a difficult situation with regard to Iran and that the Soviet Union has intervened in the events in Afghanistan. He did not see any connection between NATO's Euromissile decision and the Soviet intervention because, he said, the Soviet Union began preparing the intervention before NATO's meeting in December at which the decision on new Euromissiles was taken.

It was known in advance that Denmark is interested in buying the Finnish state oil company's [Neste] refinery services. Foreign Minister Olesen said that he would take up the matter this evening in discussions with the minister of trade and industry, Ulf Sundqvist. A Danish delegation left today for Saudi Arabia for talks on direct oil purchases, without any middlemen--in other words, the big oil companies. Foreign Minister Olesen said that he did not yet know what kind of agreement might be achieved between Denmark and Saudi Arabia but, if an agreement is concluded, Denmark is interested in talks with Neste about the possibilities of refining in Finland this oil to be bought from Saudi Arabia.

STATE OIL COMPANY SIGNS AGREEMENT FOR IRANIAN OIL

[Summary] The Finnish state oil company [Neste] and the National Iranian Oil Company have signed an agreement in Tehran for oil deliveries to Finland. "Neste managing director Jaakko Ihamuotila, who has returned from Tehran, said the the price of oil imported from Iran is in accordance with the so-called official price, which is approximately $28.5 per barrel. Ihamuotila noted that the agreement is very favorable for Finland, as many buyers have had to be satisfied with much smaller amounts of Iranian oil than before.

"The negotiations between Neste and the Soviet All-Union Association for the Export and Import of Petroleum and Petroleum Products concerning the price of Soviet crude oil will open in Helsinki next week. Neste has conducted negotiations with the Soviet oil company for 1 month and Managing Director Ihamuotila assumes that the following talks will last about 1 a week. "At present Neste has agreements on oil quantities and prices with Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Iran".

ID081302 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 8 Jan 80 ID

[Text] This year Finland will be able to buy its crude oil from Iran at world market prices and in accordance with the agreements of previous years. The matter was decided at talks conducted between Neste [state oil company] and the National Iranian Oil Company in Tehran. Finland imports an average of 20,000 barrels of crude oil a day from Iran or about 1 million tons a year. As far as it is known, Finland is not expected to buy any heavy fuel oil. The Finnish negotiators did not want to reveal the prices Finland will have to pay for the new oil deliveries, but noted that the agreements were based on so-called official crude oil prices.

It is estimated that Finland's needs this year will amount to over 12 million tons of oil, and this amount is accounted for following the signing of the agreements with Iran.

HELSINGIN SANOMAT CRITICIZES SOVIET INTERVENTION, U.S. RESPONSE

ID081146 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0920 GMT 8 Jan 80 ID

[Press review on Afghanistan]

[Text] HELSINGIN SANOMAT writes about the world political situation:

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is contrary to international justice and it has been universally condemned in the same way as earlier actions of the same kind committed by other big powers. If the big powers are allowed to treat their small neighbors as they like without any world reaction, the position of all small states is more threatened than ever. Justified reaction, however, has been slight.

HELSINGIN SANOMAT remarks that the Western powers' interest in Afghanistan has been indifferent since World War II. The West has given much less economic aid than the Soviet Union. Such aid would have developed the country and strengthened its independence. Thus Afghanistan has, in a way, been abandoned within the Soviet circle of interests. That is why it is difficult to take seriously all the recent statements according to which the Soviet Union is also going to seize Iran, Pakistan and the Persian Gulf oilfields, in addition to Afghanistan.

HELSINGIN SANOMAT notes that there also seems to be exaggeration, obviously due to the election campaign, in the so-called countermeasures to be taken by the United States as announced by President Jimmy Carter. Postponing the opening of a new consulate and similar measures are mere gestures. Others are even more effective. Thus, limiting grain deliveries would cause more difficulties to Soviet cattle farming and food supply.

In principle, however, it is not a good idea to interfere with trade in order to demonstrate against the policy of the opposing side. If all the countries did the same, world trade and the whole international community would fall into a state of disorder in which nobody could trust anybody else.

HELSINGIN SANOMAT goes on to say that the Soviet intervention was in itself a backward step in the policy of detente and peaceful competition between the superpowers.

Since the United States has also staked its own prestige now on its countermeasures, it may take a long time before it is possible to return to a political situation which only a few months ago seemed normal and self-evident, HELSINGIN SANOMAT concludes.

NORWAY

NORDLI INTERVIEWED ON STATUS OF DETENTE

LD090929 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 4 Jan 80 p 7 LD

[Report on Thor Viksveen interview with Prime Minister Odvar Nordli: "Detente in Serious Danger"--date, place not given]

[Text] Following the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan and the current U.S. reactions to this, we now face one of the most difficult international crises since the war. Prime Minister Odvar Nordli made this assessment for ARBEIDERBLADET of the most recent international developments. "I am afraid that we have now taken a step away from the policy of detente and disarmament which we have attempted to pursue in recent years in international politics and have taken a step toward a cooler, tougher climate. I fear that the Afghan crisis has blocked the way for a long time ahead for the many sets of disarmament talks." The prime minister said, and he now believes that U.S. ratification of SALT II will become even more difficult than ever. A refusal to ratify SALT II would of course have profound significance for further work on disarmament."

Burned Bridges

"I fear that bridges will now be burned," said Nordli, who does not rule out that the United States will act in various ways in the time to come in order to respond to the Soviet intervention. Nordli believes that the recall of the U.S. ambassador in Moscow can only be an initial reaction and that the possibility of an intensified U.S. presence in the actual crisis area must be kept open as a potential reaction by President Jimmy Carter. On the other hand, the prime minister stressed to ARBEIDERBLADET that there is still no indication that the Soviet Union's action has a wider aim other than to control Afghanistan.

Oil Wells

[Question] We are thus not facing the start of a military battle for oil wells in this area?

"Let us hope that this is not the case," replied Nordli, who does not rule out that a possible consequence of what has happened will be stronger rapprochement between the United States and China.

[Question] How do you, Prime Minister, assess the decision on the modernization of NATO's nuclear weapons in Europe after what has now happened?

[Answer] That decision has not become less important or of less interest. Regarding the negotiations which are built into the modernization decision, I am afraid that these will now be more difficult but even more important.

Security Council

[Question] Norway is currently a member of the UN Security Council. What role can our country play in the present situation?

[Answer] Obviously, Norway must do what is possible to prevent a deterioration in the conflict, both by our participation in the Security Council and in other international organizations. We on the Norwegian side have received no direct appeal to take part in actions. Yet Norway is obviously prepared to support any initiative to prevent the further development of this conflict, Prime Minister Nordli stressed to ARBEIDERBLADET.

GOVERNMENT CANCELS USSR COAL MINISTER'S VISIT

[John Miller report: "Britain To Stop Visit by Soviet Coal Minister"]

[Text] The government is to prevent a visit to Britain later this month by the Soviet coal minister, Mr Boris Bratchenko, because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Mr Bratchenko and a large delegation of officials and miners were due to fly to London on Jan 24. Visas have already been issued, but they are being withdrawn.

The government's decision is one of several "in the pipe-line" in a move to cut official contacts with Moscow until Soviet forces begin pulling out of Afghanistan.

Mr Bratchenko must now feel he is doomed never to visit Britain. A similar trip was abruptly cancelled by Britain in the summer of 1978 after the series of trials of Soviet dissidents. When the visit was re-scheduled last year, it was Mr Bratchenko's turn to call it off because of a major accident in a Soviet coal mine.

Other measures against the Soviet Union, including an end to trade credits, are expected to be announced later this week. But it was clear yesterday that the government intends to give very careful consideration to the issue. A Whitehall source yesterday: "We are not going to cut off our noses to spite our faces. Some contacts will have to be maintained."

For example, I understand, six Soviet atomic energy specialists are due to fly to London on the same day as the Soviet coal minister as guests of the Atomic Energy Authority. That visit will probably go ahead because it is not on a ministerial level, and a series of constructive talks of some benefit in the Atomic Energy Authority are planned. It was not ruled out, however, that if Britain refused to accept Mr Bratchenko, the Russians would hold back their atomic energy specialists.

PRESS VIEWS CARTER'S RESPONSE ON AFGHANISTAN

PA070437 London BBC World Service in English 0425 GMT 7 Jan 80 PA

[From the review of the British Press]

[Excerpt] THE FINANCIAL TIMES, THE GUARDIAN, THE EXPRESS and THE TIMES again all have stories on the continuing repercussions over the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. THE FINANCIAL TIMES and THE TIMES concentrate on sanctions which America is trying to organize to punish the Soviet Union. Both talk about the meeting of the grain-producing countries, Australia, Brazil, Canada and the EEC nations, which has been called in Washington on Friday to try to prevent the Soviet Union obtaining any supplies of grain to replace those it is losing from the United States.

THE TIMES also speculates about a military alliance between China and America in the light of the statement in Beijing by the American Defense Secretary Mr Harold Brown that the two countries could take complementary actions in the field of defense if their shared interests were threatened.

THE FINANCIAL TIMES, in its leader column, under the headline "The Price of Aggression," says whatever the Soviet motivation for its actions in Afghanistan, it is imperative that there should be both an early and continuing outside response against. It says the two superpowers, Russia and America, should not go around taking over independent states. For this reason Russia must pay the price.

THE TIMES sees President Carter's response so far to Soviet aggression in Afghanistan as adequate and sensible. It takes to task Republican presidential candidates for their criticism of his handling of the problem. Under the headline "An Honest Man's Anger," it says that those who criticize Mr Carter's actions are only doing so with an eye on the votes of American farmers, who stand to lose money in the grain sanctions against Russia. It adds that in an election year it may be that the Republicans simply feel that there is a need to criticize the President.

THE TIMES concludes that ever since the seizure of the American Embassy in Tehran last November, Mr Carter's conduct of affairs has been hard to fault. Even those who blame the existence of a double crisis in Iran and Afghanistan partly on lack of effective American leadership are bound to admit that since the crisis started Mr Carter has shown hitherto unsuspected leadership qualities.

DAILY TELEGRAPH Criticism

[Editorial: "Will Washington Learn?"]

[Text] Russia's invasion of Afghanistan shocked President Carter into recognising that his previous judgements had been in error. But he has yet to draw the conclusions. If he has been grievously wrong for three years, while many were able to spell out the score, then his advisers must have wholly misled him. Surely he needs a house-cleaning in the State Department, in the White House and agencies to replace wishful thinkers, appeasers, defeatists and worse. Of course this will evoke parrot cries of "McCarthyism." But the surest way to avert McCarthy-style exploitation of the American public's legitimate frustration is to show that the lessons have been taken to heart.

It is tempting but misleading to base American unpreparedness and abdication of responsibility wholly on the aftermath of Vietnam. A nation, like a fish, rots from the head. Self deception did not begin in Main Street, but in academe, in the East Coast newspapers and broadcasting networks, in Congress. SALT, abandonment of the neutron bomb and of other weapons needed as a disincentive to Soviet adventurism, one-sided concessions in the field of technology, give-away credits and cheap grain--all these emanated from Washington.

What is called for is nothing less than total rethinking of the fundamentals of defence and foreign policy, on a scale comparable with that of 1945. It must recognise that the Russian communist despots are set on expansion, with increasing reliance on sheer military might and total ruthlessness, compared with whom the czars were moderate and gentle men. This demands a counter-strategy of similar magnitude and determination. This no less than detailed immediate measures should be the focus of attention by Mr Carter and the Republican leadership [as published], if they can rise to the statesmanship necessary. Mrs Thatcher's own courageous stand puts her in a strong moral and political position to help this process on.

COMMONWEALTH ACCUSES UK OF BREAKING RHODESIAN AGREEMENT

[Text] Commonwealth high commissioners in London tonight bitterly accused the British Government of breaking the Lancaster House agreement by allowing South African troops to remain on Rhodesian soil.

They also condemned the use of Rhodesian security forces by the governor, Lord Soames, to mop up remaining rebel activity. And they are particularly angry that Britain has given no real explanation for either move.

During three hours of discussion, they questioned the value of assurances given by Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington that South African troops would leave Rhodesia and that the governor would maintain an even-handed approach between the rival armies.

The Tanzanian representative, referring to the auxiliary Rhodesian troops, asked: "Does the governor really have to use these half-trained political thugs?"

The high commissioners demanded the withdrawal of the remaining South African troops which Britain has admitted are still on Rhodesian soil guarding Beitbridge. They are outraged that Lord Soames, with the consent of Lord Carrington, appears to have given specific permission to South Africa for her troops to stay.

The Commonwealth secretary-general, Mr Shridath Ramphal, is writing to Lord Carrington calling for assurances that Lord Soames will ensure the early withdrawal of the South African forces.

OFFICIALS DISCUSS BREAKDOWN OF STEEL STRIKE TALKS

[Text] A "long and bitter" steel strike is now firmly in the cards following the breakdown of last-ditch peace talks in London last night.

The BSC [British Steel Corporation] chairman, Sir Charles Villiers and the TUC [Trade Union Congress] general secretary, Mr Len Murray described the failure as regrettable and disappointing.

Mr Murray said: "We are stuck. There is no alternative--and I say it with great regret--to a long and bitter strike which the unions have not sought."

Sir Charles said: "We feel very disappointed at the way things have turned out.

"We hoped proposals we had made would have solved many problems. We have not yet had any real negotiations."

The TUC Steel Co-ordinating Committee had sought an increase of 8 percent on basic pay plus 5 per cent on account for productivity deals.

The corporation offered an increase of 8 per cent but in return asked for a great number of productivity improvements, and in addition offered 4 per cent in a lump sum payment in advance of local bonus schemes.

Mr Bill Sirs, of the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation, said that the 8 percent offered by the corporation was fully self-financing and meant the steel workers would be paying for what they were being offered.

Mr David Basnett, General and Municipal Workers Union general secretary, said:

"I still feel a sense of shock and I am astounded by the rejection of our most unique offer. This could be potentially the most dangerous issue in the post-war period."

Sir Charles Villiers said they had offered a general increase of 8 percent on a self-financing national agreement.

This included changes essential to improve the efficiency of the industry, particularly flexibility in working practices, reduced manning at on-going plants and non-recruitment of labour to fill vacancies caused by natural wastage.

BSC had also offered a further increase of a minimum 4 percent in lump sum payments arising from locally negotiated bonus schemes.

In addition, steel workers directly concerned with traditional productivity schemes would receive further increases. Sir Charles instanced local schemes negotiated last year which yielded an average of 6-7 percent on top of the national settlement.

BSC were prepared to make one advance payment in the January-March quarter of 4 percent gross earnings of the last quarter of 1979.

But further quarterly payments would be made only where the lump sum bonus schemes had been negotiated by March 31, 1980. Sir Charles said the minimum increase in earnings on this basis should be 12 percent a year, provided lump sum schemes were entered into by the end of March, but BSC expected the average increase to be higher.

He said the TUC's Co-ordinating Committee had been unable to convince BSC that there was real hope in self-financing its proposals.

Sir Charles said that steel workers last year earned on average 110 pounds sterling a week, or 98 pounds sterling excluding overtime. Under BSC's new proposals this would go up to 122 pounds sterling a week minimum.

"Is that worth a national strike?" Sir Charles asked. "Is that what our customers would think is worth having a strike over?"

TFSC PARTY, LABOR UNION CONDEMN SOVIET AFGHAN INTERFERENCE

Democratic People's Party Protest

TA081438 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 8 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The Democratic People's Party has protested the Soviet military interference in Afghanistan. A press statement released today says that this interference--which was realized through brute force and used a puppet government that came to power in a coup against the free will of the Afghan people--was a violation of the independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of Afghanistan.

The statement goes on to say that history has shown that the use of brute force is not always successful in subduing free peoples and adds that the Soviets have resorted to an inhuman act at the close of the 20th century without learning the necessary lesson from Vietnam. Such an act, the statement claims, will enslave the Soviets and not the Afghan people in the long run. The statement calls on the Soviet Union to respect Afghanistan's sovereignty and territorial integrity as well as its independence and nonalinement and to unconditionally withdraw its forces from Afghanistan as soon as possible.

The statement ends as follows: The Democratic People's Party will support to the end the Afghan people's struggle for their independence and national liberation and calls on all Islamic countries as well as other countries to do the same.

TURK-SEN Condemnation

[Text] TURK-SEN [Turkish Cypriot Federation of Labor Unions] has issued a statement condemning the armed interference by the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. The statement said that this interference, which is not based on any just or legitimate reason, is aimed at establishing a lackey leadership and placing the Afghan people under Soviet rule. The statement noted that if the Soviet interference in Afghanistan is transformed into an invasion and if effective sanctions are not imposed against the Soviet Union, the annexation of Afghanistan to Soviet soil will be inevitable.

The statement added: TURK-SEN harshly condemns the Soviet interference and invasion of Afghanistan and the lackey Government of Afghanistan and calls on all peace-loving peoples and governments to effectively support the people of Afghanistan, who are struggling against the Soviet interference for their country's political destiny.

TO VIMA NOTES DELAY IN U.S. MILITARY AID ARRIVALS

[Article by Stathis Evstathiadhis: "The United States Delays Delivery of War Materiel to Greece"]

[Text] Recently there have been delays of more than 2 months in the delivery of specific orders of war materiel by the United States to Greece and there is no convincing explanation of this fact either in Washington or in Athens. Explosive charges, special safety equipment for "Harpoon" missiles, equipment primarily destined for the navy, as well as electronic apparatus for direction, tracking and safety instruments for naval weapons have been delayed for more than 2 months without any indication from the American side that the Greek orders will ever be met. A far smaller delay has been noticed in delivering the direction instrumentation for "Harpoon" missiles and the control apparatus of the same missiles. These are extremely delicate instruments which guarantee the direct flight of the missiles and neutralize in advance any "electronic" interference from other sources, including hostile electronic defense systems.

This is the second time since last April that such a delay in the delivery of such weapons and systems to Greece has been noticed. In July 1979 when TO VIMA reported such delays in the delivery of war equipment by the United States both the Americans and the Greeks furnished the "explanation" that "technical reasons" created "a short delay" in loading the equipment earmarked for the Greek Armed Forces. Today the appropriate services in Washington limit themselves to "recognizing" the existence of the delay in delivering specific weapons and electronic systems but avoid any forecasts or explanations.

PAPANDREOU DEMANDS EXPLANATION OF SOUDHA BAY INCIDENT

[Excerpts] Official opposition leader Andreas Papandreou is asking the government for an explanation of the fact that it was the NATO authorities at Soudha which gave "permission" to foreign support vessels that had met with bad weather to anchor in the Port of Soudha. According to press reports, the issue concerns two Libyan vessels that were being towed by a Turkish vessel and which, because of bad weather, asked for permission to anchor in the Port of Soudha. But the permission was given by the "allied authorities" instead of by Greece. In the statement made last night A. Papandreou stressed: "Following what was reported in yesterday's press about the necessity of the area's "allied" NATO authorities to give permission to foreign support vessels to anchor in the Port of Soudha because of bad weather, one wonders where we are and whether Crete continues to be part of the Greek state. With justified fury we await an official government reply."

DEPUTY VOICES RESERVATIONS ON DEFENSE AGREEMENT

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] deputy leader Sevket Kazan has said that governments which continuously keep Turkey dependent on the outside world should not be imposed on Turkey through the defense cooperation agreement [to be signed with the United States]. Kazan noted that the agreement should stipulate that certain necessary types of defense equipment be produced in Turkey.

In his written statement, Kazan noted that the clauses in the agreement are very important for the future of the nation and requested that the agreement not obstruct Turkey's relations with Islamic countries. Pointing out that the advantage-disadvantage balance should be maintained in the agreement, Kazan continued: Turkey's defense cannot and should not be left to foreign initiative. This is closely related to Turkey's rights of sovereignty.

AMBASSADOR TO WASHINGTON WARNS OF THREATS IN MIDDLE EAST

[Text] The Turkish ambassador to Washington, Sukru Elekdag, has said that, as a result of the recent developments in Afghanistan and in Iran, the world power balance has changed and that a military and economically strong Turkey might be an effective factor against any possible threat directed against the Middle East.

Speaking at a meeting attended by Turkish and foreign journalists in Washington, Elekdag said that Turkey's contribution to security and stability in the Near and Middle East is not sufficiently understood by the West.

Drawing attention to the recent developments in Afghanistan and Iran, Elekdag said that the threat directed toward the West is now moving from Central Europe to Central Asia and the Near East. He added that the nuclear power balance between the blocs is changing in favor of the Warsaw Pact countries and that the Middle East and Near East regions are faced with new dangers. He noted that Turkey's contribution to regional stability should be carefully assessed. Noting that it would be beneficial to view Turkish-U.S. relations within this framework, Elekdag then referred to Turkey's strategic significance. Referring to Turkey's significance from the viewpoint of NATO, Elekdag said that Turkey should be strong, both militarily and economically, in order to contribute to regional peace.

EMBASSY DENIES RUMORS ON EXECUTION OF FIVE TURKS IN IRAQ

[Text] Ankara 8 Jan (AA)--The Iraqi Embassy in Ankara has denied rumors appearing in some Turkish papers alleging that 5 persons of Turkish origin had been sentenced to death in Iraq. Embassy officials said government officials in Baghdad had informed them the reports in the Turkish press were "entirely false and groundless." No such sentence had been given, they said, hence there could be no question of any execution.

Embassy officials believed the reports were being circulated under ulterior motives by those "who want to cast a shadow on Turkish-Iraqi relations," and had caused "concern" among the authorities of Iraq. "The government and people of Iraq have a high regard for the Turkish Government and nation and wish to strengthen relations between the two countries to the utmost," the diplomats said.

IRAQI CHARGE EXPRESSES REGRET OVER RECEPTION INCIDENT

The incidents occurred when police started to search the premises where the reception was being held after receiving a tip-off that a bomb had been planted. Press photographers who wanted to take photos of the police search were manhandled by a few Iraqi diplomats and students. Police intervened and took under custody 3 Iraqi citizens.

The public prosecutor of Ankara for offenses in flagrante delicto started proceedings today against two of the detainees for "armed resistance to police on duty," and against the third for "carrying firearms without a permit."

DEMIREL ANSWERS QUESTIONS ON GENERALS' LETTER, ECONOMY

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that Turkey is facing serious problems but that it will not be crushed by them. He said: The remedy is neither pessimism nor optimism. The remedy is for the nation and the people to counter the problems with all their might and to extinguish this fire.

Demirel made this statement as he was leaving Cankaya Mansion after his meeting with President Fahri Koruturk. The meeting between Koruturk and Demirel began at 1030 and lasted until 1145. After the meeting Demirel told reporters that Turkey is faced with an extraordinary situation, that security of life and property and the prevalence of law and order have been greatly disrupted and that blood is being shed. Noting that all state organs are exerting efforts to find a remedy, Demirel said: The government believes that the citizens are well aware of why these efforts are being exerted. Tranquillity and happiness are being sought. That is what we are trying to achieve. We have economic difficulties. We are, unfortunately, faced with a cold winter. The government is seeking ways to solve this problem with the least possible damage.

In reply to reporters who asked whether or not the issue of the letter submitted to the president by the chief of staff and the force commanders had been clarified, Demirel said: The government, the chief of staff and the assemblies are not separate fronts. It is the duty of the government to understand and solve the troubles of the Turkish Armed Forces. Recalling that he had held over 10 meetings with the various commanders of the Turkish Armed Forces during the 42 days following the vote of confidence received by the government, Demirel added: Our armed forces are performing an extraordinarily difficult duty in 19 provinces. They are working heartily during this cold winter. If the Turkish Armed Forces have various difficulties that can be eliminated through administrative measures, it is our duty to eliminate them. Noting that there was no need for unnecessary arguments, Demirel expressed the belief that no one would refrain from cooperation aimed at solving the country's problems.

In reply to a reporter who recalled statements made by opposition leaders and who asked Demirel's opinion on the issue, the prime minister said that he did not want to get into futile arguments and that it was impossible to solve Turkey's problems through a duel of statements. Noting that problems such as anarchy, shortages of goods, inflation and economic difficulties, which he referred to as monsters, existed, Demirel said that everyone is expected to exert efforts in this battle. He added: This is why I have said that I am avoiding demagogy. However, I am ready for dialog. In other words, I am ready to discuss the problems with everyone, to request their aid and to accept their contribution whatever it may be. I believe this is my duty.

Demirel said that Turkey's monthly oil requirement was 1.1 million tons if the oil shortage was to be eliminated and that the monthly oil bill amounted to $250 million. He added that close to 900,000 tons of oil had been purchased for consumption in January and that another 200,000 tons of fuel oil and industrial oil were needed. Demirel said that each oil price increase cost Turkey $50 million [as heard] and that this caused further financial difficulties. He explained that, with the exception of oil, most of the problems [concerning shortages] had been solved. He added that the problems with medicine, light bulbs and cooking oil had been solved and that import agreements had been concluded.

In reply to another question, Demirel said that various public security bills had been submitted to the parliament, that these bills had been prepared by the present opposition party and that, therefore, he did not believe that there was any need for another meeting with the main opposition party leader. He added that he will not hesitate to meet the opposition leader if need be. He said: I want results. The results I want are in my country's interests. Let us ratify these bills to enable the forces enforcing the laws, the forces insuring peace and tranquillity in the country and the courts to function with ease. I said that we need new laws, the state of emergency law and the state security courts law. I will seek the approval of all parties on the issue. I am not ready for it yet.

In reply to a question, Ecevit said that if the Justice Party proposes a coalition he will support the proposal in authorized organs of his party.

VOTCP ISSUES STATEMENT ON ARMED FORCES LETTER

[Statement by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee on the memorandum to the president from the chief of the General Staff and armed forces commanders]

[Text] The senior commanders of the armed forces have issued an ultimatum directed against the political parties in the parliament and the constitutional institutions. This is the initial step toward imposing cooperation between the Justice Party and the RPP--as demanded by imperialist circles and the collaborationist and monopolit bourgeoisie. This threat against the formal parliamentary institutions by the generals is an indication of a new stage reached in the political crisis. It increases the militarist clique's influence in national affairs. Though this clique does not directly have formal control of the government, it is strengthening its indirect influence over domestic and foreign policies.

This ultimatum by the armed forces senior commanders is closely linked with imperialistic and aggressive plans aimed at increasing both global and regional tension. The U.S. imperialists, who have lost their positions in Iran and have not been able to take Afghanistan under their yoke, are not exerting efforts to create new militarist blocs in our region and to open new bases.

They are massing military forces in the region in a bid to realize their hegemonist aims. The ruling classes in Turkey want to make the country a tool of the U.S. aggressive plans in the Near and Middle East. On the one hand, efforts to this end are being made to incite anti-Sovietism; on the other, secret bargaining is being conducted with the United States for the urgent signing of a military cooperation agreement which will further trample upon our independence and sovereignty.

In the domestic sphere, the ultimatum by the senior commanders of the armed forces was intended to increase the burden of the crisis on the toiling masses and force the working class to bow before the monopolies in their struggle for the signing of collective agreements and to brutally oppress the justified requests of the Kurdish people against national oppression and discrimination. In an effort to confront the influence of the anti-imperialist struggle being waged by the neighboring Iranian and Afghan peoples, the militarist clique is engaging in oppressive measures to fuel discrimination among the religious masses and various sects. The fascist Nationalist Action Party and affiliated organizations are escalating the bloody incidents of terror.

Taking advantage of the circumstances the ruling classes, on the one hand, are trying to eliminate differences among the various political forces of the bourgeoisie and, on the other, are attacking the people's democratic and progressive organizations--primarily the trade unions of the working class--in order to eliminate democratic rights and liberties through new brutal legislation and the DGM [devlet guvenlik mahkemeleri--State Security Courts]. These are the aims of the ultimatum issued by the generals.

In this way the militarist clique is trying to obstruct the mounting unity of action and revolutionary (?feelings) among the broad democratic forces and masses against the Demirel government. The militarist clique has tried through anticommunist and deviating means and demagogy to portray as a rehearsal of anarchic and divisive uprising the massive antifascist demonstrations of the youth and our people and the singing of The Internationale, the song of the working class. The clique thus wants to cover up the oppressive measures it wants to impose upon our people. To this end it is utilizing acts of terror committed by groups--posing as leftists--under the directives of the CIA and Maoists.

This move by leading commanders of the armed forces has further endangered already limited democratic liberties. In this way the generals have opened the way to a reactionary and militarist dictatorship, and have increased the fascist danger. Currently, the RPP administration has bowed to the requests of the generals and has approved the oppressive legislation of the Demirel government. Such a stand will not prevent the fascist danger or [the surging of] a reactionary and military dictatorship as they pretend. On the contrary, it will increase this danger. Slowly, increasing echelons within the RPP are realizing this fact. This step by the militarist clique which supports imperialism, monopolies and brutal legal measures has provoked discontent and reaction among the armed forces.

The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] is struggling against these efforts by the militarist clique and the Demirel government to transform Turkey into a tool of aggressive imperialist plans and to undermine the democratic liberties and the living conditions of the people. In an attempt to obstruct an open military dictatorship and all of its brutal legislative measures, the TCP calls on the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers Party, the Kurdish democrats, the religious masses, all RPP members and all patriotic soldiers, noncommissioned officers and officers for unity of action.

[Signed] The TCP Central Committee, 6 January 1980.

[Text] The Hague, 4 January--The Soviet intervention will not make the success of East-West detente any easier. However, it is still too soon to conclude that the policy of detente has failed. This was Prime Minister Van Agt's reaction after the Cabinet meeting yesterday. The possibility of boycotting the Olympic Games was not on the agenda of the Cabinet meeting. Indeed, Van Agt said he wonders whether responsibility for such a decision does not rest with the relevant sports organizations and sportsmen.

ASSEMBLY ELECTS SPEAKER, DEPUTY SPEAKERS

[Excerpts] Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida is the new speaker of the Assembly of the Republic. He was nominated by the Social Democratic Party [PSD] and polled 129 votes. The only other deputy contesting the election, Socialist Party candidate Teofilo Carvalho Dos Santos, polled only 119 votes. One of the votes cast was blank.

These figures indicate that one deputy did not vote, and that Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeido received a vote from a deputy who is not part of the Democratic Alliance majority. The voting for the post of speaker had to be repeated due to what was called a technical error during the first ballot.

The four deputy speakers of the Assembly of the Republic were also elected during the second round of voting. They are:

Nuno Rodrigues Dos Santos, PSD, 206 votes in favor, 35 against and 7 abstentions;

Antonio Arnaut, Socialist Party, 125 in favor, 117 against and 6 abstentions;

Martins Canaverde, Social Democratic Center Party, 200 votes in favor, 36 against and 12 abstentions;

Jose Vitoriano, Communist Party, 132 votes in favor, 110 against and 6 abstentions.

FISCHER, PAHR TALKS CONTINUE; DISAGREEMENT NOTED

AU091342 [Editorial Report AU] Vienna KURIER in German on 9 January 1980 carried on page 3 a report on Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr's condemnation of the Afghanistan aggression at the dinner he gave in Vienna on 7 January, under the headline "Bang at GDR Dinner." The paper claims that when, 1 and 1/2 hours before the dinner, Pahr had been shown the text of Oskar Fischer's toast, which contained a passage defending the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan as a step serving stabilization and peace, he added the following passage to the text of his own toast, which had been prepared well in advance: "The events in Afghanistan are in our opinion incompatible with the policy of detente. They fill us with concern and disappointment and constitute a danger to world peace."

In a juxtaposed brief commentary headlined "Most Appropriate Slap in the Face", Wolfgang Broer says that "Foreign Minister Pahr dealt his GDR counterpart a resounding diplomatic slap in the face," and that although he struck out at the GDR the blow was actually meant for the USSR. "Fischer, who had obvious difficulty in swallowing Pahr's attack, as well as Brezhnev, once more had to take note of the fact that the Alpine republic's neutrality is not an ideological neutrality--even though this may not be to their liking and may not fit in with their wishful thinking," Broer says.

Vienna ARBEITER ZEITUNG in German on 9 January carries on page 4 the following version--attributed to APA, the AUSTRIA PRESS AGENCY--of the additional passage of Pahr's toast dealing with Afghanistan: "In view of the current world political situation I feel compelled to point out the dangers that are threatening the detente efforts. Through sad experience we know that detente is inconceivable without disarmament and without including all regions of the world. In view of the daily growing world-political danger I appeal to all member states of the Warsaw Pact and of NATO to resume their endeavors to carry on detente and to miss no opportunity for opening the constructive dialog that is needed to this end. The events in Afghanistan fill us with concern and disappointment."

The Communist Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German on 9 January frontpages a commentary by Austrian Communist Party Politburo member Erwin Scharf, headlined "Neutrality Also In Times of Crisis." Scharf cites a TASS release of 8 January as saying that only the Afghan people, and no one else, have the right to choose their road of development and adds: "Washington's attempt to deny Afghanistan this right is nothing but a bold interference. The attempt of the leaderships of the Austrian People's Party and the Austrian Socialist Party to take advantage of the situation for propaganda against detente contradicts the commitment to pursue a policy of neutrality."

Fischer Interview

[Text] Vienna--In evident allusion to the situation in Afghanistan and Iran, GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer has cautioned against "allowing oneself to be carried away by one's emotion into ill-considered action." At the end of his 3-day visit to Austria, he told the press in Vienna today that the process of detente, to which there was no sensible alternative, concerned not only Europe but all other regions of the globe. The central problem was military detente, on which the GDR would continue to concentrate in the eighties. Fischer, who was received by Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and Federal President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger, said that the dispatch of Soviet troops to Afghanistan was "fully" covered by the treaty between both countries. The UN General Assembly would certainly find it hard to adopt any decisions against the will of the Afghan Government. "Afghanistan's voice will count for much, and interference in the internal affairs of that country is not possible," he said. Fischer expressed himself in optimistic terms about the deepening of economic relations between the GDR and Austria. He conveyed to Federal Chancellor Kreisky a verbal message from state and party chief Erich Honecker. Nothing has so far been disclosed about its content.

LE MONDE REVIEWS DEVELOPMENTS FUELING GOVERNMENT CRISIS

[Pierre de Vos dispatch: "Danger of a Government Crisis Has Increased"]

[Text] Brussels--Unless something unforeseen happens, the government will resign Thursday. The compromise achieved on the night of 6 January following 15 hours of negotiations has been rejected by two of the five parties represented in the coalition--Andre Cools' French-speaking wing of the Socialist Party and, even more formally, Mrs Antoinette Spaak's Democratic Front of Brussels French Speakers [FDF].

The "completely incomprehensible"--as some people in political circles assert--text of the compromise states that Brussels is not to become a full-fledged region as a result of the implementation of the regionalization plan. The Flemish-speaking Christian People's Party [CVP] clearly demanded this 16 December and has, therefore, been granted its wish.

Several French-speaking ministers promised only to "submit" the plan to their party, not to support it. Therefore, the issue had been decided right from the start. Even though the Flemish parties (Mr Tindemans' CVP and Karel van Miert's Belgian Socialist Party) agreed to the compromise proposed by Mr Martens (who himself represents the CVP), the French-speaking parties were more reticent.

Mr Vanden Boeynants' Christian Social Party [PSC] yielded in view of the present circumstances--they believe that any government crisis would be unthinkable in a country affected by a doctors strike and threatened (according to OECD assessments) with a 15-percent increase in unemployment which is already the highest in the Europe of the Nine (with the exception of Ireland).

The country is drifting, French-speaking Christian Socialists assert. Social security is defaulting--its deficit will exceed 50 billion (Fr6.5 billion) in 1980--and the state budget is on the brink of the precipice. Therefore, it would be better to shelve the "community" issue. "The government," the Christian Social Party president stated, "must continue its action."

Mr Cools' Socialists are more skeptical--they believe that all the problems are intertwined. The concessions demanded from French speakers are excessive, out of proportion with the concessions which the Flemish speakers are to make, the PSC president believes. And a communique issued by the party's Bureau states that the document prepared Sunday night "imposes a renegotiation of all issues in dispute without offering any guarantee that the government declaration will be respected." The Socialist Party has appealed for "solidarity among French-speaking people" and has called a general meeting for Wednesday. A unanimous rejection of Mr Martens' proposals can be expected.

"The Moment of Truth"

As for Mrs Spaak's FDF, it formally vetoed the prime minister's text as early as the night of 7 January. The party's General Council has rejected the compromise prepared in Rue de la Loi, taking the view that French speakers have been asked to make more concessions and that French-speaking people residing in the Brussels suburbs have not even been mentioned in the protocol of the agreement. "The moment of truth" has come, Mrs Spaak stated, expressing the hope that French-speaking Christian Socialists will not "forsake the cause of the inhabitants of Brussels."

Tension has reached such a pitch that the prime minister had to postpone a cabinet meeting scheduled for the morning of 8 January. It seems that Mr Martens' room to maneuver has now been reduced to zero.

[P.L. report: "Ministers Meet All Next Weekend To Avert Fall"]

[Text] Is the political crisis of mid-December going to flare up again in the next few days? In any event, for the moment the government is playing an extremely delicate and decisive game. For two and a half days, last week and the week before, several principal ministerial private secretaries--in fact, one or two representatives per party in the coalition--met to try to reassemble the pieces of a majority seriously fragmented by the Christian People's Party (Flemish wing) [CVP] on 15-16 December.

They are to meet once more all day this Thursday and on Friday. Their target is to draft new proposals on institutional reforms--proposals on which the Council of Ministers will be called upon to neogitate from Saturday onward and no doubt throughout the weekend. In the event of agreement within the ministerial team, each coalition party will study, on Monday, this kind of additional clause to the governmental declaration.

It will then be known whether the political situation, paralyzed since the CVP congress, will be freed and whether the senate commission on institutional reforms, summoned for 9 January, will be able to make a worthwhile resumption to its work on the second phase of reforms and especially on regionalization. Failure will very probably signify the end of the current government formula. Now, at the present state of negotiations, it seems that a rush toward the impossible is occurring once again.

The principal private secretaries' working group must in effect marry water and fire. On the one hand, it must leave intact this second so-called transitional and irreversible phase of the state reform. The French-speaking parties have in effect shown their clear opposition to any questioning of this phase, which is intended to bring about the organization of the country in three regions.

On the other hand, however, it must be supplemented with elements which by their nature guarantee the CVP that this phase in no way preempts the definitive reform of the state nor contains any irreversible element unacceptable to the Flemish side. The difficulty, one suspects, bears essentially on the status of Brussels, which the CVP no longer wants to recognize as an entirely separate third region. For the rest, the tone adopted by the last Flemish CVP congress, not only regarding the capital but also concerning the second phase of the reforms, gives a precise idea of the impasse.

From the very outset, moreover, the CVP principal private secretaries, followed by those of the Belgian Socialist Party (Flemish wing) [BSP], have called into question once more several fundamental points of bill no. 261 which puts into concrete form this transitional and irreversible phase: The principle by which regional ordinances will have the same legal validity as community decrees or national law; the distribution of powers between the regions and the central state and the status retained for Brussels. Concerning the capital, they claimed in particular total administrative autonomy in community matters for aldermen and their own funds, formal means of control in regional matters, Flemish aldermen in each Brussels commune and so forth.

The French-speaking parties reacted quite sternly, although with varying degrees of intensity, pointing out that the division into three regions could not be questioned and that all concessions must be reciprocated. They in their turn demanded guarantees for the Brussels suburbs, a special contribution for Brussels by virtue of its duties as capital and so forth.

Thus the matter has again been about the limits of Brussels. The Christian Social Party [PSC] is said to have proposed a formula aiming at integrating still more the six so-called "accessible" communes in the Brussels region. The Democratic Front of Belgian French Speakers [FDF] is said to have defended a solution similar to the Egmont Pact, aiming to organize different forms of administration for the suburban communes in proportion to the number of French-speaking voters at the next communal elections. The Socialist Party (French-speaking wing) [PS] has upheld both points of view.

On the hierarchy of future national, community and regional norms, the PSC displayed a very open attitude to the CVP, itself taking up a theme developed at the 16 December congress in realising the exercise of regional Flemish and Walldon powers by decree rather than by ordinance, the latter being reserved for Brussels' regional affairs and having less legal force. For their part, the PS and the FDF have opposed this idea.

In general terms, however, the discussion goes on from community to community, setting bloc against bloc almost systematically, without coming to any conclusion as yet. It does not seem as though negotiations have even begun seriously on any point whatsoever.

The discussion is to resume this Thursday based on a first note of synthesis drafted by the prime minister's principal private secretary, which already seems to have aroused negative reactions in the French-speaking camp. They reproach him for allegedly giving priority consideration to points asked for by the Flemings and with favoring the Dutch-speakers' point of view.

In this respect, certain people have been wondering whether the working group is not finally destined to serve above all as a screen for the prime minister to present new proposals to his partners and to try to renegotiate the government's declaration. In any case, the question being asked in the world of politics is whether he is going to plead the cause of the CVP before the other coalition parties, or indeed whether he is going to impose respect for earlier government accords. If people expect him to sit skillfully on the fence there is also the fear from the French-speaking side that, having been indirectly disowned by his own party, Mr Martens might try above all to get a reprieve from that party by snatching several fresh concessions from the French-speakers.

Whatever may be the case, one week away from the fateful date of 9 January the most extreme positions put forward in their respective camps by the CVP and FDF seem once more totally irreconcilable. Most observers believe a kind of miracle is necessary to get the governmental cart out of the ruts.

SPOKESMAN DISCUSSES CABINET MEETING ON AFGHAN CRISIS

DW092032 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 1050 GMT 9 Jan 80 DW

[Text] [Question] What we are interested in is one subject, which certainly figured in the Federal Cabinet meeting--that is, the crisis in Afghanistan.

[Answer] Yes, Federal Minister Genscher and State Secretary Van Well from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs reported in detail on the development of the crisis in Iran [as heard] from its initial stages. They outlined its world-political effects and there was a long debate on it, that is to say that various federal ministers asked informative questions.

To begin with, I would like to briefly sum up the outcome of the Cabinet meeting: First, we observed with satisfaction that the debate in the United Nations on the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan, which is violating international law, actually resulted in a rather unanimous shaping of opinion in the Security Council, with the exception of the representatives of the Soviet Union and the GDR. The other states represented in the Security Council, including those of the Third World, actually are of the view that one must not tolerate this intervention by the Soviet Union. Though there has not been any condemnation because of the Soviet veto, speeches clearly show the stance taken on the matter in the Third World. Here, strictly speaking, a change in attitude within the Third World toward the Soviet Union is being continued at an accelerated pace, particularly in the Mideast region.

What also was explained is the change in relations between the United States and Pakistan. It was reiterated that the Federal Government now will intensify its long-standing course aimed at political and economic cooperation with the countries of the Third World. I say political and economic, deliberately excluding the military field, because we adhere to principles in the field of military cooperation which limit us to the NATO alliance.

Moreover, the Cabinet showed certain satisfaction with the fact that, irrespective of some criticism voiced on particular points, three opposition spokesmen yesterday joined the government in its view that a realistic detente policy actually is even more important and that it ought to be continued. We are quite satisfied with this since voices had been heard in the opposition which deliberately seemed to create the impression that detente policy in Central Europe should now be put into the drawer of history and not be touched anymore.

'Realistic' Detente Policy Supported

[Excerpts] Bonn--The Federal Government will continue the "realistic" policy of detente even though it regards the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan as a real danger and challenge. This was stressed today by Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald after the Federal Cabinet, presided over by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, met for 2 hours to discuss the situation in Afghanistan and the resulting consequences. It was also announced today that the meeting of the German-Soviet Economic Commission scheduled for the end of January has been postponed indefinitely at Moscow's request.

the Soviet commission chairman and Deputy Premier Tikhonov gave the official reason to the Federal Economics Ministry. With regard to this, Gruenewald told the press that it was clear that, due to the illness of Premier Kosygin, Tikhonov was in heavy demand elsewhere. A new date would be sought at working level.

According to Gruenewald, the Federal Government still feels it appropriate that the United Nations concern itself with Moscow's intervention and that Third World countries be offered political and economic cooperation. The Cabinet noted with satisfaction that CDU politicians Helmut Kohl, Ernst Albrecht and Alois Mertes have made it clear, despite some individual criticisms, that they also believe a realistic policy of detente should be continued.

Genscher was briefed today by the Federal Republic's ambassador to Moscow, Hans Georg Wieck, who was recalled [as received] to Bonn, on the attitude of the Soviet leadership. Wieck is to be present on Thursday at a meeting of the Federal Security Council to discuss the Afghan crisis. According to official reports, he will return to Moscow next week.

According to Government Spokesman Gruenewald, the Federal Government shares the U.S. assessment of the situation and harbors no doubts that the Western countries must respond in a "concerted" manner. However, this might not mean "parallel action in each individual case." The government spokesman mentioned as an example the fact that the Federal Republic does not export grain to the Soviet Union and has therefore not been consulted by Washington on sanctions in grain deliveries.

Franz Josef Strauss, the CDU/CSU chancellor-candidate, has called for "partner-like solidarity" between Europe and the United States. At a New Year's reception in Munich, Strauss said the dramatic events in Iran and Afghanistan have made it brutally clear how quickly the political climate in the world can change.

WEST GERMAN-SOVIET ECONOMICS MEETING POSTPONED

[Text] Bonn--The meeting of the German-Soviet Economic Commission scheduled for the end of January has, at Moscow's request, been postponed indefinitely. A spokesman for the Federal Economics Ministry in Bonn announced today that the official reason for the postponement given by the Soviet commission chairman, Tikhonov, was difficulties regarding the date. Government circles in Bonn, however, are not excluding the possibility that this cancellation is connected with the present crisis regarding Afghanistan and the ensuing tensions in East-West relation.

Apparently, the postponement of this meeting of the commission, which is chaired on the German side by Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, is not unwelcome to the Federal Government. This is the conclusion of observers based on a ministry spokesman's statement that the delay in talks was "by mutual agreement."

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON SECURITY, DETENTE POLICY ISSUES

DW092147 Stuttgart Sueddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1140 GMT 9 Jan 80 DW

[Text] [Question] Are the government coalition and opposition now pulling together in their stance toward the Soviet Union after CDU Chairman Kohl yesterday [word indistinct] a consensus?

[Answer] There has been a remarkable and likewise positive conformity of all factions of the German Bundestag on important questions related to security policy in the Bundestag's last debate of 1979. At first it appeared as if some opposition speakers wanted to demand a change in the Federal Government's realistic detente policy. After statements I have heard now from Messrs Kohl and Albrecht as well as from [words indistinct] it actually seems to be like this: that the opposition, too, is interested--and I appreciate this--in continuing the realistic detente policy and, above all--and this is important for security policy--to further follow up NATO's arms control offer of 12 and 14 December 1979. I believe that [word indistinct] of course must concede to an opposition that it is critical of the government's policy. That is its task. This even can entail an advantage for a country in the foreign policy field. But if we were to reach further agreement on the basic line, namely, that we [word indistinct] our policy of arms control with the objective of achieving and securing equilibrium on a rather low level of armament, if we were to be further agreed on this target, then this would be an extremely positive result for our country because, on this issue, conformity also prevails between the Federal Government and its allies.

[Question] But dissenting views seem to remain, namely, with regard to sanctions against the Soviet Union. Opposition leader Helmut Kohl said yesterday that the Federal Republic, too, must impose such sanctions, if possible, and must not let the United States down.

[Answer] Neither the Federal Government nor any of its allies intends to go back on the United States. We favor solidarity with the United States. This is what is being discussed in the alliance and I believe that, likewise, the discussion of this question in the Foreign Affairs Committee this Friday will show that there certainly will not be any differences of opinion between the government and the opposition.

[Question] Have any decisions to this end been made by the Cabinet today?

[Answer] The Cabinet today discussed the situation resulting from events in Afghanistan. That was the second intensive discussion in the Cabinet. We also dealt with developments in the United Nations. And tomorrow the Federal Security Council will have to discuss in detail the currently emerging issues.

[Question] Do you believe that any new developments are expected for the near future?

[Answer] You ought to tell me first what you mean by new developments. I believe that what matters for us now is to consistently continue our policy. And the citizens ought to know that we are an important partner in the Western alliance, that we are doing everything in conjunction with our allies regarding NATO's long-term defense program for our security and the security of Europe. This is a chance to observe that we are doing and will continue to do everything necessary for our security within the framework of our membership in the alliance.

On Invasion of Afghanistan

[Text] Bonn--In view of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has spoken out in favor of preserving and strengthening the independence of Third World countries.

In an article published by the Foreign Office in BUNTE ILLUSTRIERTE on Wednesday, Genscher stresses that Soviet power policy against a small nation has shaken the basic principles of peaceful coexistence between nations. It also has affected the indivisibility of detente and the building of confidence between East and West.

At the same time, Genscher advocates the continuance of the peace policy toward the East, despite present events. "We, at any rate, do not want to return to a cold war. No one would suffer more than Germany."

Genscher draws particular attention to the exposed position of the Federal Republic "at the junction between East and West." Its integration into the European Community and North Atlantic alliance has remained "basic to our existence." The foreign minister said: "I hope that those who doubted the soundness of the NATO decisions in December 1979 will have learned better after Soviet intervention in Afghanistan."

CARSTENS APPEALS FOR RELEASE OF HOSTAGES IN IRAN

[Excerpt] Bonn--Federal President Karl Carstens appealed to those responsible in Iran to finally release the hostages who have been held in the U.S. Embassy for over 2 months.

During the traditional New Year's reception for the diplomatic corps in Bonn today he also expressed concern about the events in Afghanistan. He stressed that the FRG supports all UN attempts to obtain immediate withdrawal of all troops.

The federal president stressed the FRG's readiness to actively cooperate in the UN's disarmament efforts. He advocated at the same time a broad dialog between East and West in order to utilize the opportunities for detente. He said that the continuation of the European Security Conference with the CSCE followup conference in Madrid is of great importance.

SPD'S PAWELCZYK COMMENTS ON U.S. VISIT, DETENTE

DW081300 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0410 GMT 7 Jan 80 DW

[Telephone interview by correspondent Heribert Schwan with Alfons Pawelczyk, chairman of the Bundestag Disarmament Subcommittee and SPD Bundestag member, in Washington; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Yesterday you arrived in the American capital for a 1-week visit. What is the purpose of your visit to America?

[Answer] I come here two or three times a year to have talks. I regularly have these talks with the departments of state and defense here as well as with some White House representatives. I am commissioned to do this by our faction. It is a matter of coordination with regard to political problems on which I have to work.

[Question] Yes, and that mainly involves disarmament policy. The Federal Government has shown understanding for Carter's orders to temporarily postpone the ratification of the SALT II agreement by the U.S. Senate. Do you, does your party--the SPD--have understanding for Carter's action?

[Answer] We have understanding for it. We believe, however, that SALT II cannot be shelved. The situation for ratifying SALT II has become more complicated.

As before, SALT II serves our interests because the negotiations that must be held on SALT III are negotiations directly involving European security interests in the nuclear arms field. You know that on 12 December we made a NATO decision which basically says that we cannot just look on as the Soviet Union continues its armament in the field of nuclear medium-range missiles without taking any military countermeasures ourselves. We expressed in our decision, however, that we would like to fully renounce additional nucelar arms if possible, that is, if the Soviet Union will compromise with us to the extent that our security needs are safeguard. All this will naturally be possible only if the SALT process if continued.

[Question] Have not the Afghanistan events made these considerations obsolete? In other words, is there not a completely new situation today, particularly since Moscow rejected the NATO offer to negotiate on the limitation of the medium-range potential?

[Answer] Yes, we must be careful in these hectic times that all the agreed upon policies between NATO and the Warsaw Pact and within NATO--aimed at the creation of security through action in the field of defense policy, namely in the field of detente policy [sentence unfinished]. It is clear that the Soviet Union, with its action in Afghanistan at any rate, has endangered peace in that region and that it has gravely violated a people's right to self-dtermination. One cannot accpet it just like that. But we cannot look on either or cooperate in the taking of measures that would make us relapse into cold war. It means that in all decisions that will be made, one--the door must be kept open for the continuation of a policy of cooperation, and two--we must not nail shut all the doors through which the Soviet Union must go if it wants to withdraw from the area it has invaded.

[Question] There is the catchword, cold war. Many polticial observers say that there is a relapse into cold war, meaning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the possible reactions of America and the West. America reacted sharply to the Soviet intervention. How do you assess the drastic measures by the U.S. Government?

[Answer] I have not yet had any talks here. One reason for my stay here is naturally because I want to hear precise explanations pertaining to the exact background as well as to the planned measures. It was naturally the right thing to do at the moment, namely, to react sharply to the Soviet Union. I am interested in the planned continuation of this policy. I think that, after an initial hard reaction to the Soviet Union, the things I just mentioned must be made possible.

It is so easy to say that we live in new times and that we will not relapse into cold war. At the moment nobody is asking very much about the consequences. The consequences of relapsing into cold war would be most complicated, difficult and dangerous for Europe, for the Germans in Europe. We are located exactly on the line between the spheres of influence of both big powers. We must guarantee, together with our alliance partners, freedom for 2.4 million people in West Berlin. We must see to it that the reunification of families will continue to take place in the future. We, Germany--the Federal Republic and the GDR together--are a country on whose territory more soldiers and arms are located than in all other regions of this world. So the hazards and dangers of a cold war would be much greater for this region.

I also want to point out the following: After the Cuban affair of 1962 began a phase of limited cooperation between the Soviet Union and the United States because the Cuban affair clearly demonstrated the dimensions of a continued escalation of cold war, but SALT I was ratified despite the Vietnam war. We must watch out that this dimension of continuing and implementing a security policy aimed at calming down that region does not get out of control. [as heard]

[Question] If I understand you correctly, you plead for and believe that detente policy is divisible?

[Answer] What does this mean, divisible? We have always believed that our kind of detente policy must be aimed at coming to terms in those regions with the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact, in those limited regions where understanding is possible and where treaties can be concluded. On the basis of limited cooperation one ought to try to achieve some progress. We or I do not think much of every attempted cooperation which is aimed at having the calming down of a situation in a certain region being linked with another region.

DIE WELT DETAILS BONN ANALYSIS OF USSR GEOPOLITICAL STRATEGY

[Report by Bonn correspondent Manfred Schell]

[Text] Alarming reports are kept in the files of the Federal Government on the political and military aims of the Soviet Union on the southern half of the globe. Moscow's long-term plans to achieve control over raw material sources, particularly in southern Africa, are aimed frontally against economic stability in the FRG and the other Western countries: A longer interruption of chromium supplies from that region, for example, of just 30 percent would endanger 6.8 million jobs in our area. Another 14 million unemployed would be created by a supply gap of manganese and asbestos. DIE WELT publishes the most important results of these analyses which have been kept secret so far and which were concluded prior to the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops.

According to information gathered particularly by the Federal Defense Minitry and the Federal Ministry of Economics, three primary intentions on the part of Moscow can be seen:

1. The Soviet Union is concentrating its immediate efforts on political and military support for bringing direct influence to bear on the inner-African area, for example through arms supplies, the dispatching of military experts on the landing or airlifting of "proxy troops."

2. With a view to the future, the Kremlin is trying to implement goepolitical shifts in the areas of the Indian Ocean, the Atlantic and southern Africa by aiming for control of local raw material sources and transport routes.

3. Experts believe it must be assumed that the Soviet Union has "offensive ideas" of "using in due time a direct threat to the Cape route as a political means."

A direct military strike by the Soviet Union, Cuba or other communist countries against South Africa, says the analysis, is currently unlikely because of the quality and quantity of the South African Armed Forces and for other reasons.

The engagement of the Soviet Union in Africa, which could be seen for the first time between 1960 and 1962, is based on two pillars: A. on ideological-political considerations; B. on arms economy relations, which are an important foreign policy instrument for the Soviet Union. With generous financial conditions for the purchase of arms, Moscow "obviously aims for as far-reaching a control as possible of the political and military actions of the receiving country," says the analysis. "In order to achieve this aim, contracts having consultation commitments are being concluded.

The quality of arms supplied by the Soviet Union is not below the quality of arms that have been made available to other Warsaw Pact members. Military aid is being declared as arms assistance, training assistance or technical support. "In doing this the Soviet Union in the past 20 to 25 years created a worldwide network of military-technical relations; in matters of arms technology and arms economy it dominated not just the Warsaw Pact, but to a certain extent the nonsocialist states of the Third World as well.

The value of the arms supplied probably amounts to DM20 to DM22 billion. The official report says: Worldwide some 75 noncommunist states have arms and equipment. Some 42 states have large military equipment--from states of the Soviet bloc, so that every tension area of the world can use arms from the production of the Soviet bloc.

The Bonn analysis views with increasing concern the maritime strategy of the Soviet Union. The military strategy of the area created by the Indian Ocean, the Atlantic and southern Africa is expressed by the race of the big powers to watch it as completely as possible using reconnaissance systems. After the loss of installations in Somalia (Berbera), the Soviet Union will try hard to offset the lead of the United States with its bases in Australia, Diego Garcia, the Indian Ocean and the Seychelles. This would include land-based installations, intensified electronic activities of its trade and research ships and intensification of the network of satellites. It is important in this connection that at least one part of the Soviet research ships carry out purely military tasks such as, for example, measurements for the use of submarines.

The "expansive fleet policy" of the Soviet Union is demonstrated by several examples. Since 1970 it supported the setup of the Armed Forces of South Yemen and dispatched naval advisers. In 1973 Moscow achieved, on the basis of a treaty, exploitation rights for its fishery boats in the Port of Aden. In November 1977 a bigger floating dockyard was transported, among other things, to Aden, a dockyard that has been used before for the repair of Soviet warships in Somalia. Since then Aden is being used as a stopover for arms shipments to Ethiopia.

The action in South Yemen seems to be repeated now by the Soviet Union in Beira (Mozambique) in order to intensify relations with the state which have existed since 1963. Beira does not have modern repair shipyards, but Cuban technicians are said to be engaged in development work in the ports of Nacala and Maputo, something that undoubtedly indicates Soviet interests.

Moscow acted similarly in Guinea also. The Port of Conakry serves, since the end of 1970, as a basis for Soviet naval forces. A fuel deposit is said to exist in Conakry for their support.

In Angola the port and the airport of Luanda is said to be used by Soviet ships and planes. "Increasing Soviet efforts to bring influence to bear have been observed recently in Madagascar and on the Seychelles as well. The Seychelles maintain close relations with socialist Tanzania and with the strong Marxist opposition in Mauritius. Through a sea and air landing agreement concluded in 1970 the Soviet Union created the prerequisites for the fact that Port Luis, the main port, among others, serves as a basis for the Soviet fishery fleet.

The Soviets have also shown interest in the Cape Verde Islands, particularly since there is an important port and the naval base on Mindelo as well as the Sal Airport. That group of islands would be an excellent basis for Soviet troops transports to southern Africa. The Canary Islands further to the north have been supply bases in past years for the Soviet fishery fleet operating in the Atlantic. Some of the islands have been used for communications and other purposes. Other opportunities for obtaining port rights exist for the Soviets in the Port of Sao Tome, says the analysis, which concludes:

It turns out, on the whole, that the existence of Soviet naval bases in Africa is of considerable importance for threatening the Cape route and for the strategic balance of the superpowers, since submarines equipped with missiles and strategic bombers can operate from African bases against the United States. The maritime capabilities of the Soviet Union represent the potential for supporting their own political intentions in that area (through intimidation of the governments involved and prevention of interference by third parties), for direct military action in areas of war and crisis, and for controlling and interfering in naval and communications routes.

In southern Africa the political goals of the Soviet Union--says the study--are aimed at bringing influence to bear on black African states and on safeguarding or developing new military bases. This is supposed particularly to block off the influence of the United States in that area, "in order to be able in the long run to bring influence to bear on the raw material sources of the Western industrial states." Important raw materials and oil are being produced in countries that are located 7,000 to 14,000 nautical miles away from the Western consumer countries. The Cape route is the most important transport route for them for the foreseeable future, despite the opening of the Suez Canal. Currently about 500 to 600 ships pass the Cape every month; 120 to 130 tankers a month use that route coming from the Persian Gulf. It means that at present about 65 to 70 percent of West European crude oil imports are being transported over the Cape route as well as some 30 percent of important raw material imports, some 25 percent of West European food imports and some 50 percent of West European exports of investment and consumer goods.

In addition to the [already] described motives of Soviet foreign policy, the Soviet Union for itself and for its allies has a military-strategic interest in a military presence in the Indian Ocean that is based on the following: concern about the stationing of American nuclear submarines in the Indian Ocean. Since American submarines have been equipped with Polaris A-3 missiles, a part of Soviet territory could be within their range. The strategic importance of the Indian Ocean will increase considerably when the first American submarines of the Trident class are equipped with intercontinental missiles (with a range of about 7,000 kilometers) and put into operation. Another Moscow motive for a military presence in that area is the protection of their own trade and fishery fleets, including nautical research, which stresses the importance of the Cape route for Soviet naval traffic since this is the only naval connection between the European and Far Eastern parts of the Soviet Union which is ice-free all year round.

The analysis goes on to say: This does not rule out the possibility that the Soviet Union may have offensive ideas for safeguarding these interests by applying the Cape route threat as a political means in due time. For the time being, however, military actions are unlikely because of weak logistical support in that area and the escalating effects it could have on an East-West conflict. Particularly, it cannot be assumed at present that the Soviet leadership would be prepared to run the respective risks.

The analysis points out in detail the dramatic effects such a Soviet influence brought to bear on southern Africa could have for the FRG economy. Our economy greatly depends on the import of mineral raw materials from that region. A 30 percent cut in chromium imports, for example, would reduce the gross domestic production by 27 percent and endanger 6.8 million jobs. In case of a similar cut in manganese and asbestos, another 7 million jobs would be endangered in the fields of each of these two raw materials. [paragraph continues]

Present statistics of the Federal Ministry of Economy show that chromium reserves will last for 97 days, titanium reserves for 58 days and manganese for 22 days. Supplies, however, have been set up solely according to the interests of enterprises.

FRG TO EXAMINE CASES OF REFUSED ENTRY

[Excerpt] Berlin--As part of the preparations for the meeting planned between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Chairman of the GDR Council of State Erich Honecker, the Federal Government intends to look carefully into the problem of cases of refused entry to the GDR under the travel and visiting arrangements. This was stated by Guenter Huonker, minister of state at the Chancellor's Office in a written reply to Berlin CDU Deputy Peter Rzepka who has been refused entry by the East Berlin authorities since last November. Huonker pointed out that not only the Berlin senator in charge of travel and visits but also the Federal Government has made representations to the GDR Government concerning cases of entry into the GDR being refused.

U.S. MEASURES AGAINST USSR SEEN AS ONLY A BEGINNING

[Thomas Kielinger article: "Sanctions, Lessons"]

[Text] Hopefully the advisers of President Carter who submitted to him the option of punitive measures against the Soviet action in Afghanistan have simultaneously noted what little effect such steps elicit on a short-term basis. It would be too easy, given American awareness and the political training of the President, to see a substitute for long-term strategies in sudden acts of national determination. The actual job in efforts toward the development of a new "containment" policy vis-a-vis Moscow is still ahead.

Grain, technology, fishing rights, cultural exchange: Decades would have to pass in dealing with the Russians before their cancellations would start to show an effect. There are escapes for most boycott measures. Little Rhodesia resisted the UN economic embargo for 14 years. The Russians have always had to exercise a tightening of their belts.

Yet a wholesome psychological effect emanates toward the inside, into American society, from the measures which President Carter announced Friday. After a long time it is the first lesson to show again that world political involvement might demand its price. The Americans had to bleed in Vietnam for so long, so profusely and so unsuccessfully that they really got sick of the idea of having to surrender something for the confounded foreign policy.

Yet, in their national feeling of self-esteem, they are still living off the idea of representing the principle of hope in the world, of being the leading power of freedom in general. Such a claim cannot be maintained without costing something. Moral sermons, if scratched only a bit, very soon expose the fresco underneath: It is withdrawal, lack of political means, power policy renunciation. This is how the United States lived through the post-Vietnam years, and due to this mentality it surrendered itself to a President in 1976 who, for 3 years, doled out the very medicine asked for in the beginning by the country that had grown to shirk risks.

This is now beginning to change. But measures such as those announced by Carter only represent a satisfaction of the immediate requirement of becoming credible again with regard to world politics. It is a swig from the "we-still-are-somebody-too" bottle. No more. The contours of the new world to which the United States will have to adapt are already beginning to take shape: It is the return to a confrontation policy which was thought overcome through the era of detente. It is the shift of the East-West tension which had been hanging suspended over theaters like Berlin for a long time, to the Middle East and its direct neighbors along the Persian Gulf and the Himalayas.

Thus, the script is being pushed brutally aside to which the industrial nations and the Third World had already begun to grow accustomed: the North-South conflict and the valiant attempts to get a grip on it. The invasion of Afghanistan by the Red Army shifts the world political coordinates: The United States must again adapt to the old adversary with enhanced imagination, increased force of determination and enhanced will for defense, whether it likes it or not.

This spells far-reaching sacrifices and duties if this country still wishes to raise its claim to being a model and anchor of freedom.

First: It must build a military presence in the Near and Middle East which will be capable of deterring any further advance of the Russians into countries immediately adjacent to the Gulf or the Indian Ocean. The aid to Pakistan is only the beginning. The negotiations on military bases as offered by Oman, Somalia and so forth are more promising. The time of bashful rejection of such a presence are past. Congress above all should comprehend this. It is necessary to install a tripwire in that region, a "flexible response" there also, which if crossed will cost the Russians as dearly as would an identical step in Western Europe.

Second: The "up and down on the world political escalator" (Henry Kissinger) which the United States practiced in the seventies must make room for a course of predictable reliability beyond even the change of administrations. In 1972, on Christmas, Nixon had bombs dropped on Hanoi--in 1979, on Christmas, the only bells ringing in the United States were bells of good hope for a happy end in Tehran. These swings of the political pendulum are too extreme.

Last New Year's Eve Jimmy Carter made many of his compatriots pale when he naively admitted that events in Afghanistan had changed his view of Moscow more than anything he had seen of the Soviet Union during the preceding 3 years. On what, one cannot but ask onself with a start, has his Ostpolitik been based to date?

So far the line that is dead sure to get applause in any Carter speech has been the remark that under his administration "not one drop of American blood has been shed to this day." Such a strategic ultima ratio [last reckoning] for a people of 220 million, is fit only for a resignation from world politics for good. Such signals did not have any particularly deterrent effect on the Soviets, nor on Ayatollah Khomeyni.

Third: One long-term sacrifice continues to be an energy policy which will bring more White House pressure to bear on the U.S. consumer and on the U.S. Congress. The dependence on energy imports weakens the position of this country at the core.

At the turn of the years 1979/1980 Jimmy Carter has been taught additional lessons in the subject of world politics. It is sad indeed that another country had to be occupied by the Soviets before an American President comprehended what is going on.

CORSICAN SEPARATISTS SEIZE HOSTAGES; DEMONSTRATIONS REPORTED

[Text] Ajaccio, Corsica, Jan 9, REUTER--A group of armed Corsican separatists took about 30 people hostage in a hotel in central Ajaccio today, police said. They said about 40 separatists entered the hotel early today and prevented clients and staff from leaving. Security forces cordoned off the area. Corsica has been shaken by violence in recent years as autonomists campaigned for independence from the French mainland. Hundreds of bomb attacks occurred in the Mediterranean island last year.

Yesterday security forces scoured the Corsican mountains searching for a band of armed separatists holding three men they claim are undercover policemen. The police said the group fled when security forces tried to free the hostages, held in the village of Bastelica since Sunday. The separatists holding the hotel hostages are members of the Union du Peuple Corse (UPC), an organization fighting for Corsican autonomy. According to first reports, most of them came from Bastelica where security forces arrested about 20 people last night in connection with the weekend kidnapping of the three alleged undercover policemen. The security forces moved into the village 25 miles (40 km) north of Ajaccio, yesterday afternoon but the separatists managed to escape into the mountains with their three hostages.

Riot Police Stationed

[Summary] The situation is still very tense in Ajaccio. At 0600 armed riot police took up positions in the streets surrounding the hotel occupied by the group of Corsician nationalists. For the moment the presence of two hostages in the hotel has not been confirmed. A short while ago the Corsican nationalists denied that they were there but the police believe that one of the prisoners is being held on the spot and may possible be used as a bargaining counter. The other, it is believed, is still being held captive in the brush. The Corsican nationalists are demanding an inquiry into Corsican problems and the activities of the "parallel police" of the island.

Further Developments

[Summary] Tensions are running high in Ajaccio. A group of the Bastelica autonomists last night shut themselves up in a downtown hotel along with one of the hostages. This morning the Southern Corsican prefect stated that the 10 or so hotel guests should also be considered hostages. One of the guests, a Corsican, was able to leave the hotel at about 1000 to deliver a letter--the contents of which are unknown--from the hotel guests to authorities. The other autonomists who went underground are still holding two more hostages. The State Security Court has been informed of the situation. (Dr Edmond Sieoni) has offered to mediate the affair.

Demonstrations, Police Exchange Fire

[Summary] One security policeman was killed and two more were injured in Ajaccio in an exchange of fire with demonstrators. We do not have many details yet about the tragedy but it seems that it all happened near the Ajaccio Prefecture. Calm reigns near the hotel where the Corsican autonomists are holding hostage 11 hotel guests and two other men.

Deaths, Injuries Reported

[Summary] The bishop of Ajaccio, Monsignor Jean-Charles Thomas, and the town's mayor have been at the Prefecture of Southern Corsica since 0400 this morning: They are asking the authorities to find an urgent solution for restoring calm to Ajaccio. Some unrest is reported at the doors of the Fresch High School in Ajaccio where various groups of about 300 pupils are refusing to enter the building. A resumption of mediation between the Fresch Hotel and the Prefecture seems to be underway: The chairman of the departmental Federation of Farmers Trade Unions of Southern Corsica was again admitted into the hotel this morning. As a result of last night's events three people died and five were injured, three seriously. Ajaccio had a siege atmosphere this morning. The Bastelica nationalists have been holding about 10 hotel guests hostage for 26 hours now; the autonomists are demanding the release of their comrades arrested in Bastelica.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON AFGHAN SITUATION

[Excerpts] Today's Cabinet meeting was devoted mainly to social and economic issues. And, as Dominique Souchier reports, Afghanistan was also discussed.

Elysee spokesman Pierre Hunt has just issued a statement. The events which have occurred in Afghanistan, the government declares, are contrary to the fundamental principles governing international life and the policy of France, which explains our vote in the Security Council. These events, the communique adds, have harmed the policy of detente, a policy to which France is attached sincerely but not unconditionally. France, for its part, does not intend to abandon this quest for detente which is of reciprocal interest; there is, moreover, no alternative other than to cold war. But, the government concludes, France considers it indispensable that the confidence necessary for the continuation of detente be restored through positive gestures, regarding in particular the right of the Afghan people to determine their own destiny.

There you have this statement which will, of course, be at the center of the talks which the president is to hold with Chancellor Schmidt this afternoon--a statement by the French Government which could well become the joint position of the Nine toward these events in Afghanistan and whose theme is simple: Detente does not rule out firmness.

SCHMIDT, GISCARD MEET TO DISCUSS MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

LD091444 Hamburg DPA in German 1415 GMT 9 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Paris--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing met in Paris today for an exchange of views on the crisis in the Middle East. The discussion, which was arranged at short notice, follows the chancellor's official visit to Madrid. The two leaders are expected to deal with the situation in Afghanistan following the Soviet invasion and the chances of continuing the policy of detente as desired by Bonn and Paris. Giscard and Schmidt probably will also discuss the situation in Iran. No information on the results of the discussion is expected to be given to the public.

Comment on Meeting

[Text] Paris, Jan 9 (AFP)--Talks between West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and President Valery Giscard d'Estaing this afternoon brought together the thinking of French and German analysts on current problems in Iran, in Afghanistan and in the European Community, a presidential spokesman said. President Giscard d'Estaing reportedly said that the meeting was extremely useful, in part because current circumstances make [word indistinct] study by European nations of their common positions especially necessary. Deputy presidential spokesman Jacques Blot said the exchange of views will be continued in the coming weeks at the appropriate levels. North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) foreign ministers are scheduled to meet next Tuesday in Brussels.

The object of the Giscard-Schmidt meeting was to bring both leaders up to date on subjects of mutual interest, Mr. Blot said, adding that Mr. Giscard d'Estaing reviewed French Government statements on Afghanistan events made public at the end of today's Cabinet meeting. On leaving the presidential palace, Mr. Schmidt said the meeting had been friendly and direct, but he declined, when asked, to say whether Paris and Bonn had adopted a common position toward Moscow in the Central Asian crisis. President Giscard d'Estaing yesterday had a telephone talk with U.S. President Jimmy Carter, discussing Iran and Afghanistan. The West German chancellor, who arrived in Paris from Madrid at the beginning of the afternoon, was expected to be back in Bonn later today.

GISCARD: FRANCE WILL NOT SEND WHEAT TO USSR

[Excerpts] The situation in Afghanistan has provoked a new and very strong reaction from American President Jimmy Carter, who denounces the ever-increasing aggression of the Soviet Union. For Carter, Afghanistan in 1980 is even more serious than Budapest in 1956 or Prague in 1968. On the line from Washington is France-INTER's special correspondent Denis Poncet:

The head of the executive took the opportunity to stress the support of the international community and, in particular, that of President Valery Giscard d'Estaing who, during a telephone conversation assured President Carter that France would not deliver wheat to the Soviet Union. Yes, and, in addition, President Giscard d'Estaing had a telephone conversation with Jimmy Carter yesterday. Today the president is receiving West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to try and define a joint stand toward the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

PCF COMMUNIQUE ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION, AFGHANISTAN

[Apparent text of 4 January "PCF Politburo Communique"]

[Excerpt] The Politburo examined certain aspects of the international situation.

Giscard d'Estaing is overdramatizing the situation. He wants to distract attention from the real problems facing France and the French people. He hopes to obtain a kind of holy alliance by which the workers would agree to contribute to their own excessive exploitation.

In fact the world's present development is characterized mainly by peoples' thrust toward independence, control of their resources, a better life, freedom and socialism.

Peoples are struggling in growing numbers because they reject the inhuman situation of inequality, poverty and plunder, and this movement is causing a crisis in the imperialist countries faced with increasingly insoluble problems.

As our 23rd congress stressed, imperialism does not yield without a fight. In an attempt to safeguard its positions it is resorting to measures which are causing international tension.

The United States with its Euromissiles is reviving the arms race. This decision is arousing growing anger in West Europe. The United States is postponing the ratification of the SALT agreements. It is increasingly interfering, exerting pressure and intervening in various regions of the world. It is unleashing its ideological war.

Despite these dangers, peoples' struggle and the already considerable change in the balance of international forces lead us to see more reasons for confidence than for pessimism in the present situation. We reject the resignation and submission which Giscard claims are justified by this situation. We are fighting.

The acute class struggle of the present period prompts us to strengthen the people's movement for disarmament and detente, for a new world system based on justice, respect for peoples and men. It makes us determined to step up our initiatives for specific progress toward these great human objectives.

This general analysis sheds light on the events in Afghanistan. In the past few years the Afghan people have chosen a progressive path. U.S. imperialism is trying, directly or indirectly, to oppose this people's movement and even to recover its lost ground.

We reaffirm the PCF's unswerving attachment to the principles of peoples' sovereignty and freedom to determine their future and to noninterference. We take account of each country's right to request aid from an ally to resist foreign interference.

It is with these principles in mind that we learned of the Soviet Government's explanations that it responded to an appeal--in accordance with the UN Charter and the Soviet-Afghan friendship treaty--for Soviet aid against a rebellion supported from outside.

We also noted the Afghan Government's statements in which it announced the release of political prisoners, stated its intention to follow a policy of progress carrying a guarantee of public freedom, individual rights and respect for religions, and declared its support for establishing good-neighborly and peaceful relations with all neighboring countries.

Our party, which traditionally shows solidarity with progressive and people's forces fighting for independence, democracy and socialism, hopes that this democratic process will develop rapidly and enable the Afghan people to insure their march toward progress in complete sovereignty and peace. The PCF is following the situation closely.

In keeping with the 23D congress our party and its secretary general have engaged in intense international activity recently.

George Marchais has visited Yugoslavia, Algeria, Poland, Nicaragua and Cuba. He has met with Yasir Arafat and the POLISARIO leaders. Tomorrow he leaves for Italy for talks with Enrico Berlinguer. Next week he will head a PCF delegation to the Soviet Union.

In these visits and meetings the secretary general is primarily concerned with the struggle for independence and democracy and the fight against poverty and for a new international system. He has paid and is paying the closest possible attention to everything which concerns freedom, cooperation between peoples, disarmament and the consolidation of peace.

LE FIGARO SCORES 'SPINELESSNESS' OF WEST

[Max Clos article: "Spinelessness"]

[Text] Iran and Afghanistan represent two major setbacks for the free world, but the free world is barely aware of it.

In Tehran the 50 U.S. Embassy hostages are entering their third month of captivity under unbearable conditions, and there is no sign of their release. A religious fanatic has undertaken to humiliate the West and to demonstrate that the United States is truly a paper tiger. This demonstration is not entirely ineffective.

In Kabul 50,000 Soviets troops are exterminating the "rebels," branded as "terrorist bandits." With disconcerting cynicism, Moscow explains that the troops intervened at the request of the legal government (the very government which the troops brought along in their trucks) to establish at last a "socialist" and "democratic" system in a "liberated" country.

What does the West do? It deplores, condemns, invokes major principles and appeals to the Security Council. Mr Carter takes great care to make it known that the use of force is ruled out and that the United States could not consider halting the food supplies without which the attackers would die of starvation. No, the U.S. President is counting on gaining a decisive victory: the condemnation of the ayatollah and Brezhnev by the "international community."

The tragedy is that the West seems sincerely convinced by this nonsense, failing to realize that this condemnation--supposing it does take place, which is not even certain--would not change anything at all either in Tehran or in Kabul.

The Western leaders seem to base their system of reasoning on the idea that the world is a club of civilized peoples observing the same rules and shaped by the same principles. They are proving incapable of seeing the obvious fact that their adversaries belong to another world--for Khomeyni, the world of religious fanaticism; for the USSR, the world of cold pragmatism.

For our part, we try to be reasonable and to understand. We act cautiously. The president of the French Republic reminds us that France is "attached to the detente policy." But where is this detente? He assures us that the Soviet intervention in Kabul could "have been brought about by the domestic situation in Afghanistan."

Would the international community and France have been as understanding if the United States, a month before the shah's departure, had carried out a military intervention in Tehran, at the request of the legal government and on account of the "domestic situation in Iran?"

I do not know what should be done. But I do know one thing: If we continue to believe that the free world will save itself by retreating in the hope that everything will miraculously resolve itself, it is doomed. Nothing ever resolves itself and words are not enough to halt an organized force determined to advance its pawns wherever it can--wherever it meets nothing but spinelessness and minds too refined to realize that there is a point beyond which the only alternatives are to fight or to surrender. Without going back to Byzantium and the Turks, the free world could perhaps remember what happened in 1938.

The peoples do not want war. Who does? But by wanting peace at all costs, one ends up losing both peace and freedom. In any case, the way things are moving, perhaps there will be no need for war. Hungary and Czechoslovakia have already been "liberated" without a fight.

GOVERNMENT STOPS ALL AID TO AFGHANISTAN, RECALLS ENVOY

[Text] Rome, January 10 (ANSA)--Italy has decided to cut off all of its aid to Afghanistan within a bilateral context and has recalled all of its staff engaged in technical aid programs in that country, Minister Adolfo Sarti told the Chamber of Deputies here Wednesday. The minister for relations with the Parliament stressed that the measures were in no way meant to be punitive with regard to "a people who have all of our solidarity". He said that world public opinion had been deeply shaken by the grave events in Afghanistan "which alter the [word indistinct] in an entire geographic area".

A basic premise to any development of the detente process was the bringing to an end of the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan, Sarti stated. Soviet soldiers are even now directly engaged in operations aimed at putting down the insurrectionist movements in Afghanistan, he said. The very fact that there was such resistence to the Soviet intervention, he said, testified to the Afghan people's desire to solve their problems themselves, without outside interference, and underscored even more fully in the eyes of the world the Soviet military intervention, Sarti stressed. He reminded the deputies that the Italian Government had decided to recall its ambassador in Kabul for consultations.

Turning to the situation in Iran, Sarti said that it was clear that a free and prosperous Iran was important for world peace. Therefore, the minister continued, it appeared ever more essential to remove without delay the chief reasons for a state of conflict that went beyond the mere aspect of bilateral Iranian-American relations and threatened to involve the entire field of Iran's relations with the West. Recalling Italy's efforts to get the American hostages released, Sarti stressed that the American nation and government had so far reacted to the hostage affair with dignity and a sense of responsibility. "It is our hope that the international community and law will prevail", he said.

[Excerpts] As regards Afghanistan, Sarti said that the situation gave cause for serious concern as regards detente. In order that peace and detente between peoples may be protected, the intervention of Soviet armored divisions in Afghan territory must be ended. The situation in Afghanistan is followed with close attention by our government, also owing to the responsibility which [words indistinct] the EEC in the next 6 months.

As regards the situation in Iran, Italy took and has maintained an attitude of noninterference, but has not failed--in accord with other EEC countries--to put pressure on the Iranian authorities following the occupation of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. [Words indistinct] 16 November called for the immediate restoration in the Iranian capital of respect for the norms of international law. I am certain to interpret the feelings of the Chamber and the whole Italian people, concluded Sarti, by appealing to the Iranian people to put an end to the inacceptable violation of the norms of international law which has taken place in Tehran. At the same time we express to the American people the full solidarity of the Italians in the efforts made for the liberation of the hostages.

FRG: CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON MADRID TALKS

DW091422 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany
0545 GMT 9 Jan 80 DW

[Correspondent Wagner interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Madrid; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Spanish journalists have highly praised you by saying that you did not cancel your visit to Madrid despite events in Afghanistan or Iran. Was Spain also important to you, or was the other less important?

[Answer] I would like to say two things in reply: First, I do not think much of public excitement. I do not think that the world situation is such that the federal chancellor must be glued to his desk in Bonn next to the telephone. After all, Spain also has telephones. Second, I must tell you that I considered the visit to Madrid very important. I have been happy about it for a long time, and I have been preparing for it for a long time. The value of this exchange of opinions was confirmed particularly with regard to one point--the Near and Middle East conflicts. Here in Madrid there are people who are very well informed and have very good judgment regarding the situation there. That was a gain for me.

[Question] It has been noted with bewilderment in Madrid that Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky considers it unlikely that a followup Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) will take place this year. Do you share this opinion?

[Answer] I read in the newspapers about the Austrian federal chancellor's statements. I can very well understand his concern. Generally, I would like to start out from my basic stance, namely, that particularly in critical times the states must continue their talks and personal contacts must continue between the people bearing responsibility in the states. Once they stop talking to each other, the situation will begin to become critical. My basic attitude is that all bodies and organizations that are talking to each other in the East and the West must not stop. Naturally, developments can take place in the course of 1980 that could lead to another assessment. But presently I do not foresee anything like that.

We have worked quite a bit on seeing to it that the CSCE followup conference takes place here in the Spanish capital in the fall of 1980 and that good preparations are made. We from Bonn particularly contributed to preparatory work with regard to so-called confidence-building measures that should be decided here. I can well understand the Spanish concern that this conference will be endangered.

[Question] Spanish interests center on negotiations pertaining to Spain's joining the European Community. At least it seems like that if one looks at the papers. Would Madrid be prepared to limit, at least temporarily, Spanish workers' freedom of movement in the European Community which, I believe, would be complying with Germán wishes?

[Answer] Problems pertaining to Spain's membership in the European Community were not the main point of my talks. The main point was an exchange of opinions on world political and economic affairs. I have already given the key words--Near and Middle East. I can add the key word Afghanistan.

But naturally we also discussed membership in the European Community. The FRG does not have a mandate to negotiate here. The European Commission has the negotiating mandate. The problem pertaining to Spanish workers' freedom of movement must be assessed--as regards German interests--in the same way as the problem of Greek workers' freedom of movement, once Greek membership in the European Community has been negotiated. In other words, we will support relatively long transitional periods regarding this detailed problem. The Spanish side knows that. It does not complain about it. After all, we in Germany presently have a million foreign workers and their families. Everybody knows that great efforts must still be made to obtain decent apartments for these 4 million people, and that particularly great efforts must be made to satisfy the needs of young people with regard to schools and professional training, just as the needs of young German people have been satisfied. We must not overstrain our forces.

[Question] You have talked to the general secretary of the Socialist Workers Party, Felipe Gonzalez, the Spanish opposition leader. What value do you attribute to his efforts in Latin America, for example?

[Answer] Gonzalez is not the only Spanish politician with particularly good relations with Latin America. That pertains certainly also the government and many other Spanairds outside the political field. It pertains also to the economic and cultural fields. I believe that Gonzales plays a very positive role in this respect: I think that the political role he has played here in Spain in past years has been very impressive. I have seen him many times: I saw him in Madrid 1 1/2 or 2 years ago. Frequent talks with him have confirmed my assessment that he is next to Prime Minister Suarez, and particularly King Juan Carlos. I would name him first--after these two leading figures--that is, the third most important leading figure in Spanish politics.

[Question] You mentioned the king. Was that discussion partner also a partner with regard to political judgment?

[Answer] I do not want to touch here on the constitutional position of the king of Spain in Spanish politics. It is not quite clear to me, but I think I can say with some caution that the state of King Juan Carlos' information and his strength of judgment in political talks are very impressive, as I said before.

[Excerpts] West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has just left Madrid for Paris after having held a press conference in the Spanish capital with many journalists. During the press conference he summarized everything discussed in Spain during his meetings with the Spanish prime minister and Socialist leader Felipe Gonzalez. We now have a report from our colleague, Hector Arenas:

[Arenas] Before many national and foreign journalists, West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said at midday today in Madrid that relations between Spain and West Germany are magnificent, excellent. Later on he added: After 2 days of talks I leave Spain deeply satisfied.

Schmidt said, in short, that Spain's entry into the EEC will not be easy but at the end of the negotiating process it will be good for both sides. Germany will continue to support Spain's membership in the Community.

He praised the way in which Spain and its people are carrying out the transition to democracy as well as the measures taken to remedy our state budget deficit, the reduction of the money supply and the fight against inflation.

In the international field, he said that, in view of the problem of the Soviet presence in Afghanistan, Spain and Germany are agreed on the danger that this suggests for world peace. Schmidt said that there ought now to exist united Western solidarity as well as permanent contact with the Third World in facing these questions.

Schmidt was quite definite when he said, as you can hear, that in his talks with the king, Prime Minister Suarez and Gonzalez of the Spanish Workers' Socialist Party, PSOE, he did not touch on the subject of Spain's membership in NATO. He said that this was a Spanish problem and the Spanish people will decide whether or not to join this organization. In connection with this problem the military situation in Ireland, Greece and France had to be remembered. They had once belonged to the Atlantic alliance but now were not part of it.

On the problems of negotiations on Spain's entry into the EEC, he said that this was the responsibility of the Brussels commission where they would take into account Spain's interests and those of the other member countries.

On the status of Spanish workers in Germany, he said that the main problem was the labor's freedom of movement. Later Schmidt said that his country would ask Spain for a period of transition for the free movement of workers, similar to that arranged with Greece.

Finally, we have to say that at the moment Schmidt is traveling to Paris to meet President Giscard d'Estaing, to discuss the major international problems.

This is Hector Arenas.

FRYDENLUND ON AFGHAN SITUATION, IMPLICATIONS FOR DETENTE

LD090941 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 2 Jan 80 p 8 LD

[AFTENPOSTEN interview with Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund; date, place not given: "Soviet Union Will Lose Much"]

[Text] "The government takes a serious view of the situation which has arisen regarding the Soviet military incursion [innmarsj] into neighboring Afghanistan," Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund told AFTENPOSTEN. He does not rule out that we are heading for a tougher period between the superpowers.

"I do not know what the Soviet Union wants to achieve by the action, nor do I know its motives. But it seems obviously clear that the Russians will lose much by this action," Frydenlund asserted.

"First, the Soviet Union will have to allow for protracted resistance and guerrilla warfare in Afghanistan itself--something which the terrain there invites. Second, the Russians will experience a serious strain on their relations with Muslim countries at a time when the latter are playing an increasingly important role in international politics and where religion plays an absolutely vital role in their policies.

"Third, it is difficult to see how the incursion into Afghanistan will not result in closer understanding and enhanced cooperation between the United States and China since Afghanistan lies right on the dividing line of the two countries' interests.

"And, finally, I am also afraid for the effects on the wider process of detente in Europe precisely at a time when we face great opportunities for negotiation in a number of spheres," the foreign minister said.

[Question] President Carter has said that the United States and its allies will react to the entry with more than protests. What measures are possible?

[Answer] I do not know what he has in mind, but he said that he wants to consult other countries' leaders with a view to potential countermeasures. It is natural to place emphasis on reactions from the countries in the area.

[Question] Are we heading toward a confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union?

[Answer] Norway's policy is to work for detente and rapprochement between the superpowers. This will also be our task in this situation. But we cannot rule out that we are entering a tougher period, Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund said. He recalled that Norway has expressed the government's reaction to the entry into Afghanistan to the Soviet ambassador in Oslo.

CARRINGTON NOTES POSSIBLE COUNTERMEASURES ON AFGHANISTAN

[Text] The foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, left London today for a tour of five West and South Asian countries, and hinted that Britain, if asked by the United States, might consider a naval presence in the area following Soviet action in Afghanistan.

Lord Carrington flew from Heathrow Airport to Ankara for talks with the Turkish prime minister and foreign minister. He then flies to Oman for a meeting with the sultan, on to Saudi Arabia at the beginning of next week and then to Pakistan. He is also expected to pay a brief visit to India to meet Mrs Gandhi.

Before flying out on a private RAF VC-10 jet Lord Carrington said: "I think it is important that one should go and hear at first hand what the countries in the area are thinking and how they view the situation. I also think it is very important to let them know that we in the West are not disinterested."

He continued: "I shall also be listening to what they say about the situation in Iran and Afghanistan, and their views upon it, and how they see events unfolding. I shall make it very clear to them that the West, particularly the British, are very well aware of the gravity of the situation. We want to impress upon them that we are taking steps to make it plain to the Soviet Union that this sort of thing cannot happen again without consequences even more serious than this time."

Lord Carrington said that NATO were already holding talks to decide what "concerted pressure" could be put on the Russians. But he ruled out the possibility of British troops being sent to Oman. "I don't think that is necessarily the right answer. It may be that the United States Government will feel it necessary to increase their presence in that part of the world and if they asked us to do something we would obviously have to consider it. But I imagine if we did consider something of that kind it would be of a naval presence," he added.

The foreign secretary warned the Russians that they would not have things all their own way in Afghanistan. He said: "I would think that anyone who says Afghanistan is completely conquered is not entirely wise. I think the Soviet Union is going to have very considerable trouble, and they brought it on themselves. But of course, they are there in very, very big strength and the Afghans are not heavily armed so there is a very considerable advantage on the side of the Soviet Union."

Lord Carrington added: "There has been universal condemnation of the Soviet Union but, of course, words are not enough and obviously we will take some action."

MORNING STAR REITERATES OPPOSITION TO AFGHAN INTERVENTION

LD041127 London MORNING STAR in English 4 Jan 80 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "Carter Stokes It Up"]

[Text] The decision by President Carter to ask the U.S. Senate to delay consideration of the SALT 2 agreement is an act which can only strengthen the cold-war campaign of the most reactionary forces in the U.S. and Western Europe.

These warmongers have been on the rampage for months against ratification of SALT 2, and have been right in the forefront of the drive to install the cruise missile in Western Europe.

Mrs. Thatcher will no doubt be delighted. She has gone out of her way to mobilise reaction in Europe against the Soviet Union. The Tories set the pace on the cruise missile.

As a result, every proposal put forward by the Soviet Union for calling a halt to this latest escalation in the arms race was dismissed out of hand.

Small wonder that relations with the Soviet Union were becoming strained even before the Afghan events.

This does not of course justify what happened there. The MORNING STAR has made clear in its editorial on Monday its opposition to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

As we said then, the principle of non-interference in other countries is central to the task of mobilising the mass movement on an international scale in support of peace, disarmament, and the anti-imperialist struggle.

The violation of this principle by a socialist country can only play into the hands of the enemies of detente.

What the situation demands today is political struggle on an international scale, exposing imperialist intrigue, and utilising the principle of non-interference to rally world opinion and isolate the imperialists.

But what the Soviet Union has done in Afghanistan cannot be used in any way as an excuse to justify President Carter's action.

The U.S. and the other imperialist powers are in no position to read lectures on morality to the Soviet Union or anyone else.

Their histories are a saga of bloody interventions aimed at enslaving the world's peoples for the greater profit of the big business monopolies.

The world's peoples must make it clear that they are not prepared to stand by and see the enemies of peace and social progress hypocritically exploit the situation which the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has now created.

The British labour movement has a particularly crucial role to play in this respect. Our country and our working people have absolutely nothing to gain from stirring up the cold war.

Those cruise missiles are no defence for Britain. Rather do they threaten us with nuclear annihilation.

It is important that the fight for peace be stepped up particularly in Britain. And here the broadly based conference on peace being called in London on the weekend of January 26 is of key importance. Credentials can be obtained from Mrs. Pavett, c/o LIBERATION, 313 Caledonian Road, London, N1.

TFSC PRESIDENT HOSTS UN REPRESENTATIVE GALINDO-POHL

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said his luncheon meeting with the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Galindo-Pohl, is not connected with reports that UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim has begun his efforts to insure the resumption of the intercommunal talks.

Denktas gave a luncheon for Galindo-Pohl today. Speaking with reporters afterward, Denktas said that current issues were discussed during the luncheon. However, there are certain reports that Waldheim has begun an initiative. It would be useful to note that this luncheon is not related to that. The honorable Galindo-Pohl asked for our attitude and view on the Maras [Varosha] issue. I told him that our attitude and view regarding Maras were already spelled out in our statements. There is nothing to add or subtract from these statements. It is not a question of Waldheim having begun his initiative and continuing his moves, as reported by the Greek Cypriot press.

Replying to a question on whether Galindo-Pohl's meeting with Greek Cypriot administration Foreign Minister Rolandhis yesterday was coincidence and whether this luncheon was previously planned, Denktas said: This luncheon was previously planned. Hence, it is not related to Galindo-Pohl's meeting with Rolandhis.

Turkish Ambassador to Lefkosa [Nicosia] Inal Batu, Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Minister Kenan Atakol, the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor at the intercommunal talks and his adviser Necati Munir Ertekun also attended the luncheon.

DENKTAS COMMENTS ON VAROSHA, COMMONWEALTH MEETINGS

[Excerpt] President Rauf Denktas has said that it is the duty of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus [TFSC] to take the necessary measures to prevent the hotels in Maras [Varosha] from deteriorating. Replying to various questions by reporters today, Denktas answered a question about the complaint submitted by the Greek Cypriots to the United Nations on the Maras issue and the report in the Greek Cypriot press that the United Nations will take effective action in a bid to prevent the opening of Maras for settlement.

Denktas recalled that the Maras area is a region in the TFSC. Pointing out that the United Nations deals with world issues and that domestic administrations deal with domestic problems, Denktas said that rights are granted to the owners and an appeal was made within the framework of these rights. Noting that the point is to be able to handle this issue intelligently, Denktas said that the [word indistinct] will be discussed and solved within the laws of the TFSC.

He said: The Greek Cypriot administration has no authority to interfere in this matter. The fact that the Greek Cypriot administration, which is engaged in an inhuman and international economic attack on the Turkish Cypriot community in disregard of the sixth article of the decision made at the summit meeting [between Denktas and Kiprianou], has remembered this sixth article is quite interesting, even comical.

Recalling that the Greek Cypriot administration has been an illegal administration since 1963, Denktas said that the inhuman measures implemented by the Greek administration in a bid to crush the Turkish Cypriot community surpass the barbarism of the Middle Ages.

Pointing out that it is regrettable that certain parliament presidents, who arrived in southern Cyprus for the commonwealth parliament presidents permanent committee meeting, did not come to the TFSC despite invitations, Denktas said that the Foreign Ministry will deliver the TFSC's regrets and views to the parliament presidents.

I SIMERINI DEPLORES GOVERNMENT SILENCE ON AFGHAN EVENTS

NC091155 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 9 Jan 80 p 1 NC

[Editorial: "The Good Invasion"]

[Excerpts] In April 1978, Moscow put Taraki in power in Afghanistan as the most trustworthy communist of that country. Later, it was decided that he should be executed.

Amin--another progressive communist, loyal to Moscow--smashed in Taraki's head. However, the Kremlin has smashed in Amin's head through another person, Karmal, still more progressive and more communistic. How and when the latter's head will roll is another chapter. What AKEL is celebrating here, is that the progressive and patriotic Amin had to be smashed so that another more progressive and more patriotic communist could come to power.

All the assassins in Afghanistan were stooges of Moscow. Finally, the Soviet troops themselves came to assassinate the assassins. Yet, AKEL dares call on EDEK to support the Soviet invasion. However, EDEK remains silent and so does the Cyprus Government. But let us see what is of importance; let us regard the government, because to deal with AKEL's stand in the least constitutes political stupidity, since AKEL is a blind stooge and loyal mouthpiece of Moscow's foreign policy.

So, what happens to our president? The government spokesman does not say anything; instead of answering questions, he sometimes smiles and sometimes he "makes puns... the anti-imperialist Soviet invasion" that has overthrow a "militant" friend of Cyprus, communist Amin, is it good or bad? It is rumored that Mr Papaioannou has drawn the government's attention and told them: "Look, Moscow has carried out a good invasion but did so to deal imperialism a blow and not Afghanistan. Cyprus is waging an anti-imperialist struggle...the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan is a considerable and practical strengthening of the Cyprus struggle. Besides, you must not forget that the votes received at the United Nations are given by the Soviet Union. If you criticize the invasion you must forget these votes. It is in the interest of Cyprus to be on the side of the anti-imperialist Soviet invasion in Afghanistan..."

President Kiprianou and his government have frozen, they do not know what to do. When we told them that they are captives of AKEL, they grinned. Now, if they have any political blood in their veins, they should be lamenting. They remain silent and think. However, their problem is very simple. They should have no illusions if they do not condemn this invasion. Turkey will forever be invoking Afghanistan to defend its own good invasion, at the same time, when the president visits the West--as he is planning to do--he will be asked, without the slightest diplomatic politeness: "Mr President, have you condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan? How then can you expect us to condemn the Turkish invasion of Cyprus?"

GOVERNMENT REPLIES TO PAPANDREOU ON AFGHANISTAN, SOUDA BAY

The government's reaction to these two statements made by the chairman of PASOK was expressed in a statement by a government spokesman who said: "As usual the chairman of PASOK fell victim to false information. Based on this information he built castles in the sand. No foreigner issues permits either for Souda or for any other portion of Greek territory. The Turkish tugboat entered Souda because of a severe storm and it did so after permission was granted by the chief of the Greek Naval General Staff.

"At the same time the chairman of PASOK, being a hound for publicity, accused the Greek Government of signing the appeal, along with 48 other countries, asking for the UN Security Council to convene because of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. He also accused the government of concealing this fact. The signing of a public document, however, in itself is not a secret action. The government did not have either a reason for concealing the fact or a reason for publicizing it. In addition, the signing of a proposal for UN intervention is the most peaceful and legal of acts. It expresses the government's concern over the intervention in the internal affairs of a third country. This is an intervention over which we the Greeks have had a bitter experience, since the intervention in Cyprus that occurred 5 years ago still continues.

"It is, however, both noteworthy and lamentable that what Papandreou says today is contrary to what he said only a few days ago."

KARAMANLIS TO BRIEF PARLIAMENT ON 11 JAN

[Text] The government unexpectedly informed opposition parties yesterday that K. Karamanlis will brief the Chamber of Deputies on the course of our national issues on Friday morning, the day after tomorrow. The government spokesman stated that the briefing will be held unless "unforeseen events" intervene; he did not clarify what could intervene to postpone the discussion.

A few days ago a government source had defined the timeframe for the briefing as 8-22 January, but everything indicated that the government was orienting itself toward the end of the month rather than this week. The government provided no explanation for this surprise (48 hours remain for the opposition to prepare itself).

Opposition circles were wondering whether the government expects "something" at the end of the month and wants the discussion to precede it.

In any event, the briefing of the prime minister and the discussion--at the level of party leaders--which will follow, will be of special interest because it will be an entire year since the last briefing. The briefing is expected to find national issues in a "state of suspense" and the more general international atmosphere especially bad, and will coincide with the aggravated state of relations between the government and the official opposition.

It is expected that, in addition to the sharp criticism he will level at the way the New Democracy government has dealt with national issues, leader of the official opposition A. Papandreou will also refer to domestic issues [as published]. (The first will be the economic issue), and to the more general political atmosphere that is being formed with the advent of the new year.

One way or another, it will be the "first confrontation," not only of the new year, but of a course which, because of the state of affairs, begins today and will end with the vote for the election of a president of the republic (from 15 April to 10 May).

TA NEA CALLS FOR SOLIDARITY TO DEFEAT KARAMANLIS

[The "Free Opinion" column by Yiannis Katris: "Two Sides of the Coin--the Opposition: the Moment for Responsibility"]

[Text] There will be no fundamental change in our political and generally our national affairs as a result of whether or not Karamanlis passes from his position as prime minister and leader of his party to that of president of the republic. It is permissible to hope that such a change will only take place if and when the right ceases to control the fates of our people and the nation.

It is essential that as we enter 1980--a year of significant political changes in our country and a year of explosive dangerous international developments--the democratic public opinion fully understands this.

These "changes" will commence at the end of Tsatsos' term of office and when Karamanlis overtly aspires to succeed him as "supreme dignitary" (thus becoming an equal to Giscard D'Estaing). The government press has already predetermined the prime minister's decision, despite the fact that he personally--as we are informed by political reportage--"appears to believe that he has offered so much that he is now allowed to withdraw," in other words, to become a private citizen. (This evaluation by Karamanlis, apart from demonstrating his great modesty, reminds us of the people's saying, "push me even though I don't want to go.")

Consequently, it is almost certain that in a few months Karmanlis will move from his "three room" small apartment on Irodhis Attikos St.--a well known 'poor' area--to the presidential palace next door from where authoritarianism will emanate with increased constitutional authority and even greater irresponsibility.

What puts a fly in the prime minister's ointment is that he--being such a god--will be forced to the bitter test of being voted down by common mortals in two successive counts of votes and that he will be elected only on the third count that only requires 180 votes (and not 200) of a total of 300 deputies. It is sure that he will be certain of these "180" votes if, using various petty tricks, he manages to influence the "nationalist front" and three or four independents. Naturally, however, since voting will be secret there could be unexpected developments.

In the same way that circus acrobats, despite their experience and ability, are always in danger of falling, "New Democracy" while playing the presidential game could perhaps win the presidency but at the same time it could fall from its position of authority. This will unavoidably happen if the aspiring successors do not agree among themselves on the division of spoils and on seniority and if they break up into different fiefs. (American cinema has shown us many such things.) Although gods may not be too interested in national calamities (such as Cyprus) they are extremely inventive and careful in avoiding their own downfall. In this way and as a first step, in the effort not to cast a shadow over the enthronement of Karamanlis, K. Papakonstandinou [Deputy Prime Minister] will take over as prime minister and as formal leader of "New Democracy." He is not at all "colorless or odorless." One could bet with certainty that during his term of office and until elections are held favoritism and unscrupulousness will take on monstrous proportions.

With such a maneuver, however, Karamanlis does not prevent but only postpones collapse until such time as elections are held, when the two dauphins, Rallis and Averof, are expected to confront each other. Although this column abhors prophesies it appears that Averof is the strongest of the two having guaranteed for himself the electoral support of the armed forces (in other words of the senior echelon of the officer corps) and the support of NATO (in other words of the Americans).

Naturally all this affects "New Democracy" (or more specifically anti-democracy). It is time, however, that we take a look at "our side," in other words at what is happening and what must be done in the opposition's camp. At the outset the first critical political battle against the right must be given during the voting for the president of the republic. This battle can only be won if there is not even a single desertion from the democratic camp and the seven independents. The government's majority in the Chamber of Deputies, together with its foster brother the "nationalist front" cannot produce the magic number of "180." Consequently they do need deserters from the opposition. In the people's conscience, however, any candidate deserter--no matter how he may beautify his actions--will be registered as an enemy of democracy and a gravedigger for Cyprus. It will further mean that through his vote he will perpetuate the policy of austerity for the people and luxury for the few.

What is of definitive significance is that--according to the Constitution--if Karamanlis is defeated then elections must be proclaimed immediately. In this way the right will lose its privilege of remaining in authority until expiration of its 4-year term which ends in the fall of 1981.

The second historic duty of the anti-rightwing parties is (since "unity" is unthinkable for various reasons) to at least forge a joint election strategy which will not only result in the defeat but which will crush the government party as well. Under current conditions the strength of the right has dropped below 30 percent. It would be a shame for us all if this arteriosclerotic minority (which has no ideological substructure and supports itself exclusvely on small and large interest-mongering, on handouts and grants) should continue to govern us, the 70 percent of the vitally vibrant democratic people. If the abominable perpetuation of this evil thing is to end the democratic parties must act now in order to neutralize the various slight of hand tricks and maneuvers with which the sinful right has managed to predominate since 1933, in other words for 46 entire years.

First of all it must be immediately proclaimed and by all--with great firmness--that elections, no matter when they are held, must be conducted under the orthodox, the pure and honest system of the simple proportional representation system (without the sly plus and minus method of the reinforced proportional representation system) so that at long last we may have an honest registration of the true political forces in our country. It is only in this way that a political cleansing of the country will start.

We are well aware of Karamanlis' "counter dialog:" The government needs firm governments which cannot be guaranteed by the simple proportional representation system of election. (This means: Since the people do not give us the majority we steal the votes of the smaller parties in order to punish the people and we form an artificial majority in the chamber thus forming "stable governments.")

For entire decades our people have tasted the "benefits" of these "stable" governments. (The 1920-22 government was too stable but this did not prevent it from creating the Asia Minor disaster.) This is not what is "necessary" therefore. In its progress toward cleansing and change, our country requires governments which are more honest and less controlled, even if less stable. The best guarantees for such goals are provided by coalition governments. This necessity is far more imperative today when the country is faced with exceedingly critical economic and national issues, as generally admitted.

It is hair-raising to imagine that after all these bitter experiences the Greek people will once again be trapped in the maze of vote-stealing systems and that they will permit the 30 percent of the right--especially with Messrs Rallis, Averof and Karamanlis as the representatives and with American "influence"--to "regulate" issues such as those of Cyprus, the Aegean and that of U.S. bases.

All these dangers will be neutralized if the right ceases to control and oppress us. It must therefore be defeated in the next election. If it is to be defeated, all parties of the democracy must demand the adoption of an honest system of election, the simple proportional representation system and an equal electoral standard for all regions. If this battle for the election system is to be won there are certain necessary prerequisites:

1--The demand of the sum total of the opposition must not express theoretical, Platonic views but it must be--and we repeat--irrevocable. The leadership of the right only understands such a language.

2--Two-front and multi-front struggles must cease. (We have sufficiently paid for them under Yeoryios Papandreou.) "Volleys" against each other (such as KODISO against PASOK and PASOK against KODISO or of the KKE against the KKE (Interior) and vice versa) must be directed by all against the right which is the real and relentless political as well as social opponent. (Is there anyone who does not know that the working people are daily subjected to government and oligarchy attacks without the slightest discrimination of the political position of the victims?)

Conclusion: If the democratic opposition, of all hues, forges with diligence and mutual respect and without hegemonistic temptations the proper course, then we can be not only optimistic but certain that the end of the right is approaching in our long-suffering country and that the dawn of a new era which forecasts a better future is breaking.

DEFENSE COOPERATION AGREEMENT INITIALED IN ANKARA

[Text] The defense and economic cooperation agreement between Turkey and the United States as well as three appendices attached to it were initialed in Ankara today. The agreement and the appendices--which concern defense support, defense industry and [joint U.S.-Turkish defense] installations--were initialed by the Turkish Foreign Ministry secretary general's assistant for joint security affairs, Ambassador Faruk Sahinbas and the U.S. envoy to Turkey, Ambassador Ronald Spiers.

In a statement during the ceremony Ambassador Sahinbas noted it was natural that ups and downs had occurred in Turkish-U.S. relations, which have a history of about 150 years, and added that relations between the two countries had always been principally based on sincerity, frankness, mutual trust, friendship and a sharing of the same ideals.

In his statement, U.S. Ambassador to Ankara Spiers said that these agreements indicated that a new stage had been reached in relations between his country and Turkey, in the sphere of defense and economic cooperation. Ambassador Spiers pointed to the great significance of this agreement for the Western alliance as well.

Foreign Ministry information directorate general officials noted that the temporary working status of the joint defense installations in Turkey has been extended by another 45 days in accordance with yesterday's decision by the Council of Ministers. The officials added that the agreement between the two countries is expected to be signed at the end of the 45-day period when some agreements on the implementation and the protocols connected with documents initialed today are completed.

Foreign Minister on Accord

[Text] Ankara, Jan 9 (AA)--Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen said the joint installations involved in a new defense cooperation agreement being negotiated with the United States were not foreign bases but installations of the Turkish Republic. He made the statement on the floor of the Senate Tuesday while briefing that legislative chamber on the draft defense cooperation accord.

The joint installations involved would not be used for purposes of U.S. defense, Erkmen said, but for NATO defense, and the agreement would not be "open-ended" as to duration; it would be signed for 5 years. [sentence indistinct]

The foreign minister said negotiations had been accelerated to meet the deadline of 9 January, when the 3-month extension for the provisional status of the joint installations expires. The intensification of talks was not linked to developments abroad, such as those in Afghanistan and Iran, he claimed.

Erkmen also rejected allegations that a framework agreement would be signed, with the details left to be worked out later. "The agreement will be open to parliamentary control," he said, "no one dare escape that. The foreign policy of our government is not attached to anyone's apron strings; it is not confused, and does not smile on everyone either."

Erkmen made his statement in the Senate in response to a claim by life Senator Haydar Tunckanat, who claimed the United States had become more interested in Turkey following the incidents in Iran and Afghanistan.

He claimed the installations involved in the defense cooperation accord would be used for purposes of U.S. defense and called for its ratification by the Turkish and American legislatures. "The new government's foreign policy seems to be following in the wake of U.S. policy," he charged, and warned Turkey should "remember the embargo" before taking any steps.

[Text] British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington has arrived in Ankara to exchange views with government officials on international issues. Lord Carrington was received at Ankara's Esenboga Airport by Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen. In a statement at the airport, Erkmen expressed the belief that fruitful talks will be held with Lord Carrington in Ankara. Erkmen said the visit will enable both Britain and Turkey to exchange views on the problems of the region at a time when the world is facing a tense situation.

In his statement, Lord Carrington noted that the reason he chose Ankara as the first leg of his tour, which will include Oman, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and probably India, is Turkey's importance in the region from the geographical and political point of view. Pointing out that the developments in the region are important for Turkey and that, in addition, Turkey is very important for the Western alliance as well as the nonalined countries from the geographical and political viewpoint, Lord Carrington said: This is why I wanted to hear first the views of the Turkish Government regarding the recent developments in Iran and Afghanistan. Also noting that Turkey is one of the strong members of NATO, Lord Carrington continued: Turkey's geographical location on NATO's eastern flank renders Turkey not only important but also essential for NATO. Lord Carrington added that his government is well aware that Turkey is facing certain economic difficulties, However, his country is also facing similar problems.

Lord Carrington started his official contacts in Ankara by visiting Erkmen at 1800. The talks between Turkey and Britain will continue tomorrow as well. The British foreign secretary will leave Turkey tomorrow afternoon.

ECEVIT REITERATES SUPPORT FOR COALITION GOVERNMENT

[From "Insight Into the News"]

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk received RPP leader Bulent Ecevit at the Cankaya Mansion at 1100 today. The meeting lasted more than 1 hour. In a statement to the press following the meeting Ecevit said that the RPP was ready to cooperate with the Justice Party, Ecevit said.

[Begin Ecevit recording] We confirmed our party's awareness of its responsibilities once again during the RPP National Assembly and Senate groups' and General Administrative Council's meetings. Without any bitterness about the merciless accusations and the obstructions we were subjected to when we were in power, there is wide agreement in our party that the two major parties should approach the existing problems together. The latest deliberations within our party bodies have shown this once again. Even the RPP members who have been physically attacked in all parts of the country agree on that. The RPP members consider the unity of the nation, the good of the country and democracy, and the supremacy of the state before party interests.

Following the meetings of our party groups and General Administrative Council, I can say with confidence and peace of mind that the RPP is ready to cooperate with the Justice Party with a view toward facilitating Turkey's emergence from the present crisis within the democratic system. Naturally, this cooperation cannot be established if we are expected to blindly support the policies of a government--established without our support--which contradict our attitudes and, more than that, policies which have been clearly proven to be erroneous in 2 months. The real aims of those who claim to be extending unconditional support to this government have long been revealed. We say, and are clearly saying now, what we can do and cannot do. However, if at the end of a 2-month trial period the government is still pleased with the way it was established and with its policies, if it still believes that it can solve the problems and overcome the crisis with its current composition, with its narrowminded and superficial diagnosis and with its present attitude, then, as a party respectful of democratic parliamentary rules, we cannot insist. [end recording]

Replying to a question, Ecevit said that if the Justice Party proposed a coalition with the RPP he would support the proposal [when it is discussed] in the authorized organs of his party.

DEMIREL REPLIES TO ECEVIT'S CALL FOR COOPERATION

[Text] Prime Minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel has said: We are ready for any kind of cooperation with anyone for the good of the country. However, this cooperation should not be only words.

Replying to reporters questions at the parliament regarding the call for cooperation made by RPP leader Bulent Ecevit, Demirel said the issues on which there would be cooperation as well as the extent of the cooperation should be clarified. He said: If one is to convince the people of the sincerity of statements such as "let us cooperate," "let us unite" and "let us work together," the first thing to be done is to ratify the bills on measures against anarchy which the RPP prepared and which we support. Cooperation should not remain a word; it should not remain an abstract concept; and it should not be an issue for discussion aimed at deceiving public opinion. What is required to achieve peace, tranquillity, security and better days in Turkey? Who will do what to achieve that end? So long as it is clear as to who will cooperate with whom, to that end we are ready to cooperate with anyone.

Reiterating that the first sign of cooperation would be not to object to the bills in the assemblies, Demirel noted that nothing could be solved by proposing cooperation and dialog. He said: My party and I are ready to cooperate with anyone who will secure Turkey's interests in all matters involving Turkey's interests. However, when I talk with the leader of the main opposition party, the honorable Ecevit, this will not be just a chat. I have to determine the issues on which I will request his cooperation and unity. No one should be under the impression that all problems will be solved the moment the Justice Party and the RPP leaders shake hands. I bear no grudge or enmity toward anyone. I can shake hands 100 times. However, Turkey's problems are not all that simple. When it becomes clear to me what should be done to save Turkey from the present situation, naturally the issues on which I will seek his cooperation will also be clear. If a dialog is established only in form and in protocol, then the idea of a dialog cannot be very convincing in a time of need.

Pointing out that, if Turkey is facing great difficulties and if these difficulties necessitate the cooperation of political parties, no party can avoid such cooperation. Demirel added: Let us first cooperate in practice. Let us ratify the bills which they submitted to the assemblies. What is the use of making us beg? We are begging not for ourselves but for Turkey.

Demirel later replied to questions regarding a coalition of the two major parties. Demirel said on the issue: There is no need to get into an argument about the government. There is a government. We are working hard to insure that it functions. In other words, should we now neglect our work and try to form a coalition government? I am stressing "now." Should I let you say, "Demirel rejected Ecevit's proposal for a coalition government"? I do not understand the need for such a proposal. At least I do not understand it now. Let us first begin from a more narrow point of view. Let us ratify these bills. Let us then discuss the requirements of Turkey's interests.

Replying to a question on how the bills to be ratified will prevent anarchy, Demirel said: These bills are the minimum requirements to combat anarchy. If these bills are not sufficient, we will take other measures. What shall we do? Shall we surrender to anarchy? We will not surrender Turkey to anarchy. There are many ways to combat anarchy. These bills are only one of the ways.

Demirel described as speculation allegations to the effect that the United States wishes to involve Turkey in the Middle East issue.

Speaking at the Justice Party joint group meeting this morning, Demirel said: All of Turkey's problems are being handled. Results will be obtained; they will definitely be obtained. Noting that a very sensitive point had been reached in the struggle against anarchy, Demirel said that the state was pursuing gangs and bandits and that the traitors to the state and the nation would be uprooted. He added: Our duty is to put an end to this state of emergency and to overcome the conditions which have caused it. We have inherited a paralyzed economy. Those who have caused this paralysis have no right to ask us why we have been unable to improve the situation within 40 days. I am not saying all this because we are in a lamentable state. We have come forward because we have revolted against the situation Turkey is in. Turkey will overcome these difficulties as long as there are people who believe that it can be done. Demirel said that the first step toward preventing anarchy is to ratify the bills necessary for combatting terror, anarchy and secessionism.

PARLIAMENTARY LEADERS DISCUSS FOREIGN, DOMESTIC ISSUES

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk received Senate President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil and Assembly President Cahit Karakas together at the Cankaya Mansion at 1700 today. The meeting lasted over 1 hour. On leaving Cankaya Mansion, Karakas said the meeting was held upon the invitation of the president. Noting that this meeting was an extension of their previous meeting, Karakas said the internal and external problems of the country were discussed. In reply to journalists' questions on whether the possible cooperation of the two major parties was discussed during the meeting, Karakas said: When I say the internal and external issues of the country, I include everything.

Caglayangil visited RPP leader Bulent Ecevit before going to the Cankaya Mansion. The meeting, which began in Ecevit's office in the parliament at 1500, lasted about 1 and ½ hours. In a statement after the meeting, Caglayangil noted that he felt the need to discuss internal and external issues with the RPP leader. He said: We held an extensive exchange of views. We had a very positive and fruitful meeting.

In his statement, Ecevit said he discussed with Caglayangil all the internal and external problems facing Turkey in a very open and detailed manner, Ecevit added: We talked about almost every subject. It was, in every way, a very useful meeting for me. Replying to a journalist's question about the priority order of the subjects, Ecevit said: We talked about everything from terror and economic issues to the external developments in our region. As I have been saying for days, and particularly as I stated after my meeting with our honorable president, we made an assessment of the current atmosphere, which adds a special importance to the cooperation between the two major parties.

NAP SCORES ECEVIT FOR NOT OPPOSING SOVIET INTERFERENCE

[Text] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] General Secretary Necati Gultekin has said that the RPP leaders have not opposed the invasion of Afghanistan and that this openly shows the kind of mentality these people have. In a written statement issued in Ankara today, Gultekin said: I believe that our nation is learning a lesson from the fact that certain circles are remaining silent in the face of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the killing of hundreds of Muslim Afghans every day by napalm bombs. Gultekin also claimed that RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and other RPP administrators are collaborating with communist and secessionist gangs that want to transform Turkey into another Afghanistan.

PRIME MINISTER MEETS WITH MILITARY COMMANDERS

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel met with the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders last night. The meeting, held at the prime minister's residence, lasted about 5 hours. Prime Minister Demirel replied to questions by reporters as he was leaving the residence.

According to ANATOLIA and ANKA [ANKARA NEWS AGENCY], Demirel said that there was nothing extraordinary about the meeting. Recalling that the Turkish Armed Forces have various needs, Demirel said: Great efforts are being made for the successful implementation of martial law. The country is facing various difficulties and, as I have already told you, the prime minister of the Turkish Republic is responsible to the Grand National Assembly for preparing the armed forces for war. Within this framework, there can be nothing more natural than my talking to the commanders of the armed forces and the chief of the General Staff. This must be considered normal. There is no political significance to this and there cannot be any.

Replying to a reporter who asked if the developments in Afghanistan were also discussed, Demirel said: Naturally, we have discussed everything.

GDR'S FISCHER HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE, ENDS VISIT

AU101335 [Editorial Report AU] Several Vienna German-language dailies of 10 January carry reports on GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer's Vienna press conference on 9 January marking the end of his 3-day official visit. According to WIENER ZEITUNG (page 3) Fischer declared that "by its 'rendering aid' for Afghanistan" the Soviet Union "is contributing toward safeguarding peace and detente in this region" and that "the entry of Soviet troops was in full compliance with article 4 of the bilateral treaty on friendship and cooperation, so that the USSR "fulfilled its duty under the treaty." The paper notes that Fischer made this statement in reply to questions about the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the GDR's support of the USSR in the UN Security Council.

According to the Communist daily VOLKSSTIMME (pages 1-2), Fischer "sharply rejected speculations to the effect that the Soviet forces withdrawn from the GDR have been stationed in the CSSR," and emphatically denied the repeatedly voiced assertion that there are GDR forces stationed in Africa. DIE PRESSE (page 2) cites Fischer as having said in this context that there were no GDR forces in Africa--"only specialists helping in the construction there."

VOLKSSTIMME notes that Fischer--in connection with his plea for "cool thinking" about how to continue the process of detente and against letting oneself be carried away by emotions, declared: "It is particularly the exemplary cooperation between Austria and the GDR, which must continue even in critical times, that could serve to encourage in this respect those who have been discouraged."

According to WIENER ZEITUNG, Fischer declared that the GDR-Austrian contacts had been "useful for both sides and at the same time constituted a further contribution toward detente." The GDR foreign minister referred to the signing of a working agreement as a concrete result of his visit and stressed that "economic relations would continue to play an important part." He added that his talks during his visit to the Voest-Alpine Steel Corporation had shown that "good opportunities" exist. Asked about the visa issue, Fischer said that "the GDR is not yet ready to abolish visas altogether, but a start is already being made, especially for official duty and business trips." Fischer declared that the GDR has invited Austria for talks on an assets agreement between the two countries to open in March in East Berlin.

Foreign Ministry Press Statement

AU101301 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 10 Jan 80 p 3 AU

["Press statement" of Austrian Foreign Ministry on GDR Foreign Minister Fischer's visit to Austria 7-9 January 1980]

[Text] At the invitation of Foreign Minister Dr Willibald Pahr, GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer paid an official visit to Austria 7-9 January. The talks held between the two ministers on this occasion took place in a friendly and businesslike atmosphere. The state of their bilateral relations as well as international problems were thoroughly discussed. In the framework of an exchange of opinions the situations in Afghanistan and in Iran were also discussed in a frank manner. Moreover, the preparations for the Madrid meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe as well as questions of arms control, especially in Europe, were thoroughly dealt with. On 9 January the two ministers signed a working agreement as a basis for the further positive development of bilateral relations.

Both sides expressed the view that the talks that have been held were useful and conducive to the further development of bilateral relations in the interest of the people in both states and of detente.

During his stay in Austria Oskar Fischer, GDR minister of foreign affairs, was also received by President Dr Kirchschlaeger and Chancellor Dr Kreisky. Dr Willibald Pahr, Austrian minister for foreign affairs, has gratefully accepted the invitation to pay a return visit to the GDR. The date will be fixed through diplomatic channels.

LE SOIR ANALYZES DILEMMAS FACING PRESIDENT CARTER

LD101119 Brussels LE SOIR in French 5 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Text] Detente is dead. The SALT II accords are dead. And the presidential campaign for the 1980 elections is still-born, at least in the traditional form to which we had become accustomed. The only man really in the running is once more President Carter. But his position is as unstable as that in Iran.

It is not just that after 2 months nothing has been resolved in the Iranian crisis; now the invasion of Afghanistan has come along to complicate the problem. And in the field of domestic policy--an essential factor in the possible options open to Carter--the Republican candidates are tired of silence and have moved onto the offensive, breaking a tacit agreement of unconditional support for the President and reflecting the impatience beginning to dawn among public opinion.

Robert Dole has declared that "it is time" for the President to act decisively to free the hostages. The consequence of further delaying any decision would be a very hazardous strategy as much for the hostages as for American interests in the Middle East, he added.

George Bush, another candidate and former director of the CIA, affirms: "I am experiencing a growing sense of frustration not only with regard to the U.S. position but over our foreign policy in general."

John Connally goes further: "In the very near future Americans are going to start wondering what our policy in Iran is. Do we have a policy and is it yielding results? Khomeyni is playing a cat-and-mouse game with us."

For his part Ronald Reagan concluded: "Jimmy Carter has realized what most of us had realized for a long time, that it is impossible to trust the Soviets."

Even if, according to an opinion poll published Thursday morning, Jimmy Carter does outstrip Ronald Reagan--his most dangerous Republican opponent--by 59 percent to 36, this situation could turn around rapidly.

Hitherto the President's patience has paid off in that he has been able to impose silence on his opponents in the name of the national interest and the possibility of getting the 50 hostages out of Tehran safe and sound. His calculation was well advised. But time is no longer necessarily on his side.

For the past 2 months the President has taken few initiatives liable to reassure those expecting action.

The Kremlin thought that the SALT II agreements had no chance of being passed by the Senate. The Kremlin thought that the value of invading Afghanistan outweighed that of "friendly" relations with the United States. The Kremlin also cleverly played on the difference of opinions between Cyrus Vance and the State Department--in favor of a wait-and-see policy--and Zbigniew Brzezinski and the National Security Council--which support a harder-line policy.

The President's options are limited. So far he has relied on UN resolutions aimed at politicizing the situation on an international level. However, although this might make the U.S. Government feel good it does not solve the international imbroglio.

Each time the United States has been forestalled. Nobody had foreseen that the hostages could be held for so long. Nobody seems to have foreseen that the Soviets could deploy some 40,000 men in a few hours.

Moreover, the President is trapped by his own statements like his determination not to use grain exports as a retaliatory measure under any circumstances. Were he to go back on his word he would call down the wrath of the producing states--such as Iowa where the first primary election takes place on 21 January. The reduction in air services between Moscow and the United States has no real significance. The possibility of the United States not taking part in Moscow's summer Olympic Games is raising an outcry in sporting circles. The decision to send arms to Pakistan and restore economic aid should be weighed against relations with India.

The most interesting development will be Defense Secretary Harold Brown's mission to China which starts this weekend. It would seem that the White House has given up hope of following a balanced policy between the USSR and China and has decided this time to play the Chinese card as far as is possible. This would be a crucial turning point in this decade which is, strangely enough, bringing us back to Harry Truman's cold war days.

Others present included the SPD parliamentary business manager Gerhard Jahn, who represented floor leader Herbert Wehner; the leader of the FDP Bundestag group Wolfgang Mischnick; and Deputy SPD Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski. Bonn's Moscow ambassador Hans-Georg Wieck was present along with NATO Ambassador Rolf Pauls. From the Chancellor's Office the meeting was attended by State Minister Guner Hunker; State Secretary Manfred Schueler as coordinator for the three secret services; and BND [Federal Intelligence Service] chief Klaus Kinkel.

It is assumed in Bonn that the meeting discussed the security consequences of the crises in the Middle East, U.S. sanctions against the USSR and their support by European allies.

[Text] Bonn--The Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee met for a special session in Bonn today to discuss developments in Afghanistan and their international repercussions.

Taking part in the committee's confidential discussion were Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and State Minister Hildegard Hamm-Bruecher of the Foreign Ministry. FRG Ambassador to Kabul Heinrich Berninger, who was summoned to Bonn to report on the situation, was also available to answer the committee members' questions.

TRANSPORT UNION HEAD BACKS U.S. DOCKERS' BOYCOTT OF USSR SHIPPING

[Text] Hamburg--Heinz Kluncker, chairman of the Public Services and Transport Union (OETV), said today that the union will insure that "the boycott by U.S. dockers against Soviet ships will not be undermined in German ports." In an interview in tomorrow's issue of BILD ZEITUNG he announces that "if Soviet ships are rerouted, then they will also not be loaded or unloaded in German ports."

The OETV chairman stated further that the DGB [German Trade Union Federation] Executive at its next meeting might discuss a protest to the Soviet trade unions against the invasion of Afghanistan. Kluncker characterized the Soviet measures as "an intervention carried out against others like that of Nazi Germany in the thirties."

The text of the interview was prereleased today to DPA by BILD.

STRAUSS SCORES SCHMIDT'S 'SOFT-PEDALLING' OF AFGHAN INVASION

LD101400 Hamburg DPA in German 1221 GMT 10 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss has strongly attacked Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt for his stand to date in the Afghanistan affair and has charged the Federal Government with being a "government of illusions," to which it is high time to bid farewell. He believes, along with the majority of the population, that Afghanistan represents goodbye to illusions about detente, and that it is a "crisis of confidence in the foreign policy leadership expertise and far-sightedness of the present federal chancellor," said Strauss today in the Union's press service.

In the midst of loud protests, amid the moral indignation of the nonalined states against communist aggression in Afghanistan, Bonn pursues appeasement and soft-pedalling, criticized the CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor. The Third World is waiting in vain for common action by the West--such as humanitarian assistance for the stream of refugees from Afghanistan. Alluding to the chancellor's New Year's address which was changed at short notice because of events in Afghanistan, Strauss emphasized that it could have been easier for Schmidt were he "not the prisoner of his own self-conceit and of the ideological daydreaming of his comrades." The CDU/CSU for years has drawn attention to flashpoints in world politics in the Far East, in Latin America, in the Middle East--from Afghanistan's northern borders right down to southern Africa.

Strauss, who charged Schmidt with helplessness and repeated mistakes, emphasized his view that the policy of detente was geographically indivisible. One could not pursue a policy of detente in Europe and a policy of imperialist conquest in the Middle East and Africa.

Alois Mertes, CDU/CSU foreign policy expert, denied ever having demanded that the heretofore realistic policy of detente by the Federal Government must be continued. Assumptions to this effect by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald are wrong. On the contrary, he demanded that the "illusionary concept of detente a la Egon Bahr" must be replaced by a realistic policy of detente.

BRANDT WARNS AGAINST OVERREACTION TO SOVIET ACTIONS IN ASIA

LD101840 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 10 Jan 80 LD

[Text] SPD Chairman Brandt has warned Europe against overreacting to Soviet interference in Afghanistan. Speaking at a ceremony to mark the 80th anniversary of the SPD parliamentary group in the Bremen city parliament, Brandt said that to talk into existence an end to the policy of detente would be a flagrant violation of the Federal Republic's most vital interests.

SPD disarmament expert Pawelczyk said that he has reached agreement with U.S. Government representatives in Washington that Europe should be kept out of the Afghanistan conflict as far as possible. The two sides agreed that it is primarily a question of conflict between the USSR and the Third World.

GENSCHER ARTICLE ON AFGHANISTAN, 1980 WORLD TASKS

DW1011311 Offenburg BUNTE in German 10 Jan 80 p 7 DW

[Article by Foreign Minister and FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher: "We Will Continue Our Peace Policy Toward the East"]

[Text] The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the Islamic Revolution and the hostage drama in Iran, and the threatening oil price increases--just to name a few examples--make one realize how much today's world has become a world of crises and conflicts.

In this restless world the Federal Republic of Germany is one of the politically and economically stable states. But we must always be aware of how much we depend on developments in our surroundings: Our country is located in an exposed position on the line between the East and the West. Every fourth job in our country depends on exports, which means on the development of the world economy. We need raw material and energy imports.

It is clear that we must be alert with regard to outward challenges.

Peace, freedom and welfare are not goods one inherits and possesses forever without doing anything for them. They must much rather be safeguarded over and over again. That calls for courage with regard to freedom and responsibility.

The challenge of the eighties is the following: safeguarding in the middle of a changing world peace, freedom and economic stability. Our country cannot live up that challenge if it stands alone. Our incorporation in the European Community and the North Atlantic alliance remains, therefore, the basis of our existence. I hope that those who doubted the correctness of the December 1979 NATO decisions have been taught better by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The unification of Europe and the safeguarding of the alliance's ability to act will also in the eighties be the main aims of our foreign policy.

On this foundation we will continue our peace policy toward the East. We want also in the eighties to bring the Germans closer to each other, step by step. We at least do not want to have a relapse into cold war. Nobody would suffer more from it than we Germans.

The basic prerequisite of detente is a military balance as well as the fact that no side ought to strive for military superiority. It is our aim to achieve that balance on as low an armament level as possible. We do not want to have an arms race but rather seriously intended disarmament negotiations.

Armament is already an almost intolerable burden for the people. The Soviet Union spends 12 percent of its national income on arms; we spend just 4 percent.

Therefore, it sought to also serve the interests of the Soviet Union if it accepted NATO's broad negotiating suggestions aimed at saving costs through agreed arms limitation. If it were up to us, the eighties would be dominated by an energetic arms limitation policy.

From the firm foundation of the European Community and the alliance, the West must live up to the challenges arising from the Third World.

National independence and social as well as economic development are involved. The overcoming of famine and misery is involved. This is practical human rights policy. If there were increased want and chaos, it would not leave the Western democracies or the socialist industrial countries untouched.

Development policy is not merely humanitarian policy; it is--in the literal meaning of the word--also a policy of safeguarding peace. That is a task all industrial countries must fulfill in their own interest. Western countries must increase their help, while Eastern countries, which so far have participated in that worldwide task in a completely insufficent way, must eventually live up to their commitments.

It is depressing for us to state that in 1978 we had to use for every DM1 spent on development aid, almost DM9 for our defense, and that because of the Eastern arms potential.

The entire imbalance, however, becomes clear once one finds out that for R1 spent on development aid in 1978, the Soviet Union spent R417 on arms.

The second big task of our policy vis-a-vis the Third World is to solve the numerous conflicts in the Third World peacefully, through negotiations. These conflicts are a permanent danger for world peace. They are a danger for economic development. And they are a danger for the independence of the Third World because foreign powers exploit them as a pretext and an opportunity to intervene.

Preserving and strengthening the independence of the Third World will be one of the big tasks of the eighties. Every last person ought to realize this in view of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The Soviet power policy pursued against a small nation shakes the basic principles of peaceful coexistence of nations and touches on the indivisibility of detente and the creation of confidence between East and West.

It meets the resistance of the Afghans and it also meets with the protest of the countries of the Third World, headed by the Islamic and Asiatic states.

The late imperialistic policy of predominance and of establishment of zones of influence goes against the trend of history. It is opposed by the strongest force of today's world: the will of the nations with regard to self-determination.

Today, states are dependent worldwide on each other. This world will be able to solve urgent, common problems only if the principle of equal rights without predominance gains ground.

We will therefore continue unerringly and zealously our policy of respect and support for the independence of the Third World, and we do it knowing that this is and must be the policy of the future.

We are facing great tasks. We face them courageously, with regard to freedom and responsibility.

FDP'S MISCHNICK RESTATES BONN SECURITY POLICY PRINCIPLES

DW110903 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 10 Jan 80 p 14 DW

[Article by Wolfgang Mischnick, chairman of the FDP Bundestag faction: "No Reasonable Alternative Is in Sight to the Policy of Detente"]

[Excerpts] Defense readiness and detente are indispensable elements of our security policy which complement each other. If one of these elements is neglected, the other one will also be risked. This sounds contradictory but it is the bitter truth, the only possible realistic way of seeing it.

We want to have as much defensive capability as is necessary in order to be able to pursue as much detente and arms control policy as is possible. A policy of detente which does not act on the basis of a safe defensive capability will become a policy of adaptation to the stronger one and will deprive us and others of the freedom and the ability to implement our ideas of a common peace policy of equal partners. There is no reasonable alternative to this policy, unless you are an unrealistic dreamer.

The military balance threatens to be affected. It is generally believed that the Soviet Union has much more military potential in the field of conventional arms--which in addition are being constantly improved qualitatively--than is necessary for protecting its security interests. The military balance between East and West above all is threatened in the field of continental strategic arms.

The responsible politicians in the West as well as leading political scientists hold identical views on this.

Yet we have studied carefully and seriously an article published in recent weeks in which it is said that there exists a military balance between the blocs. We consider this assessment unacceptable. It is the result of a calculation wrongly putting all Western nuclear arms in Europe--those with a long range and those with a medium range of action--into one pot. In this way the fact is hushed up that there is alarming Soviet superiority in continental strategic arms and, thus, in arms of a high strategic importance.

This superiority is nothing new. Until now it has been set off by the American superiority in the field of intercontinental strategic arms. SALT II, however, wants to fix a balance for these weapons. This entails that they only will deter each other from deployment. They no longer are in a position to cover the deterrence deficit in the subjacent continental strategic sphere.

Notwithstanding this fact, the Soviet Union has qualitatively and quantitatively increased its superiority in continental strategic arms not only through the production and stationing of the SS-20 missile but also through the Backfire bombers. The SS-20 missile is not comparable to the hitherto existing continental strategic missiles of the Soviet Union.

In contrast to them, it does not possess only one but three warheads. It is not rigidly mounted but mobile and, therefore, cannot be covered by Western weapons. It has a high degree of delivery accuracy and makes the military targets of the West extremely vulnerable. It can be recharged and its range of some 4,500 kilometers allows it to hit any point in Europe.

The United States, on the other hand, does not have any medium-range missiles. For 10 years now it has not introduced any new generation of medium-range bombers. This is why the United States does not have anything equivalent to counter the Soviet Union's continental strategic potential. This is detrimental in the sense of the mutual security of East and West, because the Soviet Union might utilize this gap in the Western deterrence system in the event of a crisis or conflict so as to achieve military advantage or exert political pressure.

In broad quarters the arming of the Warsaw Pact, its military doctrine aimed at an eventual offensive, its armed forces, who are structured, deployed, armed and trained accordingly, are increasing the already existing Western concern about the political and military intentions of the East. I do not impute to the present Soviet leadership that it is planning an attack on Western Europe. But the Soviet Union must realize that military superiority elicits feelings of threat, and this is why it has a destabilizing effect. This holds true for both sides.

By its own political will and by its strategy NATO is a purely defensive alliance. The structure, nature, and volume of its military potential make it totally unsuited for a strategic offensive. We are utilizing the economic, economic-technological, and social superiority for cooperation with CEMA so as to achieve political stability, but not for the purpose of political offensive.

It would be wrong to dismiss with a handwave the feeling of insecurity of the East bloc as pure propaganda. The psychological trauma of the Soviet Union, which above all also emerged from the terrible experiences of World War II for which the Germans are responsible, is no less a political fact than is the fear of competition of the East in the economic and economic-technological fields, regardless of how unjustified this might objectively be.

The efforts toward better predictability of the political and military deportment of the opposite party, the endeavor for a mitigation of the conflict potential and the containment of conflicts, for peaceful coexistence, and the refinement of the instruments for crisis management, hence, must continue to determine East-West policies, the FDP faction feels.

What remains the central element of this policy is the constant effort toward political, strategic, and military balance, an effort, hence, which seeks mutual security and mutual stability. What I said in the debate on the government statement in December 1976 continues to hold true as far as we are concerned: The policy of practical cooperation beyond the ideological boundaries requires of us--and there is no doubt about it--internal stability. Yet this policy can be put into practice only when the treaty partners are capable of a lasting cooperation. Hence, it is not just our own stability that is required but the capability of acting on the part of our treaty partners, too, is in our well-understood interest. This finding may not please a lot of people; it may even be entirely strange to them. Yet anyone wanting peaceful coexistence must put this finding into practice.

Balance today is an inalienable element of any peace policy. Imbalance makes cooperation of equal parties impossible. It will lead to an assimilation to the stronger or at least to feelings of inferiority, to fear and distrust. This is why the stabilization of the military balance is particularly significant.

Our foreign policy seeks to achieve military balance on as low a level of arms as possible. It proposes to build confidence, reduce armaments burdens, and thus also to contribute toward the development of the Third World. It is this comprehensive objective which determines NATO's broad arms-control offer now decided in Brussels and supported by all the alliance partners.

All of its component parts are attributable to initiatives of the Federal Government. These are: a proposal for the purpose of attaining an interim result at the MBFR negotiations, the decision of the United States to withdraw 1,000 nuclear warheads from Europe and, last but not least, the offer to the East to negotiate on the limitation of continental-strategic systems.

It is with great satisfaction that the Free Democrats welcome the great share of German foreign policy in this overall initiative of the alliance concerning arms control policy. We also welcome the fact that these initiatives have constructively taken into account the positive starting points from the Brezhnev speech and from the communique of the foreign ministers of the Warsaw Pact states.

The NATO decision, aimed at the elimination of the imbalance in continental-strategic weapons, is of particular import. The alliance has submitted to the Soviet Union the offer to negotiate with the United States on a mutual limitation of the medium-range systems as soon as possible and to keep NATO's own efforts toward closing the arms gap all the smaller the better this limitation is achieved. [sentence as published] In this respect, too, the target is to attain security through balance on as low a level of armament as possible.

The FDP faction has approved this decision. The approval emerged from the finding in arms-control policy that any further impairment of the military balance will deprive the effective continuation of our peace policy of its basis. This decision had been preceded by an extremely thorough preparation in the national framework and the framework of the alliance, a preparation which took all alternatives into consideration. Surely we did not make this decision easy for ourselves.

Our approval of the decision was promoted by the unanimity of the alliance partners in the fundamental elements of the decision and in the assessment of the security policy situation, as well as by the consensus of the Bundestag faction. We have measured our views time and again by the arguments of the public debate, and we have taken the objections of the Warsaw Pact seriously, to the extent they did not disquality themselves as threats and propaganda. There was, however, no acceptable explanation for the Soviet armament in the continental-strategic field. We regret that our proposals to halt the production and deployment of the SS-20 missile and thus to facilitate future negotiations were not accepted by Moscow.

The numerous talks of Western politicians, last but not least those by the chancellor and the foreign minister, in which they voiced their concern about the impairment of the balance in the continental-strategic field, did not lead to an armament halt by the Soviets even though the Soviet Union by now has more warheads in the continental-strategic field than NATO would have at its disposal if it were to implement its arms-gap closure program fully--contrary to its primary objective. Likewise, we noted with regret that the Soviet Union has not honored a unilateral arms waiver of the West with return concessions--such as in the case of the neutron weapon and the B-1 bomber.

Since the Soviet Union failed to react to our proposals and worries for 2 years we failed to see any sense in postponing necessary decisions for another 6 months, regardless of how seriously we considered corresponding proposals. The initiator of this proposal, the Danish Government, after an intensive discussion at the Brussels conference, repudiated its concept, by the way.

The full conformity of views of the alliance partners in the assessment of the security situation and the objectives was the precondition for the unanimity in principle. This is not contradicted by the reservations of a different nature and different temporal effect on the part of the Belgian and Dutch government. Great Britain, Italy, and the Federal Republic of Germany have even now approved the deployment on their territories. We would not have accepted a stationing in the Federal Republic of Germany exclusively. This would have jeopardized the solidarity of the alliance. Arms control policy stands a chance only if this decision is kept up.

The Federal Republic of Germany is not a nuclear state, nor does it want to become one. Yet in the negotiations on the continental-strategic arms its security is subject to decision, too, as is that of the other alliance partners. Just like the latter the Federal Republic of Germany, too, has a chance to influence the organization of negotiations. We Free Democrats will support the Federal Government in its efforts toward attaining the stabilization of balance in continental-strategic weapons with a minimum of arms-gap closure and a maximum of arms limitation. Whether this will be possible essentially depends on the deportment of the Soviet Union, but also on the consistency with which the alliance partners stick to the decision.

The arms-control policy decisions of the alliance must be viewed in the full broadness of their offer: an MBFR initiative introduced by the Federal Government aims at achieving, to begin with, an accord on the American and Soviet data, with utilization of the rapprochement so far achieved in the fundamentals and with gradual solution of the difficult discussion on the overall data. [paragraph continues]

On this basis it is planned to withdraw, to begin with, 13,000 U.S. soldiers and 30,000 Soviet soldiers.

Such an interim result would also provide a positive impulse for the successful conclusion of MBFR, namely, an agreement with controllable data on a collective, mutual maximum strength totaling of 700,000 men in the reduction area.

At the same time, the introduction of such measures is suggested which will allow the control of the observance of MBFR agreements.

In highly armed Europe, confidence-building measures are of central significance. There must be security against surprise attacks; there must be clarity with regard to mutual military intentions and mutual military deportment so as to preclude misunderstandings and make it possible to cope with crises. Hence, the confidence-building measures must incorporate an essential part of the European territory. The geographical extension must be accompanied by an extension of the instruments for building confidence.

Beyond this, at the CSCE followup meeting in Madrid the participants should, in keeping with the French proposal concerning a disarmament conference--a proposal aimed at confidence building--agree on this disarmament conference and convoke it as soon as possible. We Free Democrats would be pleased if this conference would also debate the crisis dangers that might emerge from the differences in Western and Eastern alliance strategies and from the differences in military potentials, and if it could map out solutions for coping with these dangers.

We Free Democrats are satisfied to find that the communique of the alliance's December meeting adopted these proposals which the Federal Government introduced. We are pleased that the foreign ministers of the European Community have entered into the security-policy dialog between East and West by approving the French proposal.

Free Democrats call on the Soviet Union to jointly implement with us the comprehensive arms-control policy initiative of the Western alliance which has also constructively taken the proposals of the Soviet Union into consideration. The coming decade must become a decade of arms control. Arms control can flourish only in a climate of detente and cooperation. This is applicable to all parts of the world.

The Madrid meeting, in which the foreign ministers will temporarily participate, must deal with all important fields of the Final Act. This also includes questions concerning economic cooperation and questions concerning human contacts and freedom of travel which are so important to us. What we want is headway toward more humaneness and less confrontation.

Anyone pursuing security and stability today through economic growth, technological progress, adequate raw material supplies, and protection against military aggression must also be always concerned about the security of others and must jointly seek with others to solve common problems concerning cooperation. We Germans especially must be interested in the success of such a policy. We Free Democrats will use every chance to promote its success, without abandoning our own security.

COMMENTATOR ASSESSES REACTIONS TO INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN

DW101055 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 10 Jan 80 p 3 DW

[Commentary by Brussels correspondent Erich Hauser: "Afghanistan and Europe"]

[Text] The West European governments are finding it hard to react appropriately to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. [paragraph continues]

It is impossible to do nothing. First, the Soviets could feel encouraged to perform a similar act of force say in Yugoslavia. Second, it is necessary to show clear solidarity with the United States, particularly for the Federal Republic, so that the U.S. public remains inclined to consider the security of West Berlin its own affair.

So far just London wants to joint the sanctions imposed by President Carter against Moscow. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher uses the formula that the U.S. sanctions "must not be torpedoed." Paris, however, wants to limit its activities to protests in Moscow and in the United Nations.

Most of all Bonn and Paris do not want to be the ones who make an end to the 10-year era of detente policy. But there must be two willing sides for pursuing detente policy. A basic change in Moscow's course is indicated by the fact that Soviet Ambassador Anatoliy Dobrynin--a member of the Central Committee--in Washington in early December had two long talks with U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance in which he discussed all aspects of the state of East-West detente policy and its chances, after which he departed for Moscow. That was prior to NATO's "decision to close the arms gap" (in the field of medium-range missiles) on 12 December. But it was probably the turning point, if Western analyses are correct that the occupation of Afghanistan needed several weeks of preparation. The Soviet "no" to the Western negotiating offer on bilateral medium-range arms seems to be a confirmation of the basic change in course.

If one tries to compare detente policy, which on the Soviet side is linked with the Brezhnev era, with the probable aims of the Kremlin, it was unsuccessful for Moscow at least in three ways: economic cooperation with the United States and Western Europe remained far behind the high expectations. The NATO alliance was not broken up; Washington's cooperation with Beijing and the developments in the Middle East and in Southern Asia intensified the Soviet feeling of being encircled. The formula of the "indivisibility of detente"--meaning that it cannot take place only in Europe--was coined by Henry Kissinger, to be sure, yet no doubt it was also the budiness basis [as published] for Moscow from the latter's viewpoint.

The sanctions announced by Carter leave the doors open for both sides to turn around. For the time being they are not directed against the other East European states. The drastic cut in the U.S. grain deliveries is hitting Soviet communism consumers in their meat pots. But, in the long run, Moscow can hardly tolerate an even clearer decrease in the Soviet standard of living in comparison with that of the East European countries. The CEMA partners will probably be forced to make sacrifices for the benefit of the Soviet Union. The U.S. delivery embargo on oil drilling equipment will slow down the Soviet opening up of oil sources. Moscow could be forced all the more quickly to buy oil in the OPEC countries. The Western oil supply would become even scarcer in that case.

Barring perhaps East Berlin, the East European governments reportedly are just as shocked by the new Soviet policy as is the West. This is why everything ought to be voided to "punish them as well." It cannot be in Bonn's interest at all to weaken the economic contacts with the GDR.

The West European EC and NATO states can do something that is much more important as a warning to Moscow, as proof of solidarity with Washington, and in their own interest: a massive action for the economic development of Turkey, Greece and Yugoslavia as well as of other Mediterranean countries. The sooner and more generously the negotiations of Belgrade and Ankara with the EC, which have been dragging on for quite some time, are wound up now through positive decisions, and the clearer this expresses a plain manifestation of will, the more will have been done for safeguarding peace. Just as in the case of arms projects, money ought to be of secondary importance in this respect.

ECONOMIC SECTOR WORRIED ABOUT POSSIBLE IRAN BOYCOTT

[Article signed K.B.: "German Economy Warns of Boycott Against Iran"]

[Text] Bonn, 4 January--Unrest is growing in the German foreign trade branch because of the aggravating international tensions and the increasing discussion about boycott measures against Iran, the Soviet Union and Afghanistan. Anxieties are intensifying in the economy that world trade might be covered with a network of sanctions. They urgently warn against such a progressive politicization of foreign trade. At the same time, however, the economy manifests solidarity with the United States, in the latter's controversy with Iran.

In a dialog with this newspaper the Association of German Industry and Commerce and the Federal Association of German Wholesale and Foreign Trade have now defined their stance on the demands for reprisals against Iran which will be on the agenda of the UN Security Council on Monday. Consul Hans Hartwig, president of the Association of Federal German Wholesale and Foreign Trade, leaves no doubt about the necessity of exercising solidarity with the United States. However, all experience with economic boycott and other embargo decisions causes Hartwig to arrive at the conclusion that such measures will be of little use and success in the future. Hartwig feels that on principle foreign policy should not be pursued with trade policy instruments. Politicizing foreign trade yields little politically but often has a boomerang effect economically.

Speaking on behalf of the top organization of the Chamber of Industry and Commerce, chief manager Paul Broicer points out that the Association of German Industry and Commerce continues to advocate a negative view of boycott and embargo measures. Their effect has always been limited, often with undesirable consequences. All experience shows that these sanctions would be circumvented increasingly as time goes on. Economic measures are not suited to political difficulties which primarily require a political answer. An embargo against Iran would gain a special position inasmuch as it would be aimed at a specific objective, namely, the release of the hostages detained contrary to international law. Here the United States deserves the solidarity of the West.

Enterprises involved in business with Iran report that German-Iranian economic relations continue despite the tense situation, although exports have been strongly curtailed, capacities in Iranian branch enterprises are not being exploited very much and there is a shift in main emphasis. It is expected in Bonn that exports from the Federal Republic of Iran will have reached some DM2 billion last year. That will be a strong setback compared with the export peak in 1978. At that time, more than DM6 billion was achieved. The remaining export volume is still remarkable, however. It ranges between the value of exports to Japan and India. Export enterprises maintain that their opinion has been confirmed, namely, that the revolution showed that a market where the German economy has an old tradition will not be fully lost even in a critical phase. In the meantime, however, the main emphasis of deals with Iran have been shifted. Business involving large installations is considered as having come to an end. The supply of spare parts and smaller installations, however, has continued. Increased food export figures have been reported.

Iran has a great demand for basic foodstuff imports.

German foreign trade is involved in this in a limited way and generally with such goods as poultry, eggs and cheese. German cheese made of cow's milk called "feta" is particularly important; its taste comes close to sheep's milk cheese. Exports in 1979 increased considerably in these product groups.

The main food suppliers are the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. According to the latest information from Washington, discontinuing food supplies to Iran is not planned.

STUDENT GROUP ESTABLISHES DIRECT CONTACTS WITH POLISH OPPOSITION

LD101320 Hamburg DPA in German 1104 GMT 10 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--The "Ring of Christian Democratic Students" (RCDS) has established direct contacts with young members of the Polish opposition. Stefan Dingerkus, RCDS deputy chairman, reported Thursday in Bonn that he attended a seminar over the new year "in a small village in Poland." A group of West European students held discussions there with young Poles who belong to the country's democratic opposition. He went on to say that six students from Britain, Norway and Sweden were also present. The Poles were students and young workers, who in part already have been active in the Catholic Church movement. "We wanted to learn directly how the Polish opposition constitutes itself and what aims it pursues, said Dingerkus to DPA. It is his impression that the Polish opposition is considerably greater than generally assumed in the West. The Catholic Church is in this a body for all who want a social and political commitment without being state run.

1 TURK KILLED, 10 INJURED IN WEST BERLIN INCIDENT

[Text] The assassination of revolution martyr Celalettin Kesim will be avenged. Last Saturday reactionary fascist forces attacked the workers and students who were selling the KURTULUS [LIBERATION] newspaper and distributing tracts which protested the latest move of the generals in Turkey and the imperialist fueling of anti-Soviet propaganda under the pretext of the Afghanistan incidents. The incident occurred in the [name indistinct] square of West Berlin. Kesim, a revolutionary, was stabbed to death during the incident. He was killed by the reactionary fascist hordes due to his support for the Afghan people's just struggle against imperialism and for the Soviet aid to the Afghan people. Ten of our workers and youths were seriously injured during the incident.

West Berlin security officials are as responsible as the reactionary fascist murderers for the treacherous assassination of Kesim, a member of the Turkish Central Administrative Council. They had been warned about this possibility by the progressive democratic organizations. Instead of heeding these warnings, the West Berlin security officials turned a blind eye to the fascists who were preparing to attack and encouraged them.

The Turkish progressive democratic organizations as well as the West Berlin public severely denounced the incident. The West Berlin Socialist Unity Party and the German teachers' trade union have denounced the incident asking for the punishment of the criminals and have extended their condolences to Kesim's family.

CORSICAN NATIONALISTS CONTINUE HOTEL OCCUPATION

Trade Union Strike Called

LD101516 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 10 Jan 80 LD

[Summary] For the moment, the situation in Ajaccio is calm and there are now fewer policemen stationed in the streets surrounding the Fresch Hotel, in which the 30 or so Bastelica nationalists are still closeted.

About 30 autonomists and nationalists burst into the town hall in Corte this morning and are now occupying the premises. The mayor of Corte has refused to call in the forces of order.

At a meeting in Bastia this morning 21 political and trade union organizations decided to make a call for a general strike in Corsica tomorrow as well as for a day of inactivity in Ajaccio. According to the communique issued by the organizations, the aim of these actions is to obtain the cessation of military search operations in Corsica, the release of people who were arrested in Bastelica, the definitive suspension of legal proceedings against them and the immediate opening of negotiations.

Interior Minister Statement

[Text] The minister of the interior, Mr Christian Bonnet, was the guest on the news magazine program on TF1 [first French TV channel] at 1300. He has thus just made a statement about events in Corsica.

The minister of the interior pointed out first that responsibilities are well defined: We act in such a way, Mr Bonnet said, as to avoid any confrontation or any provocation. There will never by any bargaining with hostages-takers in France, Mr Bonnet said. It is not a question of a political affair but one of common law.

Finally, the third point developed by the interior minister--and I have just this minute heard this--necessary reinforcements are at this very moment on their way to Ajaccio and Bastia.

MARCHAIS ON ROME, USSR VISITS; PCF-PCI COMMUNIQUE ISSUED

LD101239 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 7 Jan 80 p 10 LD

[Unattributed report: "Talks Between G. Marchais, E. Berlinguer"]

[Text] During his visit to Rome and after his return to Paris, Georges Marchais held several interviews with journalists.

Questioned on his talks with Enrico Berlinguer, Georges Marchais stated: "During these talks we informed each other on the situation in our respective countries; and we examined the international situation, including, of course, recent events in Afghanistan. Naturally we also discussed the initiatives for joint action which are being prepared, and finally we examined the development of relations between our two parties."

Asked to say whether he would be speaking on behalf of all the European communist parties when he goes to Moscow this week, G. Marchais said that, with the natural exception of the PCF, he had no such mandate from any party, but that this did not mean that he will not be defending positions and ideas dear to the Eurocommunists.

In an interview given to the Rome correspondent of French TV channel TF1, he said that in Moscow, which he has not visited for 6 years, he would be the "spokesman for friendship and peace between peoples and for disarmament."

Before leaving Rome for Paris, he declared on Saturday that "there is no substantial differences between the position of the PCF and that of other Western communist parties."

After Saturday's meeting with Enrico Berlinguer, he stated that relations between the two parties were "good".

On returning to Paris, he declared on Sunday, still with reference to the party's position on Afghanistan: "We formulate our policy in Paris with reference to the interests of the French workers, the French people and of France...We have our own criteria and it happens that when examining certain questions, and this is the case with Afghanistan, we arrive at different conclusions from those of other communist parties. This means that we are not following anyone's line."

Regarding his trip to Moscow, G. Marchais again stated "that Eurocommunism exists, it lives, it continues and it is developing."

The Joint Communique

At the end of the meeting which took place near Rome between the PCF and the PCI, the following joint communique was released:

"Within the framework of consultations between the PCF and the PCI, Georges Marchais, secretary general of the PCF, and Enrico Berlinguer, secretary general of the PCI, met in Rome. Also present were: Maxime Gremetz, PCF Politburo member and Central Committee secretary; Gian Carlo Pajetta and Paolo Bufalini, members of the PCI Directorate, and Rodolfo Machini, deputy chief of the Foreign Policy Section.

"In the course of the conversations, which took place in a climate of friendship, a broad and frank exchange of views occurred on the situation in both countries, on the crisis and its consequences, especially in the capitalist countries of Western Europe, and on the struggles and moves for unity of the workers' movement in these countries. The two delegations went on to examine the development of the international situation, and the efforts the two countries were displaying in the defense of peace, for detente and to reduce armaments. They agreed to intensify them as a contribution to the broadest possible action of all the forces striving for these objectives. They examined the outlines for cooperation of the European workers' and democratic movement and the progressive forces in the developing countries in setting up a new international economic order.

"The PCF and PCI agreed on the usefulness of developing their close cooperation." [Dated] Rome, 5 January 1980.

PCF OFFICIAL TERMS AFGHAN REBELLION 'FEUDAL'

LD091144 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 9 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The French Government continues to inform opposition parties about the latest developments in the world situation, evidently a crisis situation.

After Socialist Lionel Jospin last week, it was Communist Andre Lajoinie's turn to be received at the Foreign Ministry yesterday. Mr Francois-Poncet brought him up-to-date on the situation in Afghanistan which confirmed information gained by the PCF. This was stated by Andre Lajoinie on his departure, when (Helene Bessis) interviewed him.

[Begin Lajoinie recording] This information does not contradict that which we already possess and which forms the basis of the Communist Party's standpoint on these events, with which you are familiar. I think it has been confirmed that if this feudal rebellion, supported from outside, had been successful, it would have had negative consequences for the Afghan people and would have created--on the border with the Soviet Union, in this region of Central Asia, which as Mrs Gandhi has said has already been destabilized by American intervention--it would have created a zone of insecurity and a danger for world peace. [end recording]

Mr Lajoinie will relay this information to his party's leading bodies and to Georges Marchais on his return from the Soviet Union.

L'AURORE SCORES GOVERNMENT FOR ATTITUDE TO SANCTIONS

LD101131 Paris L'AURORE in French 8 Jan 80 pp 1, 6 LD

[Jacques Guilleme-Brulon article: "The Late Western Solidarity"]

[Excerpts] The confusion which has prevailed in the minds of the leaders of Western countries since the "Kabul operation" seems characteristic.

Unfortunately for us, it has emphasized the desire to create on this side of the Atlantic a dichotomy between the action--albeit restrained--taken by the United States against the USSR and the degree of "understanding" which we are apparently supposed to show for Moscow.

Mr Jean Francois-Poncet, who asserted on Sunday that France could not envisage any economic reprisals against the USSR following the Soviet action in Afghanistan, provided evidence of the gulf which exists between American and our concepts of detente.

Therefore why wax indignant at the PCF's soothing attitude toward this matter since, after all, the government has adopted a line of conduct very similar to that of Georges Marchais?

In plain language, the French foreign minister has refused to support the retaliatory measures against Moscow which Washington has decided to take.

In fact, this is what we anticipated yesterday when we referred to the need for joint action by the West with respect to the USSR.

The sanctions planned by the United States will become completely credible only if all the Western nations decide to support its action by any means.

We are off the beam. France has stated through Mr Jean Francois-Poncet that it is ready to "continue the dialog."

What dialog, for heavens' sake? A dialog which will lead to the ruthless genocide of the Afghan people in the near future?

Any dialog which prohibits any use of trade relations for political ends "on principle" is a sad and oppressive dialog.

And yet the Soviets have never failed to use such methods against their adversaries. "Baptist" Carter's disappointment with the Kremlin must have been very great to make him use weapons which he hitherto willingly relegated to the property room.

However, it seems that the dichotomy between France and the United States has reached hitherto inconceivable heights. Let us overlook the fact that Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing was Moscow's candidate in 1974, as the spectacular visit paid by Soviet Ambassador to France Chervonenko to the French Democratic Union candidate on the eve of the presidential election emphasized.

The ambiguity of our relations with Moscow has increased continually through the years.

A willing absentee from NATO and only grudgingly a member of the Atlantic alliance, Paris may believe that in the event of any grave crisis it would become a "deus ex machina," an honest broker between the two superpowers.

Let us be quite clear about it. Such a possibility is an illusion. If Washington and Moscow were one day to reach any impassable heights of tension which their national interests could no longer tolerate, our so-called good will would seem naive.

We would only be left with our inadequate deterrent force and, as a result, we would have to abandon something over which we would have to weep like children since we would have been unable to preserve it like men, just as Boabdil did on the eve of the fall of Grenada when under attack by the Catholic kings [in the 15th century].

There can be no doubt about it. Western solidarity is dead.

IMPLICATIONS OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS FOR WEST, USSR VIEWED

LD101031 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 9 Jan 80 pp 1, 7 LD

[Gabriel Farkas article: "Moscow Must Choose Between Wheat and Bombs"]

[Text] Winter will be hard in Moscow. By answering the Russian military intervention in Afghanistan with economic retaliation, Jimmy Carter is hitting the Soviet leaders on a particularly sensitive point, for the reduction in deliveries of American grain can only aggravate the precariousness of food supplies in the USSR.

This is more than a warning shot. The freezing of U.S.-USSR economic relations could, in fact, lead most Western countries in turn to put the brakes on their economic relations with the Soviets.

When countries engage in trade they usually derive mutual benefit from it. Relations between the USSR and the West are no exception.

The Soviets need the know-how of "capitalist" industries, while French, German or American business executives ask nothing better than to sell to the Russians. This fusion of interests explains the rapid development in East-West trade. Thus Franco-Soviet trade figures tripled during 1975-79. Today the USSR is our tenth biggest customer; it takes a little under two percent of French exports.

However, an examination, albeit cursory, of East-West relations makes is possible to establish that, all things considered, the real winners until now have been the Soviets. There are two reasons for this:

1. Eastern countries are buying more and more on credit. Experts estimate the Soviet bloc's total debt at $65 billion, equivalent to 2 years exports to the West.

The credits granted to them are all the more favorable since, in order to make their businesses work--and also because of "excess liquidity" on the financial markets--the West has embarked since 1974 on a veritable race to lower interest rates on export credits.

This means that the equipping of the communist countries is partially financed by "capitalist" savings deposits whose value when the loans are repaid will be singularly reduced by inflation.

2. Price growth works in favor of the Soviet bloc. What are called the "exchange terms"--that is, the relationship between the price index of exports to that of imports--are broadly favorable to the Russians. In fact, the Soviets primarily export raw materials, the prices of which are increasing much more rapidly than those of industrial products. With the same amount of petroleum as in 1972, the Soviets today can buy between four and five times more durable goods.

Historical Setback

The heavy debt of the Soviet bloc is easily explained, despite the favorable development in the "terms of exchange."

To overcome their industrial backwardness, the communist countries need Western equipment and technology. By virtue of the historical setback of collectivized agriculture, the Russians also need to import an increasing amount of their food. Finally, public pressure for better living conditions is forcing Eastern governments to increase their imports of manufactured goods by a little more each year.

But the resources that a country uses constitute a whole. Thus, in granting them favorable credit, the industrial democracies have enabled the Soviet leaders to devote an important part of the Russian national income to manufacturing the tanks which are today patrolling the streets of Kabul.

The sanctions announced by Jimmy Carter remind the Kremlin leaders that detente can be nothing but worldwide, that they must choose betwen wheat and bombs.

These sanctions have the added merit of making the West think. For a long time we have lived in the hope that the development of economic relations would contribute little by little to the liberalization of the Soviet regime and to a gradual reduction in its expansionist nature.

Today the facts show that this hope was merely an illusion.

COSSIGA, ARAB LEAGUE SECRETARY GENERAL HOLD TALKS

AU110925 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 11 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome January 11 (ANSA)--Openings for a resumption of dialogue between the European Nine and the Arab states was one of the topics discussed here when Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga met with the Arab League's Secretary General Chedli Klibi Thursday evening.

An official communique described the meeting at which Cossiga was flanked by Foreign Undersecretary Giuseppe Zamberletti as "cordial". Italy is the Nine's deputy chairman. The statement said there was an "ample exchange of views on various international topics with particular reference to the Middle East, reiterating the hope that efforts at finding a peaceful solution to the problem will be crowned with success".

According to the statement, the Italian side confirmed the Nine's readiness for a "resumption of Euro-Arab dialogue on a level of concrete and fruitful initiatives of cooperation in various sectors".

The Nine voiced its support for developing cooperation between the European and Arab regions in statements issued on September 11 and November 20 last year. According to the EEC this dialogue must be carried out with the whole group of the Arab states without intervention in the Middle Eastern region's internal problems. According to this view, one of the major obstacles to Euro-Arab dialogue is the split in the Arab camp between Egypt and the "Rejection Front" countries over the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty.

OFFICIAL 'ASTONISHED' AT USSR MINISTER'S CHARGES

LD091659 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 30 Dec 79 p 10 LD

[Unattributed report: "Statements by Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Robles Piquer"]

[Text] In connection with the Soviet minister of fish industry's statements [that U.S. special services tried, by allegedly diverting to Madrid an Aviaco aircraft flying the Tenerife-Moscow route on 1 November, to force the defection of Yuriy Makarov, director of the Spanish-Soviet joint enterprise SOVHISPAN], Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Carlos Robles Piquer told EL PAIS yesterday: "I heard with the utmost astonishment the story reported by the EL PAIS correspondent and attributed to the Soviet minister of fish industry. The story is absolutely implausible because, in the first place, the diversion of a Spanish aircraft from its regular route would have become an act of skyjacking which would have provoked a sharp protest on the part of Spanish authorities."

"Second, the Soviet authorities have never discussed this matter with the Spanish foreign minister or with the Spanish Embassy in Moscow."

"Last, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko's visit took place quite normally, as is in keeping with the good diplomatic relations existing between the two countries. Thus if the EL PAIS correspondent's story accurately reports what the Soviet minister of fish industry said, I have no alternative but to take the view that, at least in this instance, the minister does not know what he is talking about."

COMPANIES REPORTEDLY SIGN AGREEMENTS FOR IRANIAN CRUDE

[Summary] Spanish Petroleum [HISPANOIL], the Spanish Petroleum Company [CEPSA] and the Spanish Petroleum Refinery Company [PETRONOR] have over the last few days signed agreements in Iran for supplies this year of a total of 1.45 million tons of Iranian crude, according to sources in the oil sector. The HISPANOIL and CEPSA contracts are for 500,000 tons each, while the PETRONOR contract is for 450,000 tons. Thus, the three firms have concluded the talks which began several weeks ago at the London offices of the National Iranian Oil Company.

PSOE DELEGATION HEAD INTERVIEWED ON DEPARTURE FOR U.S.

LD100000 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 9 Jan 80 LD

[Text] A delegation of the Spanish Workers Socialist Party [PSOE], headed by Alfonso Guerra, left Madrid this afternoon for the United States where it will have discussions with U.S. authorities about NATO. At Barajas Airport, Guerra made the following statements:

[Begin recording] [Question] Are these contacts with the U.S. administration and the opposition going to deal in depth with Spain's position and the position of the PSOE with respect to the country's possible membership in NATO?

[Answer] Indeed, without the slightest doubt, the security matters we are going to deal with will include Spain's possible entry or nonentry as a member of NATO. Everyone knows that the Socialist Party has declared itself with full clarity to the effect that it does not see the need for Spain to become a member of NATO.

[Question] So that is completely clear, and there is no possibility of that stance being modified during these contacts in the United States?

[Answer] No, no, far from it. We will be using these contacts, naturally, to spell out our view and to try to present convincingly to our interlocutors--this in the U.S. Government, the opposition and even presidential candidates--the idea that the stance adopted by the Socialist Party is the one which best benefits our country and which provides the most support for a status-quo situation, for neutrality, for nonintervention, for avoiding further complication of the tensions that already exist between the powerful blocs of the Soviet Union and the United States. I feel that our contacts should (?serve) precisely to strengthen the party's stance in this respect, and to clearly convey that this is a stance shared by a considerable section of our people and that Spain's position of neutrality should be maintained and even strengthened.

[Question] Do you think that there will also be any discussion of the matter of the U.S. military presence in Spain?

[Answer] Yes, without a shadow of doubt we will discuss the possibility, or the impossibility, of renegotiating the bilateral treaty between the United States and Spain. We will study precisely what are the present conditions of the treaty, what might be the conditions of a hypothetical renegotiated treaty, or what conditions (?might apply) indeed if the treaty did not exist. We will do this as clearly and sincerely as possible, from the viewpoint of a party which is in opposition but which has made a detailed study and analysis of the desirability of and the points against a treaty such as that currently in force between the United States and Spain.

[Question] In view of the economic crisis which is severely affecting Spain, will there be a discussion of this matter with the objective of possible support from the United States in the form of investment, for instance?

[Answer] Well, we will also be trying to make contact with important U.S. economic circles, not only in the finance and banking world but also in the area of energy. The energy problem, the financing of research into new sources of energy for Spain, for Europe and for the United States is one of the most pressing problems now facing the Western world, which has long extracted raw materials cheaply from other countries. With the current rise in oil prices and the ensuing economic crisis, it has become an even more far-reaching problem. We will be dealing with all these problems and we will make every effort for our attitude to be of benefit to our country. [end recording].

MUNDO OBRERO CONDEMNS INTERVENTION BY SUPERPOWERS

LD101047 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 3 Jan 80 p 5 LD

[Editorial: "Afghanistan and Other Precipices"]

[Text] Neither the United States nor other leading NATO powers has the moral authority to condemn the Soviet Union for its military intervention in Afghanistan's internal affairs. History-including the most recent history--discredits them.

Those of us who have always spoken out can do so, from whatever quarters, intervention may come--we peoples who undergo interventions and we anti-imperialist forces who struggle hard and tenaciously for socialism and freedom. This broad popular and progressive area includes we Spanish Communists--we who underwent with our people the German fascist intervention; we who have not ceased to condemn U.S. intervention in the fraternal nations of Latin America; we who said "no!" to the intervention in Czechoslovakia, "no!" to the U.S. intervention in Cuba's Bay of Pigs and "no!" to Israel's expansion at the expense of the Palestinian people; we who say "no" to Washington's complicity with the shah, guilty of imposing a cruel dictatorship on his people; we who say "no!" to the U.S. State Department's scandalous intervention in Italy's domestic politics by imposing its veto--at this very moment--on participation in that country's government by those such as the PCI who have the democratic support of millions of citizens' votes.

And we say "no!" to the intervention by Soviet military forces in Afghanistan from a class and revolutionary point of view; because the liberation of the people from imperialism is the work of the people themselves who undergo it, or it serves as a pretext for the conflicts of the big blocs and powers, in addition to furthering the maneuvers of imperialism, which disguises itself, as is happening in connection with the events in Afghanistan, as the champion of noninterference in other people's affairs.

At the same time, we say this because the blocs' conflicts are once more placing the world on the brink of the precipice--U.S. Marines and paratroopers in the Persian Gulf awaiting Washington's orders to pounce on Iran; U.S. medium-range missiles in the process of being deployed in West Europe; more U.S. arms "sold" to Morocco to maintain the subjugation of the Sahara and to threaten Algeria; Soviet military forces in Afghanistan since a few days ago, and NATO, not indifferent but an accomplice in military interventions in black African countries, is "studying" retaliation.

The dynamics of precarious strategies have been set in motion. The big powers are rapidly moving their pieces to occupy positions--warlike positions--contrary to peace, disarmament and denuclearization and contrary to the interests of the people and mankind.

MADRID DAILIES SCORE USSR AFGHAN VENTURE

ID091305 [Editorial Report ID] Madrid ABC in Spanish on 28 December 1979 publishes on page 11 a Jose Maria Carrascal commentary on the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan entitled "Afghanistan, a Vietnam for the USSR," which, after noting the strategic importance of Afghanistan and the fierce resistance of the Afghan guerrillas to the "atheist" regime in Kabul, asks: "Have the Russians become involved in a Vietnam?" It continues:

"Much suggests that they are in a situation similar to that of the Americans in 1963, when, seeing that the allied government in Saigon was collapsing, they decided to intervene on a massive scale. They are also confronted with difficult terrain and a hostile population. But there are also important differences. In the first place, Afghanistan has a lengthy border with the Soviet Union--something which was not the case with respect to South Vietnam and the United States and which will make the operation easier, militarily speaking.

"Second, the Russian troops could prove a good deal tougher than the U.S. troops. And last and most important: Moscow does not have to take its public opinion into account, which is what finally broke the morale of the U.S. expeditionary army. There is no Jane Fonda there, and if there is, she is silent.

"They can therefore absorb whatever casualties there are and launch the operations which they deem opportune, without fearing domestic criticisms--and as far as those of the world are concerned, they have never cared very much about them.

"Nevertheless, they are not to be envied. It has never been pleasant to interfere in a country against the majority of its population, and today, less than ever. The Afghans are extremely tough mountain people, prompted by an unshakable faith. The most that the Soviet expeditionary force can do is to keep them in the mountain redoubts and control the urban areas, always with a high cost in bloodshed.

"But it must have seemed worthwhile to the Kremlin. Of course, if it succeeds in keeping the rebels in check and in establishing its presence there, its influence will make itself felt in the region--from an Iran where nobody knows what will happen to a Pakistan in difficulties--apart from having demonstrated something important: that they fight for their friends. Will the Americans fight for theirs?"

Madrid EL PAIS 30 December 1979 publishes on page 6 an editorial on the same topic entitled "Afghanistan: The International Danger Increases," which, after maintaining that the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan represents "nothing new" in the Kremlin's conduct and that everything suggests that the operation had been carefully planned, places the intervention within the context of the Islamic revival as a whole. Noting that the Amin regime's inability to restore normalcy apparently made the USSR decide to intervene, it asserts that "it remains to be seen whether the new government will be better able than the ousted government to give the area soon a stability which the USSR needs. Otherwise, the contagion of the Islamic Revolution threatens to spread, and 15 million Muslims live in Russian [as published] Turkestan alone."

It concludes: "In the meantime, the U.S. position becomes more complex and weaker every day. U.S. analysts believe that the Muslim resurgence is unstoppable and regard as endangered--on the horizon--the stability of Pakistan--which is of considerable strategic importance to Washington's--and of India, where a more pro-Soviet government is not inconceivable in the near future. The question is: How long will President Carter be able to maintain his current cautious stance, as opposed to those who are demanding more vigorous actions, while the entire Near East is turning into a blazing torch close to the oil wells which constitute the Western world's greatest energy source? To the moral condemnation which any military intervention in a foreign country deserves--whoever perpetrates it--there should therefore be added in this instance the accusation against the Soviet Union that it is helping to increase tension substantially in an area of the world already subject to too many confrontations. The intervention in Afghanistan is not only a contemptible action--something which unfortunately matters less each day in politics--but also a move which is dangerous for the future of international order."

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON GRAVITY OF AFGHAN SITUATION

LD101127 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 5 Jan 80 pp 14-15 LD

[Report on Ruth Northen 4 January interview with Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen: "With the Best Will in the World There Is No Excuse for the Soviet Union"--place not given]

[Excerpts] Afghanistan has entered the picture--and Kjeld Olesen's program--between his visit to Hungary before Christmas and one to Finland starting in a couple of days. For this reason the interview arranged yesterday had to be squeezed between diplomatic consultations and an important foreign policy meeting.

Of course there is something worse than that--the invasion of Afghanistan must have come as a grim surprise, most of all for everybody who otherwise might have had a slight hope that the world was now becoming mature enough to ease off the arms race.

Unless he is one of those who sees this as a confirmation along the lines of "I told you so."

Kjeld Olesen, where does the government stand now?

"There is no doubt that what is happening in Afghanistan is a clear setback to the detente process which has been underway in recent years despite difficulties. This is the first time since World War II that the Soviet Union has carried out an invasion outside the Warsaw Pact and it is impossible not to see the events as a link in a deliberate strategy. Thus it is also directly linked with the debate over medium-range missiles last fall.

"After all, it was a very basic part of the recent NATO resolution that immediate negotiations with the Soviet Union should commence so that in 3-4 years time, when the new missiles are ready, a different situation should prevail than when the basic decision was adopted.

Unsympathetic

"Unfortunately, however, it must be said that a very unsympathetic attitude has been noted on the part of the Soviet Union and there is much to indicate that with the events in Afghanistan the Kremlin has certainly created an atmosphere reminiscent of the cold war.

"When I was visiting Hungary recently my Hungarian counterpart made certain critical remarks concerning the United States and the problems in Iran. I asked him whether he could name another superpower which would show the same patience. But I received no answer.

"I also believe that in such a heated situation as at present it is very important that nobody leaps to hasty conclusions from the tendency there always is to overdramatize events.

"There should be no doubt that the Danish Government views what is happening in Afghanistan with the utmost seriousness, but it is also essential to keep a cool head."

NORWAY

NORDLI OUTLINES PROSPECTS FOR THE EIGHTIES

LD101027 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 2 Jan 80 p 6 LD

[Unattributed report: "Prime Minister Nordli on the Eighties"]

[Excerpt] The challenges of the eighties occupied much of the speech which Prime Minister Odvar Nordli made on radio and television Tuesday evening [1 January]. In the speech he stressed the role which the balance of terror plays for peace in our part of the world, but he also strongly emphasized the importance of bringing the great powers to the negotiating table on the basis of the express desire of Norway and other small nations to defend their sovereignty. This historical opportunity must be exploited, he said.

The prime minister outlined some prospects against the backdrop of George Orwell's gloomy futuristic novel "1984," which he considered has been extremely accurate to date. Nordli himself sees only one safe way into the future--increasingly developed democracy and greater respect for human rights and human values. These are necessary if Orwell's pessimism about the future is not to become a reality.

In general the prime minister praised all Norwegians for displaying effort and self-discipline during a wage and price freeze. The same desire for moderation is required to resolve the problems ahead of us, he stressed.

He noted that the seventies have shown us that the time when we will have learned to live together in peace is still far off. There have been some bright spots--Greece, Spain and Portugal--but the prime minister also drew attention to the problems of the Vietnamese refugees, the new dictatorship in Iran and the situation in the Middle East which is still tense and dangerous.

The prime minister said that the Soviet Union's recent entry [innmarsj] into Afghanistan has filled us all with deep anxiety. This action has created an acute situation in a previously inflammable area.

"I have already stressed to the Soviet authorities that Norway dissociates itself from any form of involvement in other countries' internal affairs. I will again direct an urgent appeal to the Soviet authorities to change their minds," he said.

"In our own part of the world we have had the longest period of peace in our history. Or dare we speak of peace when this rests on an increasingly developed balance of terror?" he asked.

He answered himself thus: "As long as we have nothing to put in its place, we must face the bitter reality that this balance must be maintained. But the balance must be a means, never an end. And it is the superpowers' responsibility to emerge from this situation; even small countries have their responsibility in this regard," the prime minister said.

He added: "In order to succeed with this task we must take the harsh facts of life as our starting point. We must let it be clearly understood that we have the desire and ability to defend our sovereignty. On such a basis we can make our contribution to bringing the great powers to the negotiating table."

The prime minister strongly advocated a new world economic order for the sake of the poor countries. Just as we combated poverty in our country with a new method of sharing social wealth, so the poor countries of the world today demand a new distribution of wealth. We have no right to call ourselves humanists and democrats unless we do more to resolve this disgraceful problem.

FRYDENLUND REVIEWS FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

LD101029 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 31 Dec 79 p 7 LD

[Report on Norwegian Press Bureau [NTB] "new year" interview with Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund: "Greater Orientation Toward United States Following Refusal To Join EC"--date, place not given]

[Text] "Norway's refusal to join the EC has resulted in a greater Norwegian orientation toward the United States and enhanced support for NATO," Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund asserted in a new year interview with NTB. The foreign minister believes that Europe in the eighties could become the stable area in a world otherwise dominated by conflicts and unrest. On the talks with the Soviet Union on the northern areas, Frydenlund stressed that Norway must be prepared to display patience and let things take their course. Iceland's interests are to be safeguarded by an accord on a zone around Jan Mayen.

Frydenlund said that the situation in south Lebanon has eased some and the Norwegian UN forces will remain there for the time being. The government is in the process of assessing aid to Vietnam and expects that aid programs for the refugees throughout the world will continue to increase.

Frydenlund said that the EC will become the core of a more independent Europe--something which will have a great effect on relations with East Europe and with the rest of the world.

In the EC there has been an interesting development which has hardly been noticed. The EC was originally an economic grouping with an agricultural arrangement. Now the EC has increasingly coordinated foreign policy, which has given international politics a new dimension. No foreign policy measure is taken by the foreign ministers before it has been thoroughly discussed by officials. This is a new dimension, Frydenlund said.

In the coming year we will have negotiations at three different levels on European problems:

--The Madrid conference is to follow up the Helsinki CSCE. Particularly important are the confidence-building measures on which both sides have formulated proposals.

--Negotiations on force reductions in Europe (MBFR) are in progress in Vienna. Both sides have submitted proposals and declarations on the withdrawal of forces.

--Negotiations on nuclear weapons in Europe. The communique of the Warsaw Pact states' talks in East Berlin gave a clear signal that the Eastern states want talks on arms control and disarmament. The offer made by NATO Ministerial Council is the most comprehensive ever made by NATO.

"Last year the problems in the northern area came no closer to a solution. There is still a desire on both the Norwegian and Soviet sides not to dramatize the situation. This in itself is a positive development. There has been ongoing contact both on the demarcation line and on the Svalbard problems without any breakthrough. [paragraph continues]

"We must be prepared to display patience. Obviously we are interested in having solutions as soon as possible. But as it is we must let things take their course," the foreign minister said.

Our principled stance on the Jan Mayen issue is still that we have the right to establish an economic zone but that we are prepared to let the Icelanders have negotiated arrangements which safeguard their interests in the area. The time for another round of negotiations cannot be set until a new government is formed in Iceland, Knut Frydenlund said.

STOLTENBERG REVIEWS DEFENSE POLICY ISSUES

LD101113 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 4 Jan 80 p 16 LD

[Report on NORWEGIAN PRESS BUREAU [NTB] "new year" interview with Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg: "Stoltenberg: Soviet Action Causes Fear of Setback"--date and place not given]

[Text] The Soviet Union's intervention [intervensjon] in Afghanistan could result in a setback for NATO's efforts to enter into negotiations with the Eastern bloc countries. This is what Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg fears. In a new year interview the minister also asserted that Norwegian base policy is as firm and credible as it was 30 years ago.

During the year the law on working conditions will also begin to apply to military personnel. Stoltenberg described this as a great challenge. The defense minister praised the Coast Guard for a good effort with limited hardware and recalled that Norway will get its first F-16 aircraft 25 January.

"Among specific tasks, the implementation of the law on working conditions in the armed forces is a great challenge. It will make great demands on how the armed forces are to determine the priority of their resources in order to rectify conditions for their personnel and to meet the demands which people make for the competent defense of the country. It is of the utmost importance to preserve broad support for the armed forces among the Norwegian people," Stoltenberg stressed to NTB. Regarding the armed forces' economy, the minister pointed out that this year the defense budget is to be increased nearly 3 percent in comparison with 1979--and that Norway is among those NATO countries which have fulfilled the objective of such an increase. Within the economic framework the armed forces themselves will have to determine sensibly the priority of their resources, Stoltenberg said, adding: It is not right to regard the armed forces' economy as independent from the rest of the country's economy. It would stress that it is important for the country's security to have a safe economy.

Norway can and does have great influence on the international peace effort, the defense minister said. He mentioned the Norwegian UN engagement in Lebanon as a specific example of a small country's opportunities. Stoltenberg stressed that the Norwegian UN forces have made a respectable contribution. He believes that we have to be prepared for the fact that the UN presence in south Lebanon might be relatively protracted.

Minister Soltenberg also mentioned the mid-December NATO decision on nuclear weapons modernization as an example of a small country's influence.

"I was encouraged by the speed with which the negotiating offer was conveyed to the Soviet Union and East Europe. Norway strongly advocated that the offers be formulated as soon as possible once the decision was taken.

"I hope that the combined decision in Brussels has contributed to creating the political prerequisites which are necessary for people to come to the negotiating table, but at the same time I now fear that the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan might cause a setback," the defense minister said.

The minister definitely rejected the idea of there being interest in changing Norwegian base policy. He stressed that advance stockpiling of heavier allied military equipment on Norwegian soil is a natural consequence of the base policy. With such advance stockpiling the Norwegian base policy is as firm and credible today as it was 30 years ago.

"Technological development has reduced the time factor in defense policy and has made advance stockpiling of greater interest. Such stockpiling of materiel is necessary not only to insure that reinforcements can arrive in time but also for us to avoid receiving reinforcements earlier than we might like in a tense situation--and thus assist in escalating it to a potential crisis situation," Stoltenberg pointed out.

The defense minister recalled that the first new vessels and aircraft will come into service with the coast guard at the beginning of this decade. "This will mean a considerable strengthening of our ability to protect the new areas within the 200-mile zone."

Minister Stoltenberg also drew attention to the fact that Norway will receive the first of 72 F-16 aircraft in slightly more than 3 weeks. Among their duties will be the defense of airports and junctions which are of great importance for the influx of reinforcements into the country.

"When we have paid most of the costs of the aircraft purchase, we will switch to the Roland-II low-level defense system and other types of antiaircraft missiles," Stoltenberg continued. The defense minister rejected the idea that Norwegian airports today are said to be wide open. "We already have airport defense with, among other things, fighters, antiaircraft batteries and the recently erected Robot-70 mobile antiaircraft weapon. In southern Norway the Nike batteries will still be able to perform a function. The reason why we must continue to work on our air defenses is that these defenses are central, not peripheral in the deployment of reinforcements in a given situation," the defense minister said.

COMPANY, ASSOCIATION CONCLUDE OIL AGREEMENT WITH IRAN

LD082232 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 2100 GMT 8 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Swedish Oil Consumers' Association and Swedish Petroleum have concluded an agreement with Iran on oil deliveries of 450,000 tons of crude oil this year, which is 100,000 tons more than last year. The price will also be lower than that which Iran had earlier planned.

Supplies to the multinational oil companies, such as BP and Shell, have been greatly reduced by Iran, and this is part of the oil countries' desire to supply oil directly to national companies rather than the multinational companies.

CABINET REAFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR U.S. MOVES AGAINST USSR

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] The Cabinet today reaffirmed its determination to support the United States in taking strong measures against the Soviet Union over the invasion of Afghanistan. Ministers support the U.S. view that the invasion must not be allowed to blow over as a nine-day wonder and for normal relations with Russia to then be resumed. They want to ensure that the Soviets are left in no doubt for a long time to come of the West's serious view of the invasion. The aim is to discourage the Soviets from attempting any further adventures into countries in this highly sensitive area.

It was the first Cabinet meeting this year, but Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington was unable to attend. He is touring the countries bordering Afghanistan. Ministers are awaiting his report on his tour when he returns next week, when measures will be coordinated against the Soviet Union with NATO allies and Common Market partners.

DAILY TELEGRAPH CALLS FOR STRONGER ALLY BACKING FOR U.S.

[Editorial: "Carter Needs Back-up"]

[Excerpt] While Russian troops still swam into and over Afghanistan--estimates now go up to eighty or even a hundred thousand--America's allies show, to say the least, less sense of crisis, urgency and responsibility than the rudely-awakened American President. Numbers of this order further increase, if possible, alarm and disgust. They show that Moscow intends to pursue wider aims, quickly. They also show the extent to which its latest puppet, Mr Karmal, needs to be imposed by force against a nation in arms. Mr Carter has given a good lead in his package of measures to bring pressure on the Russians--without further increasing the risk of war more than the Russians, in their assumption that they can now get away with almost anything, have done already. But the back-up from the Europeans, America's proteges, who depend on Middle East oil much more than America, has been decidedly patchy.

Britain's support has been the most whole-hearted and unequivocal. France, as usual, seems to have been more concerned with asserting her independence than with giving due support to the common cause--the familiar whiff of great power pretensions and of De Gaulle's "special relationship" with Russia based on them. West Germany, also as usual, is striving to reconcile the exigencies of Ostpolitik with her deep loyalty to the alliance, her detestation of the Soviet system under which so many of her countrymen in East Germany are suffering, and her awareness of Soviet military strength on her doorstep.

Mr Carter, giving fresh proof yesterday of hiw new-found realism and resolution in face of the Russian threat, said that America's allies would join in a consortium to provide military and economic aid to Pakistan. This is a test in which they must not fail.

HOUSE APPEALS TO WALDHEIM FOR MEASURES AGAINST FAMAGUSTA

[Text] The House of Representatives has approved an appeal to the UN secretary general as well as to the governments and parliaments of various countries to take the necessary measures to avert the unilateral actions being threatened by the Turkish Cypriot leaders in connection with Famagusta and the declaration of an independent state. The House approved a statement made by its president, Mr Mikhailidhis, at the opening of today's first session in the new year.

The statement stresses that the threats by the Turkish Cypriot leaders--made particularly in a period when the UN secretary general is undertaking a new initiative for the resumption of the inter-Cypriot talks--clash with the creation of the atmosphere necessary to conduct constructive negotiations that would lead to a lasting and just solution to the Cyprus problem. The statement also calls on the Turkish Cypriot leaders to abandon the tactics of provocation and threats and to come to the negotiating table in a spirit of good will and conduct substantive negotiations on the basis of the 19 May agreement with the aim of finding a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus problem. The statement also supports every initiative by the UN secretary general for the resumption of the dialog and declares that the Greek Cypriot side is ready to open substantive and constructive negotiations under the auspices and guidance of the UN secretary general.

The president of the House of Representatives said that, on the basis of this statement, he will proceed with the relevant representations to all parliaments and all groups of the Interparliamentary Union, denouncing the unilateral actions being threatened by the Turkish Cypriot leaders and, at the same time, appealing for support.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN DENIES REPORTS ON UN VAROSHA PROPOSAL

[Text] Answering questions by newsmen today, the government spokesman described as absolutely unfounded a report in today's press that, at the latest meeting between Foreign Minister Rolandhis and the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Galindo-Pohl, a UN proposal was conveyed for the opening of Famagusta in return for the Cypriot Government's recognition of the illegal Tymbou Airport. The spokesman stressed that no such sounding has been made by the United Nations. He also said that the government's policy on the Famagusta question is well known.

In answer to another question, the spokesman said that no decision has yet been made on Mr Rolandhis' trip abroad in connection with the Famagusta question.

TRSC MINISTER DENIES 'BUFFER ZONE' NEAR BRITISH BASES

TA101616 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 10 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol has denied the recent allegations that a certain area within the borders of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus and in the region where the Federated State has its border with the sovereign British bases constitutes a buffer zone and is outside the sovereignty of the Turkish Federated State.

Following the recent efforts to change the status quo of the Turkish Federated State, Kenan Atakol today invited the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Galindo-Pohl, and conferred with him at his office for some time. In a statement after the meeting Atakol stressed that there was no land controlled by the Greek Cypriot administration or by any other third party along the border region where the Turkish Federated State and the sovereign British bases are separated by a single border.

Atakol said that the status of the people living in that region has been the same since 1974. He noted that it was impossible to change this status now. Only the law of the Turkish Federated State is implemented in that region. We would like to declare that we consider the recent efforts to change the status quo here as unnecessary, unacceptable and provocative.

TFSC APPEALS TO UN ON PEACEKEEPING FORCE ACTION

[Text] Lefkosa, 10 Jan (AA)--The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus applied to the United Nations about the actions of the UN peacekeeping force in the British base of "Dekelya." Last week, UN peacekeeping troops claimed that the region called "Strovilia" near the base was "no-man's-land" and stopped Turkish officials from controlling the region.

The Federated State also announced that the Strovilia region was under Turkish sovereignty. The Federated State strictly rejected claims by the Greek administration and the UN peacekeeping force involving alleged border changes in the region.

I VRADHINI DISCUSSES ROGERS REMARKS ON NATO REINTEGRATION

AT101620 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 10 Jan 80 pp 1,2 AT

[From the "Evening" column: "Optimism"]

[Text] According to dispatches from Brussels, the supreme commander of the Atlantic alliance's forces in Europe, U.S. Gen Bernard Rogers, yesterday expressed optimism concerning Greece's return to the alliance's military wing.

The general's interview was basically devoted to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and it was reasonable for the supreme commander of NATO to draw the conclusion that the Soviet intervention in Kabul should accelerate the tightening of relations among the allied countries. But what should be done is not necessarily what is being done.

If the events in Afghanistan have added new elements that can possibly influence the issue of Greece's relations with the alliance, these elements are linked with the strengthing of the need to restore the alliance's southeastern wing and with the strategic importance of the Turkish role. As long as there is no change in Ankara's assessments--and so far there has been no such indication--the second fact for the Turkish side dominates the first, or at least makes it possible for the leadership of the neighboring country to put forth even more strongly the viewpoint that the unity of the alliance's southeastern wing should be restored in accordance with Turkish concepts.

Therefore, at first glance General Rogers must not be deriving his optimism about settling the question of Greece's return to the alliance's unified military structure from developments in Afghanistan. But from where else could he be deriving it? Naturally, it is customary when someone undertakes a mission to express optimism that it will conclude successfully. After all, the opposite would be strange: If one did not hope for the successful completion of the mission, it would be better not to undertake it. Thus far, no question arises, nor in principle should one protest General Rogers, certainty that a good solution exists which he must find and which he believes he will find. The question that arises is whether hopes are enough to lay the foundations for more than "diplomatic" optimism.

Rogers' predecessor, General Haig, also expressed optimism many times but was proven wrong by events. Perhaps this should make the current supreme commander of the NATO forces more guarded. It should make him even more guarded if he is starting from the same basis General Haig used which remains unacceptable to the Greek side. If, however, General Rogers has drawn correct conclusions and does not intend to propose solutions that may infringe on Greek sovereignty, his optimism just might have some substantive basis--as always, provided that the alliance will talk to Ankara in another language and that the latter will understand that it cannot continue playing the "veto" game.

ELEVTHEROS KOSMOS DENOUNCES KARAMANLIS' FOREIGN POLICY

[Editorial: "Greece's Foreign Policy in the Light of Events in Afghanistan"]

[Text] The international tension that has occurred at the instigation of the Soviet Union has proven that for more than 5 years our foreign policy has been based on completely erroneous assessments and that it is being exercised with makeshift maneuvers. [paragraph continues.]

This is not a matter of "devious interpretations" about a particular act or omission, as our diplomats--and especially the man who directs them, K. Karamanlis--may think. Recent developments--Giscard d'Estaing speaks of direct dangers to international peace--have proven how shortsighted the leadership of New Democracy has been. There are five main points in the foreign policy which the government has exercised: our withdrawal from the NATO military wing, the undertaking of an initiative for multilateral Balkan political cooperation, the advertised "multidimensional" foreign policy, the declaration that there is no danger for the country's independence from the north and the abandonment in principle of the Greek-U.S. agreement for a balance of forces between Greece and Turkey.

In the first case, that of our withdrawal from NATO: We endowed Turkey with a "veto" against our possible demand to return to the alliance--and this has truly happened--and we permitted Ankara to utilize to its diplomatic and economic advantage the defense gap that was created.

In the second case, that of inter-Balkan cooperation: It was not taken into consideration that Moscow does not allow Bulgaria to consent to multilateral political Balkan cooperation, because it is anticipating the appropriate time for a military intervention or for another sort of pressure in the Balkans in order to settle its accounts with Yugoslavia, Romania and Albania.

In the third case, that of the "multidimensional" foreign policy: The equal cooperation of any Western country with the communist states is possible and mutually beneficial only on condition that the Western country has full defense protection--and is not cultivating delusions. Talk about a "multidimensional" foreign policy objectively lacks diplomatic seriousness and realism.

In the fourth case, that of the nonexistence of foreign dangers: it was stated by Defense Minister E. Averof that at this moment there is no danger from the north against the country's security and independence. Then against what danger do we seek to return our country to the NATO military wing? And since when has this danger reappeared?

In the fifth case, that of the Greek-U.S. military agreement: In 1976 we reached an agreement for U.S. military aid to balance the consequences of the previous U.S.-Turkish agreement, and while the latter will be finally signed in the next few days, it seems that our original agreement has been abandoned--God knows on the basis of what genius' assessment.

In the light of recent events it is stressed that in all five cases serious errors were committed, at least with the result that the Soviet Union and Bulgaria were led to the evaluation that we are or are becoming the West's weak link.... And Zhivkov's smiles aim at encouraging our irreparable disengagement from NATO and the United States so that strategic advantages can be created against us in favor of the Warsaw Pact--and the Bulgarians themselves have practiced intervention through their participation in the military conquest of Czechoslovakia in August 1968.

The government has been surprised by the development of the international situation and, even if it wants, it has no political margins to remedy its unforgiveable mistakes in our critical foreign issues--which in any case are linked with the internal situation and the strengthening of freedom's institutions against their declared adversaries, our communist and Middle Eastern left. We need a new government because the current one is both a minority government and one which has failed.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA FAVORS COALITION GOVERNMENT IN TURKEY

AT101735 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 10 Jan 80 p 4 AT

[From the "Views" column: "Greek-Turkish Affairs"]

[Text] If the effort that is being made in Ankara finally bears fruit, by doing now what should have been done the day after the elections--have the parties of Demirel and Ecevit joined forces in an effort to forestall the tumble into the abyss of bankruptcy and general bloodshed--we shall also gain something: the possibility of holding talks with a Turkish Government that perhaps may be able to make decisions. That "something" would be very significant because more than 5 years have been wasted in talks at the "ministry" or "technical" level that did not nor could not go anywhere since they exclusively served the purpose of "leaving the door open until a substantive dialog could be held." It was a situation which both sides believed "worked" to their advantage. It is, or rather it will be if it happens, something very significant.

However, the possibility of a substantive dialog does not necessarily mean that we shall be able to make Turkey see the reality which it has so far persistently ignored and which can be summarized in three "no's": No to Cyprus' partition and occupation, no to the ceding of our sovereign rights and no to "settlements" in the Aegean that are not legal according to existing agreements and the laws of the International Court in The Hague. These three "no's" do not bar the way for cooperation between the two peoples who are confronting almost the same problems and are enduring almost the same pressures.

If Ecevit and Demirel understand this well, the dream of Elevtherios Venizelos and Kemal Ataturk will be resurrected, because then nothing will separate the peoples of the two countries; the things that unite them will be so numerous that they will be able to coordinate their incessant struggle for the guarantee of their true independence and the consolidation of the right someday to feel that they are the masters of their land and fate.

The 45-day postponement of the signing of the U.S.-Turkish "defense" agreement at least provides an opportunity for an open road in this direction.

STATE DEPARTMENT REMARKS ON DEFENSE AGREEMENT NOTED

TA110624 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 11 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The defense and economic cooperation agreement initialled by Turkey and the United States envisages the use of the joint defense installations in Turkey only for NATO purposes. Our correspondent in Washington, Recep Guvelioglu, reports that State Department spokesman Hodding Carter held a news conference at the State Department and said that the talks between the two countries were concluded successfully. Carter said that the Turkish Government extended the temporary working status of the defense installations by 45 days. He added that the main agreement will be signed by the two governments after some agreements on implementation and additional protocols are signed.

Later, the deputy director for Southern European affairs of the State Department, Bud Hughes, replied to journalists' questions on the issue. A journalist asked him whether, under the agreement, the U.S. Air Force could use the joint defense installations in Turkey in times of danger. Hughes said: It is true that we seek flexibility during any negotiation process, however, in this case, we only discussed the usage of the bases in cases concerning NATO.

Asked who commanded the joint defense installations in Turkey, Hughes said: These installations are primarily under the command of the Turks. However, Americans command the American elements. Hughes also said that a joint committee to be established would determine the military aid to be extended to Turkey.

UK'S LORD CARRINGTON DEPARTS AFTER EXCHANGE OF VIEWS

In a statement at the airport Erkman said that they had exchanged views on the present situation in the world and on urgent international problems. Erkmen also said that their talks had been very useful.

Lord Carrington said he had listened to the views of the Turkish Government on various international issues as well as on the latest developments in Iran and Afghanistan. Noting that Turkey is the largest member of NATO's eastern flank, Lord Carrington said Turkey's importance has increased following the developments in Iran and Afghanistan. He said that in this situation it was very important to hear Turkey's views and that this was why he had visited.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

SOURCES SAY EEC WILL NOT SUPPLY SOVIET GRAIN SHORTFALL

NC091831 Paris AFP in English 1822 GMT 9 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Brussels, Jan. 9 (AFP)--The Commission of the European Economic Community (EEC) today decided not to supply the 14 million tons shortfall in Soviet grain imports following the decision by the United States to cut its Soviet export contracts from 22 to 8 million tons, informed sources here said.

The 13 commissioners responsible for administering the Community decided to tighten controls on sales of grain to the Soviet Union, which last year totalled less than 200,000 tons.

However the Commission did not decide to suspend sales attracting export subsidies which took place under normal trading conditions.

Observers said the grain embargo applied by the U.S. in retaliation for the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan was worrying the EEC as a fall in world grain prices would require the Commission to pay higher export subsidies to keep European grain competitive abroad.

In addition U.S. attempts to offload the surplus could hit the EEC in its traditional export markets as the Community sells five million tons of grain a year in Egypt, Tunisia, Switzerland and Spain.

Further Report

LD101804 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1800 GMT 10 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Common Market today firmly ruled out the possibility of grain exports to Russia.

EEC Farm Commissioner Mr Finn Gundelach said in London the Common Market did not have significant grain exports to Russia but would not be willing to start them if approached by the Soviet Union because of the American ban.

Mr Gundelach said the question would be discussed fully by the Common Market foreign ministers' meeting in Brussels next Monday.

But he said the matter was so important the EEC Commission had decided to agree to the grain ban prior to that meeting.

GDR'S FISCHER VISITS KPOE CHAIRMAN MUHRI

AU111400 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 10 Jan 80 p 4 AU

[Unattributed report on meeting between GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer and Austrian Communist Party (KPOe) Chairman Franz Muhri in Vienna on 8 January 1980]

[Excerpt] Vienna--On Tuesday evening [8 January] a friendly meeting took place between GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer and KPOe Chairman Franz Muhri and KPOE Central Committee Secretary Erwin Scharf. The meeting was also attended by Gerhard Schramm, GDR ambassador to Austria, and Hans Steiner, head of the KPOe Central Committee's foreign relations department.

During the talk, which was held in an atmosphere marked by the identity of views, information of mutual interest was exchanged. Among other things, Franz Muhri declared that the KPOe welcomes the positive development of interstate, economic and cultural relations between the Republic of Austria and the GDR, the more so as it has always advocated it. The development of economic relations, moreover, is of particular importance for the safeguarding of jobs and the defense of Austria's independence against the advance of the multinational concerns.

The visit of the GDR foreign minister and its climate can also be assessed as a constructive contribution in [Austrian-GDR] relations and as another confirmation of the GDR's consistent policy of peace and detente, Muhri said.

On Wednesday [9 January] Foreign Minister Fischer also met leading functionaries of the Austria-GDR Society. Fischer reported on the results of his visit to Austria and presented an assessment of the world-political situation from the viewpoint of the GDR. Moreover, questions connected with the society's activities were discussed, and Foreign Minister Fischer expressed the GDR's appreciation of the society's work.

DENMARK'S JORGENSEN CONTINUES VISIT; DISCUSSES AFGHANISTAN

AU111207 Vienna ARBEITER ZEITUNG in German 11 Jan 80 p 4 AU

[Text] Vienna (APA)--On Thursday morning [10 January] Danish Prime Minister Jorgensen arrived in Vienna by special plane for a 3-day official visit, accompanied by his wife Ingrid. He was welcomed at Vienna-Schwechat airport by Chancellor Kreisky and his wife Vera.

In a first statement the Danish prime minister declared that the purpose of his visit was the maintenance of the good relations between the two countries, which are to be further developed. He then referred to the difficult economic situation in his country but added that he was nevertheless confident that the fundamental principles of a welfare state could be maintained. Commenting on the latest events in Afghanistan, the Danish prime minister declared that these events certainly constituted a concrete danger, but that one must keep a cool head and attempt again and again to continue the policy of detente.

At a dinner given by Chancellor Kreisky at the Chancellery's Congress Hall, Jorgensen stressed the numerous common interests linking Denmark and Austria. The two countries are not only linked by the same [national] colors but also by a cultural community. Both countries want peace and freedom and social justice, and for the party represented both by Chancellor Kreisky and by himself, the road to this objective is democratic socialism, he said.

Press Conference Held

AU111219 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1145 GMT 11 Jan 80 AU

[Edgar Heider report on press conference given by Danish Prime Minister Jorgensen at the Vienna Concordia Press Club on 11 January--with recorded excerpt from Jorgensen statements in English, followed by German translation]

[Excerpt] The two government chiefs [Austrian and Danish] are agreed on their assessment of the current world situation in view of the Afghanistan crisis.

[Begin Jorgenson recording] Both Dr Kreisky and I are deeply concerned about the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. We see it as a breach of a very important principle of international law. We are worried about the further consequences for the international community, not least because of the sense of insecurity that has been created. But there is no sensible alternative to detente. [end recording]

And on the Iranian question: Denmark wants to support the United States as far as possible in this difficult situation. But it also has to take into consideration its special interests--which leaves open whether or not Denmark will join in potential trade sanctions against Iran.

BRIEFS

INTERNATIONAL AGENCY COOPERATION PROMOTED--On 8 January Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr gave a working dinner for the heads of the international organizations that have their headquarters in Vienna: Director General Sigvard Eklund (IAEA) [International Atomic Energy Agency]; Executive Director Abd-al Rahman Khane (UNIDO) [United Nations Industrial Development Organization]; Secretary General Rene Ortiz (OPEC) [Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries]; and Director Dr Roger Levien (IIASA) [International Institute for Applied System Analysis]. The working dinner was designed to promote a closer cooperation of the four international organizations, especially in the energy sector. The participants have assessed this talk, which is to be continued periodically, as highly positive. [Text] [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 9 Jan 80 p 2 AU]

PRIME MINISTER ANNOUNCES MEASURES AGAINST USSR

LD112256 Montreal International Service in English 2200 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Prime Minister Clark has announced a series of actions against the Soviet Union because of the invasion of Afghanistan. They include a commitment not to increase Canadian grain shipments to the USSR next year. Canada is also looking into the possibility of moving the Olympic Games. Britain Kelleher reports:

Mr Clark and the Cabinet were in session all day on the Afghanistan question with the idea, as Mr Clark said, of coming up with actions that would be truly effective in convincing the Soviet Union to pull out.

First of all, on grain: Canada will not move in to replace any of the grain shipments cut back by President Carter. We couldn't anyway because we dont' have the facilities to ship any more right now. When Canadian contracts with the Soviet Union come up at the end of May, Canada will not increase its shipments, keeping instead to what Mr Clark called the traditional level of 3 million tons. Producers will be compensated for loss of income caused by any price slumps on the international market as a result of the Soviet situation. Canada will also try to make sure at a meeting of major grain producers in Washington tomorrow that no other country tries to take advantage of the situation to sell more grain to Moscow. Mr Clark said there must be concerted action by all.

The prime minister said that Canada does not want to boycott the Olympics but has serious doubts about holding them in Moscow. If the International Olympic Committee makes a request, Canada will consider holding the games in Montreal or elsewhere. Mr Clark has spoken to Mayor Drapeau and he will talk to Mexico and West Germany, other recent hosts of the games, to see if a move could be done.

Canada is taking other actions as well--scientific, technical and cultural exchanges with the Soviet Union will be cut back or canceled. Canada will also consult with other countries about tightening up the sale of high technology and scientific goods. All government visits are being canceled along with a Canadian line of credit to the Soviet Union. Discussions have been ended on a new consular agreement with Moscow. The Soviet airline, Aeroflot, will not be granted its usual extra summertime flights into Montreal. It will have the usual 2 flights per week instead. And Canada is prepared to contribute to Afghan refugees reaching Pakistan.

Mr Clark was asked if he agrees that Afghanistan is the worst crisis since World War II.

[Begin Clark recording] I think it is. It would be difficult to exaggerate the seriousness of the crisis posed by the Soviet presence in Afghanistan; and I think it is--there's an obligation upon Canada and other countries who want respect of international practices, and who also oppose the extraterritorial ambitions of the Soviet Union, to act as strongly as we can in the face of this very serious move on their part into Afghanistan. Concerning the actions we might take, I suppose President Carter phrased it very well when he said the other day that the Soviet Union cannot expect that it will be business as usual. After they take actions of the kind they have in Afghanistan, it will not be business as usual with Canada. [end recording]

The prime minister said Soviet fishing rights in Canadian waters were not cut back, because if they were the Russians would simply move outside the 200-mile limit, take the same amount of fish and end up hurting Canadian fishermen.

TEXT OF GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON SOVIET INVASION ISSUED

[Text] Bonn--The text of the statement by government spokesman Gruenewald given to the press in Bonn Friday after the meeting of the Federal Security Council yesterday is the following:

"1. The Soviet intervention is a serious violation of the principles by which all countries respect the inviolability of state borders and the right of a country to determine its own fate without outside interference. It is on these principles that the peaceful coexistence of the peoples is based.

"2. The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, a nonaligned country, touches immediately on the relationship between the USSR and the Third World, particularly the Islamic states. It shows that the USSR does not shrink from using its power in cases where circumstances are favorable in order to impose its will on a sovereign state. Obviously the countries of the Third World are becoming increasingly aware of this danger.

"3. The Federal Government supports the independence of the Third World countries, supporting them through political cooperation on the basis of equality and economic aid. It will continue this policy.

"4. The FRG and numerous states among them, many from the Third World, have made the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan the object of the Security Council deliberations and of a special UN General Assembly session. The objective of these deliberations is to end the intervention, which represents a challenge to all countries.

"5. Through its action in Afghanistan, the USSR has inflicted severe damage also to the cooperation between West and East, which is based on the renunciation of force, on growing predictability [wachsende berechenbarkeit] and the formation of mutual trust. In this situation the Federal Government regards it as important for the alliance and the Western world to act in a coordinated fashion. Above all it will continue to stand by the United States in solidarity. The Federal Government, on the basis of the deliberations of the Federal Security Council yesterday, is to make its contribution within the framework of consultations."

Concerning item five Gruenewald added the following explanation: "By and by the Federal Government already pursues toward the USSR in many areas a policy such as the United States has now decided on for itself. It sees to it that the USSR, in its missions in our country, does not keep more personnel than we in our missions in the USSR. This applies also to Soviet media representatives in our country. It does not provide or subsidize loans to the USSR. However, there are areas in which we are unable to take the same measures because of different conditions. For instance, the setting up of consulates is not at issue, neither do we supply grain to the Soviet Union."

"6. For the FRG the Atlantic alliance is the guarantor of our security and the keystone of our foreign policy. The military defense capability of the Atlantic alliance, including its early warning capability, insures that what happened in Afghanistan cannot occur in West Europe. Our Federal Army makes an important contribution to this capability of NATO.

"7. Together with its alliance partners the Federal Republic will adhere to its policy of defense and detente on the basis of a balance of military forces, which means: to meet also in future defense obligations and to continue our policy of detente. Hence the Federal Government emphasizes the significance of the NATO resolutions of December 1979 in all its parts."

In this way it, together with its alliance partners, advocates that the arms control proposals on the limitation of medium-range missiles, confidence-building measures and troop reductions in Central Europe, as resolved in December, remain on the table.

GENSCHER INTERVIEW AFFIRMS SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.

DW140841 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1815 GMT 13 Jan 80 DW

[Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Detente policy, Mr Minister, is indivisible. You have advocated this thesis, as has the Federal Government. Egon Bahr says it has always been divisible. Does this herald a change in policy?

[Answer] The Federal Government has no intention of changing its view of the indivisibility of detente. It is quite obvious that the detente process in Europe is burdened and impaired if parties involved in this process, in this particular case the Soviet Union, try to gain advantages for themselves in the world political balance through military interventions. This does not change anything in the basic character of this conflict which is a conflict of the Soviet Union with the states of the Third World, yet it affects the detente process in Europe nevertheless.

[Question] Detente can be pursued only on the basis of confidence. Does this precondition still exist or has it been affected to a point where we can no longer consider it existent?

[Answer] Security in Europe is based on the ability of the Western alliance to act. This has just been proven with the alliance decisions on closing the arms gap and the arms control offers in December; it has also been manifested by the efficiency of our own army, the Bundeswehr. Yet it is necessary, within the framework of the alliance, to mitigate distrust and to create confidence-building measures. In that respect it is absolutely clear that the Soviet Union, by its military intervention in Afghanistan, has done an ill turn to its proposals for contributing toward the confidence-building measures.

[Question] The United States, which is our greatest alliance partner, expects solidarity from us and from Europe now, just as it has always granted us its solidarity, especially in Berlin. Are we extending this solidarity only half-heartedly, Mr Minister? This is the prevalent impression.

[Answer] Wholeheartedly, because everyone must know that we in Europe are at least as much affected by the events in Afghanistan as is the United States. It would be a fatal mistake by the Europeans were they to believe that they could remain aloof on this issue, leaving the matter solely to their American ally. European-U.S. solidarity is necessary more than ever before, and we are determined to exercise it.

[Question] Are you not afraid that the United States might feel deserted and, consequently might only maintain a loose contact with the alliance?

[Answer] The Europeans alone will decide on this by their behavior. Anyone believing that they could buy security in the United States, as it were, or even get it as a present, will find out soon that this issue is viewed differently in the United States. This is why we have always insured, also for the future, that we, the Federal Republic of Germany, as Europeans make our contribution toward the common security of Western Europe and the United States.

[Question] To what extent is there agreement on this issue and on these views between the parties, first of all within the social-liberal coalition, but also with the opposition?

[Answer] I do not see any differences of opinion in the parties with regard to the will to guarantee security in the alliance as well as through inclusion in the European Community. It is also an uncontested goal, I believe, to mitigate conflicts peacefully and to achieve disarmament and arms control. I believe that the great consensus reflected by the last Bundestag debate in late 1979 following the NATO decisions should be continued. It should not be talked into nonexistence, even when controversies occur during the election campaign.

Further Genscher Remarks

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has appealed to all parties for a joint foreign policy approach in view of the East-West crisis over Afghanistan. The large agreement in the Bundestag debate in December following the NATO arms policy decision should continue, Genscher said on Second German Television [program] on Sunday. This agreement should not fall apart, not even during the election campaign. The common desire of all parties to guarantee security through alliance and the strengthening of the European Community, as well as the efforts to overcome conflicts by peaceful means and to aim for disarmament and arms control, is recognized, Genscher said.

Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, SPD deputy chairman, attached great importance to a common attitude by the government and opposition in basic questions of foreign policy, particularly in difficult times. Speaking on the same program, he nevertheless voiced considerable doubts as to the attainability of that objective since the opposition, to mention just one example, lacks a common policy.

APEL SAYS THIRD WORLD MUST UNDERSTAND SOVIET THREAT

[Text] Hamburg--In an interview for BILD AM SONNTAG, Defense Minister Hans Apel said in connection with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan that there is no reason to end the policy of detente. However, at no time have we held any illusions. Apel added that the Third World countries must be made aware of the danger posed by the Soviet Union and it must be made clear to them that development aid without strings attached comes only from the Western industrial countries. In reply to a question, the minister said that the Bundeswehr's state of readiness has not been raised. The very short preliminary warning times will remain adequate.

FOOD MINISTER SUPPORTS U.S. GRAIN EMBARGO

[Text] Bonn--Federal Agriculturel Minister Josef Ertl has said that the U.S. grain embargo is not directed against international trade, but that it must be seen as a political reaotion to the occupation of a free country. Ertl said today in a (?NWDR) interview that for this reason the trade embargo against the Soviet Union is not an attempt to reintroduce ideology [reideologisierung] into foreign trade. In his view the solidarity of all freedom-loving forces is the correct response to the Soviet Union.

Regarding replacement deliveries by the EC to the USSR (poultry and dairy products), Ertl voiced "total solidarity with our ally, the United States" in the interests of maintaining the political balance in the world and in safeguarding peace.

Ertl does not think that there will be special pressure on prices and supplies in the world's grain markets. He pointed out that the United States will first of all store the grain which has now become available and turn some of it into industrial alcohol. This year the EC is 95 percent self-sufficient in grains [passage indistinct].

CDU'S STRAUSS CALLS FOR 'FULL SOLIDARITY' WITH U.S.

[Excerpt] Bonn--CDU/CSU chancellor candidate Franz Josef Strauss has appealed to West Europe and especially the Federal Republic to show full solidarity with the United States in view of the international situation. At the end of a 2-day CDU defense congress Strauss said in Bonn on Saturday that this transatlantic solidarity is the only conceivable way to tackle the problems of the eighties.

Strauss, who in past years has repeatedly warned against relying too much on the Americans, said in a speech which lasted nearly 2 hours, that if Europe were to abandon the United States now the consequences would be incalculable. "If we turn our backs now on the United States then we will see in our hour of need that we have no one to support us," the CSU chairman said. He affirmed the Union's viewpoint that detente is indivisible. In this connection he accused Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of shortsightedness since he said the exact opposite. In today's world the West's security is also threatened in Afghanistan and Africa.

SPD'S BRANDT REITERATES NEED TO CONTINUE DETENTE

[Excerpt] Hamburg--In an interview for DER SPIEGEL, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has once again issued an emphatic call for a continuation of the policy of detente, free from illusions, even after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Brandt said of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan that it "could prove to be the gravest threat to world peace since the end of World War II." A continuation of the policy of detente was necessary, however, because the Federal Republic was among those who would suffer most "if what is termed the efforts for a lessening of tensions goes to the dogs."

At several points in his SPIEGEL interview Brandt stressed the special situation of Europe and the resultant consequences in the case of a European reaction to the intervention in Afghanistan. According to Brandt, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was right to speak with the French Government in Paris. "Western solidarity is important, European solidarity is even more important in this situation," Brandt said.

With regard to the sanctions against the USSR announced by U.S. President Carter, Brandt said that he did not want "to criticise them now." One should take care not to go overboard, however. Brandt emphatically rejected the idea of extending NATO's sphere of influence to the Persian Gulf. He also opposed any change in the arrangements for a meeting between Schmidt and SED leader Erich Honecker. He was not prepared to be more precise about a date for the meeting.

CDU'S WOERNER ANALYZES ROLE OF EUROPE IN AFGHANISTAN

DW141010 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 1700 GMT 12 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from statement by CDU-CSU defense spokesman Manfred Woerner on the occasion of the security policy congress of the CDU--recorded]

[Text] Though we do not feel any satisfaction about it, it is a fact: Latest developments have confirmed all our anxieties and all our predictions. Now perhaps more people in our country will realize that we are neither pessimists nor panic mongers, nor incorrible cold warriors, but that we have been right in our sober assessment of Soviet policy.

I think one of the characteristic features of our time is that it is no longer possible today to make a difference between social and military, between economic, internal and external security. One is just as important as the other, one is the prerequisite of the other. The best roads will not be any good if defense is ineffective, the best hospitals are worthless if they cannot protect a state. Conversely, however, military security alone is not adequate if social and economic security fails. It is just that in view of these events defense must be accorded more importance--no doubt about that.

It is absolutely impossible to keep Europe out of the conflict, if alone because the Soviet Union will not permit it. It is an undeniable fact that we are situated geopolitically in such a way that we are the first and most important target of Soviet power policy, even if the Soviet Union at the moment is seeking the detour via our oil and energy supply and by way of our flanks. This is why we Europeans cannot take any leave from world politics. This is out of the question. We are tied into world events, besides, our oil supply is being negotiated in the Middle East, meaning our very own destiny.

Afghanistan also offers the breakthrough to the Indian Ocean. This is one of the great objectives of the Soviet Union. This means that in all these places our very own, immediate weal as a nation and as a state, our survival capability are at stake. For this reason we just cannot take leave of it.

I am inclined to doubt that worldwide detente cannot be enforced, provided the West draws the proper conclusions and at long last really confronts the Soviet Union with the alternative of cooperation or clash. We prefer cooperation. But the Soviet Union cannot have both. It cannot engage in expansion and simultaneously desire Western help. If this is kept up for a change, if the West reacts in cohesion and energetically without overreacting, then I do see a chance for making it plain to the Soviet Union that it must display an attitude on a worldwide scale which is in keeping with detente. Then detente will not have failed.

It is impossible to divide detente. What I mean to say is that if aggression, expansion, attacks are practiced elsewhere, if our vital routes are cut off somewhere else, then we in Europe cannot pretend as though we had sheer peace, joy and sunshine here.

When I mentioned the abolution of the geographic restriction [of NATO's sphere of action] I naturally did not have in mind that NATO should intrude into everything. But there are some vital security interests and some questions which quite directly affect our survival, including our oil supply and the West's supply of raw materials which nowadays are so important for our survival and for our security, just like our military defense; so that I contend that NATO cannot just pretend that it is not its business whether this happens in the Middle East or at our doorstep.

Today the world has grown so close together that this cannot be separated any longer as it was done before. Today the events in Afghanistan do affect us directly indeed, which means that NATO must expand to security problems of a vital nature also outside the geographical area hitherto applicable.

Quite definitely the Europeans will not be able to contribute anything militarily toward the stabilization of the Middle East region. This is a typical task of the Americans as the leading power. The United States alone has the instruments. But what we Europeans can contribute is political assistance, financial assistance and moral support. What I mean by this is that we must energetically seek the dialog with the countries of the Middle East, we must offer them our cooperation, we must help them and we must more strongly than heretofore support Turkey and the southern flank of the alliance. As before I think it is wrong that we give more credits to the East, to our adversaries than we do to the south, to our friends. What is needed here is a rethinking process and a change.

I will not talk about an alliance with China. I do not think that an alliance is necessary or would even be indicated. But quite definitely we must intensify cooperation with China; not, as it is so nicely put, to play the Chinese card but simply because the Chinese can very well contribute something toward the international, global and worldwide power balance.

Surely these questions concerning military policy will wield greater weight in the election campaign than has been anticipated before. Many citizens out there in the country are concerned, and justly so. They are wondering whether another world war is imminent. At long last they are asking themselves again what the state of our security is and whether the Russians will not do the same thing against us that they have done in Afghanistan. They will think about the sense of defense and security again, and perhaps they will also be prepared to realize that this foolish frontline position of Mr Brandt is no longer acceptable, that the FRG politicians are divided up into friends of peace and advocates of cold war. Thus, the question in the forthcoming election campaign no longer will be: Are you for or against peace? The question will rather be in all probability: Who is doing more for security?

Especially those who would really like to have detente and no just sham detente, who do not mistake a smile for substance, ought to know that they can gain true, real detente and promising disarmament negotiations only when the Soviet Union has come to realize that nothing can be gained by force.

CDU'S MARX URGES SOLIDARITY WITH U.S. OVER AFGHANISTAN

LD111653 Hamburg DPA in German 1440 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Foreign affairs spokesman of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group Werner Marx has strongly opposed "Pawelczyk's thesis that the Europeans should be "kept out of" the Afghanistan conflict. He noted in his group's press service that in view of the actual situation this would be quite mistaken. The European allies' solidarity with the United States is now necessary, particularly since the United States for its part is defending the free European countries from Soviet intervention. Marx also criticised Pawelczyk's view that Soviet policy should now be analyzed. It has changed neither in substance nor in aims. [passage indistinct]

ECONOMICS MINISTER CRITICIZES U.S., BRITISH OIL POLICIES

Reviewing his talks with the governments of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, Lambsdorff said in Bonn on Sunday: "It is quite clear that during the next 10 years we will get by only by the skin of our teeth." However, he said, the oil producing countries will not allow the industrial countries "to crash since they need us as well."

At the same time Lambsdorff strongly criticized the oil and energy policy of the United States, Britain and Norway. He said that while the Germans with their savings policy have adhered to the letter of the resolutions of the latest world economic summit in Tokyo, the United States is still selling its oil below the world market price, which encourages consumption. "I am beginning to develop more and more understanding for the political and economic attitude of the oil producing countries," Lambsdorff said. The oil producing countries are justified in accusing the United States, Britain and Norway of wanting to save their own oil reserves in the North Sea and Alaksa, while at the same time asking the Arab states to increase their oil production at low prices in order to meet world demand.

Lambsdorff said that according to current estimates the Americans could easily produce an additional 500,000 barrels of oil per day in Alaska.

According to Lambsdorff, the Kuwaiti oil minister gave a clear warning that additional oil consumption taxes which benefit the governments in the industrial states will no longer be accepted by his country. "Anyone who wants to levy further taxes, such as those under discussion in the United States, will have to think again," Lambsdorff said.

However, the economics minister said that he sees no possibilities for big jumps in oil prices in the near future. Nevertheless, he said that Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, and perhaps the United Arab Emirates, will raise their current official oil price from $25 to $26 per barrel shortly. At the same time the oil countries on the Gulf seem to be interested in depressing the prices in the so-called spot markets, in which oil which is not bound by long term supply contacts is traded nearer to the level of the official oil price. At present the spot market price ranges between $38 and $40 per barrel.

Lambsdorff advocated a permanent, regular dialog between the oil countries and consumer states which should develop into a kind of crisis management. However, such a conference should not be approached with exaggerated expectations. "It will not mean a blueprint for the world's oil supplies over the next 10 years."

According to the minister, Bonn has offered Saudi Arabia closer cooperation with the European Community.

TOGOLESE STUDENTS, WORKERS OCCUPY EMBASSY

PA121434 Paris AFP in French 1403 GMT 12 Jan 80 PA

[Text] Paris, 12 Jan (AFP)--Approximately 40 Togolese people occupied the Togolese Embassy in Paris on Saturday morning and demanded that the press attache, Yaya, urgently communicate by telephone with President Gnassingbe Eyadema and convey to him their protests against "his dictatorial regime."

The demonstrators are Togolese students and workers living in Paris. They are members of the "Togolese Movement for Democracy" opposed to what they described as "President Eyadema's dictatorial regime." They arrived at the embassy at 1000 and entered it peacefully after having "talked--they told AFP over the telephone--with the diplomats and the members of the permanent administrative personnel."

Richard da Silvera, secretary general of the movement, who led the demonstrators, told AFP that "we (?want) to obtain the reestablishment of democratic liberties, the annulment of the rigged general elections of 30 December 1979 and the release of political prisoners, which we estimate at approximately 100."

Da Silvera noted that he had the intention of occupying the embassy premises for 24 hours in order to also obtain from the diplomatic representation the passports and identity papers, of which the Togolese living in France are deprived. "We want to circulate freely and to live without being subjected to General Eyadema's dictatorship.

"Through the embassy occupation we also seek to call the attention of international public opinion to the Togolese problem," Dr Silvera added.

Occupation Ends

PA121621 Paris AFP in French 1557 GMT 12 Jan 80 PA

[Text] Paris, 12 Jan (AFP)--The occupation of the Togolese Embassy in Paris, which began late in the morning, ended without incident in midafternoon following the intervention of the police at the request of the ambassador. The occupants, all of whom were students, did not resist the police. They were taken to a police precinct to verify their identity.

SCHMIDT MEETS WITH GISCARD ON AFGHANISTAN

[Unattributed report: "Chancellor Schmidt Stresses 'Convergence' of French and German Views"]

[Excerpt] The 2 and 1/2 hour meeting (1 hour longer than planned) which Mr Giscard d'Estaing had with Chancellor Schmidt on Wednesday 9 January at the Elysee "showed the convergence between French and German views on current international problems," according to remarks made by the president of the republic and reported by Mr Blot, his spokesman.

Mr Schmidt merely said that the talks dealt mainly with Afghanistan and that they had been "very friendly."

Before leaving Madrid (after a vacation in Spain) for Bonn via Paris, Mr Schmidt stated that "the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is a real danger and a challenge" to which the Western nations should reply "without nervousness or lack of control" but "in a disciplined and calm way" by increased consultations and solidarity in conjunction with the Third World countries concerned. He added that at the same time it is important to "take advantage of all opportunities for dialog and contact with the USSR" in the spirit of the Conferences on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

MARCHAIS BACKS USSR MOVES IN AFGHANISTAN DURING MOSCOW VISIT

[Text] Georges Marchais' visit to the Soviet Union was planned long ago, but by going there only 15 days after the Red Army's invasion of Afghanistan the general secretary of the French Communist Party nontheless in some way gave his moral support to the Kremlin. What was a mere impression yesterday was confirmed today in a spectacular manner. In a 45-minute interview broadcast live from Mosocw by TF-1 [French television first network] at 1300, Georges Machais justified, presented arguments in favor of and approved Soviet military intervention. In his view, the Kabul coup has nothing in common with the Prague coup in 1968. However, in both cases there are the same armored cars, bearing the same red star, that went to dictate their law beyond their borders.

Thus, for 45 minutes on French television, Marchais showed once more that he is a master in the art of using audio-visual media. This is how he supported Leonid Brezhnev, whose arguments in fact he is using:

[Begin Marchais recording] Brezhnev did everything to prevent an increase of tension in this region of the world, and it was only in desperation [en desespoir de cause] that he was forced to do it. This is what Comrade Leonid Brezhnev told me clearly and decisively [clairement et nettement]. Comrade Leonid Brezhnev told me this: Soviet troops are forbidden to intervene in skirmishes, certain internal fighting, certain guerrilla fighting that is taking place. They are ordered not to intervene. They are only present, they must be present, on the borders, he told me, to prevent infiltration from the outside. [end recording]

This is how to justify and invasion. Georges Marchais' unequivocal and tough stand and his alinement with Moscow causes a certain turbulence in the Communist Party. Already criticized after the break in the Union of the Left by a group of intellectuals and rank-and-file militants, Marchais again becomes the favorite target of Communist Party leadership rivals. After the news bullentin, in the phone-in program, you will hear Jean Elleinstein and Antoine (Spire), who represent to some extent the leaders of this movement of Communist opposition. We invited the leaders of the Communist Party to come and explain their stand on this program, but they have refused.

NC111740 Paris AFP in English 1720 GMT 11 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Paris, Jan 11 (AFP)--Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan is justified in the light of "imperialist dangers" threatening that country, French Communist leader Georges Marchais, speaking from Moscow, said on French television today.

He also said there were 30 American bases in Pakistan and that Moscow was obligated under its treaty with Afghanistan to supply military aid when requested "in order to ensure the defence of the Afghan borders."

Noting that "imperialism has suffered swinging setbacks", he said that for years the Soviet Union had resisted demands to intervene because it did not wish to heighten international tension. But "it decided to intervene in the face of the dangers from imperialism."

Of his Moscow talks with Leonid Brezhnev, he said the Soviet party leader told him that Soviet troops were not in Afghanistan to fight guerrillas, but to prevent infiltration across the borders into Afghanistan. Military pressure was particularly strong from Pakistan, Mr Marchais affirmed.

Mr Marchais drew a distinction between the Afghanistan affair and the entry of Soviet troops into Czechoslovakia in 1968.

In Afghanistan it was a case of defending the democratic wish of a people that had thrown off feudalism, but in Czechoslovakia the Soviet Union had hampered the development of a socialist path chosen by the Czechoslovak Communist Party and people, he said.

He recalled that the French Communists had condemned the 1968 intervention and the later "Prague trials".

His party was against interference in the domestic affairs of a country, except when it was necessary to counter threats from imperialism, Mr Marchais said.

Brezhnev 'Assurances' Given

LD111832 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1650 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Paris, Jan. 11 (TANJUG)--Communist Party of France General Secretary George Marchais today stated that Leonid Brezhnev has offered him assurances that the Soviet-troops will withdraw from Afghanistan the moment conditions for this are created. We, Marchais said, want this to take place as soon as possible. It results from the Marchais statement, given in Moscow for the French television, indicates that the condition for the withdrawal of Soviet troops [is for] other sides to cease interfering and intervening in Afghanistan.

Press Criticism of Visit

NC121210 Paris AFP in English 1134 GMT 12 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Paris, Jan. 12 (AFP)--French Communist chief Georges Marchais was greeted by fiery editorials when he flew home today after firmly supporting the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan during a five-day visit to Moscow.

Most political commentators were incensed by a televised interview from Moscow yesterday in which he affirmed that the Soviet Army intervened to save Afghanistan from the threat of Western "imperialism".

The independent QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS viewed his remarks as a coup de grace to France's Communist-Socialist alliance, which has been ailing since it narrowly lost the 1974 presidential election because of squabbling between the two parties.

Mr Marchais' statements, after the signal honour of three talks with Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, consecrated Mr Marchais, 59, as the number-one "lord" of the Kremlin's "hard line" followers, the QUOTIDIEN concluded.

What meaning was there now in the French Communists' purported independence of the Kremlin, their goal of achieving socialism through democratic elections and their alliance with France's Socialists, the daily asked, concluding that they "obviously were just words."

The conservative newspaper LE FIGARO concluded that "Moscow indeed inspired the Communist campaign against the Socialists" (which was blamed for the loss of the March 1978 French general election).

"The offensive of the Communist Party, which is stepped up every day, corresponds to a deliberate tactic of the Soviets, who view socialists of every sort as prime targets LE FIGARO added.

The Socialist Party's daily LE MATIN said Mr Marchais' TV remarks were "brutal" and indicated that the French Communist leadership had chosen to be "arrogant and provocative".

The conservative daily L'AURORE said Mr Marchais had urged Frenchmen to "be submissive toward Soviet imperialism", and had "falsified the truth insolently".

The anarchist-tinged leftist newspaper LIBERATION said Mr Marchais had "demonstrated the deep identity of views between his party and the Soviet leadership".

SOCIALIST SCORES MARCHAIS' HANDLING OF AFGHANISTAN ISSUE

LD112118 Paris Domestic Service in French 1900 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The least one can say is that the intervention [in Afghanistan] by the Red Army is widening still further the gap between French Communists and Socialists. Indeed, when questioned about the cable sent to him in Moscow by Pierre Joxe asking him for an explanation on the Afghanistan issue, Georges Marchais answered vigorously: I do not accept lessons in bravery from this lout, this insolent person, this little valet of Francois Mitterrand, who is digging the grave of the Union of the Left.

The retort tonight by Socialist Deputy Pierre Joxe is: If Georges Marchais is losing his cool it is because he is ill at ease. He finds it difficult to justify that Soviet armored cars should be objected to in Prague but welcome in Kabul. Pierre Joxe concludes: The future will show what other French Communists think.

The affair also widens the gap within the trade unions. The CFDT [French Democratic Confereration of Labor] reiterates that the stand of the Communist Party and the CGT [General Confederation of Labor] on this Soviet intervention in Afghanistan are an obstacle to the unity of action and the union of popular forces.

Marchais Rebuttal

LD121446 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 12 Jan 80 LD

[Interview with Georges Marchais, secretary general of the French Communist Party, conducted by Bernard Valette on 12 January; place not given--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Marchais] I called Pierre Joxe a lout and I repeat that he is a lout. I do not believe that the little political operation in which Joxe claimed to have sent me a telegram which I did not receive is in the political traditions of the country.

He claims that he asked me to display courage. I repeat that I do not accept advice from Pierre Joxe or any other Socialist leader. Moreover, I cannot say that the Socialist leaders themselves have demonstrated such courage lately during the hard tests faced by our people and country. Pierre Joxe should shut up.

[Question] Mr Marchais, do you not feel that your stand in Moscow could lead your Socialist partners to reverse their alliances?

[Answer] They reversed their alliances when Francois Mitterand abandoned the joint program of the left, when Francois Mitterand abandoned the policy of a Union of the Left in 1977. He renounced the policy which we managed to set up in 1972.

[Question] But if the Socialists can separate themselves from you, Mr Marchais, do you not feel that you are to an extent indirectly playing into the hands of the majority?

[Answer] I do not comment on such unkind statements.

[Question] Mr Marchais, you have been criticized by a number of Communist intellectuals. What is your reaction to such criticism, particularly from Jean Elleinstein?

[Answer] Well, it is not us. It is not us. [as heard]

[Question] The 23rd congress has smoothed over some things nonetheless.

[Answer] Do not confuse the masses with party intellectuals. I believe there are some 70,000 (?members) with a few intellectual (?comrades) who continue to express disagreement and who, moreover, sometimes place themselves in situations which I deem a little difficult, not for the party but for themselves. I had the opportunity to learn on my return from Cuba about a broadcast in which Jean Elleinstein participated. He allowed himself to be spit on for more than 1 hour. Such a thing would not happen to me.

[Question] Georges Marchais, what do you say to those who state that the French Communist Party [PCF] is in the process of turning inwards and returning to some extent to the famous ghetto?

[Answer] You know, attempts have been made in the past to put the PCF in a ghetto but those who tried have been too small. They have neither the strength nor the means to do it. The PCF is a big party, a party which influences almost one French citizen in four. The recent election (?polls) are satisfying enough. I read a study of them in LA CROIX--the Catholic paper LA CROIX--before leaving for the Soviet Union. The article states that all partial elections carried out in the past year show a consolidation of the PCF forces while indicating that the Socialist Party is slightly weakening. Consequently, an important and influential force that I believe will further increase its influence in the future [Marchais interrupts thought, then continues] a party, a party which numbers 700,000 men. Consequently, we are far from turning inwards. No, we have a very big policy for our working class, our people, and our country.

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] No, Giscard d'Estaing will not obtain the support of the PCF. The PCF is with the workers wherever they are fighting. The banner of the interests of the workers, people and of the nation, the banner of the union is strongly in the Communists' hands and no one has the power to remove this banner.

L'HUMANITE VIEWS NATURE OF SOVIET 'INTERVENTION'

ID111159 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 8 Jan 80 p 1 ID

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "It Has To Be Acknowledged....."]

[Text] From Socialists to the extreme right, from Mr Perdriel's LE MATIN to Mr Hersant's LE FIGARO, and including all radio and television services, one loud indignant clamor has arisen in protest against the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

True, the objection can be raised that certain communist parties--the PCI and the PCE, for instance--have also expressed their disapproval. This is true even though they have denounced at the same time imperialism's continuous intervention throughout the planet.

No doubt we can also be told that these are grave events, and we will not disagree with this. We have no taste for flowers protruding from gun barrels. We are in favor of detente and disarmament and opposed to the policy of blocs, and our party has reaffirmed its adherence to the principles of sovereignty, self-determination and noninterferencce in peoples' internal affairs.

However, this is an objective but not, unfortunately, a reality. It has to be acknowledged that we still live in a world in which intervention--whether military or not--in peoples' internal affairs has been laid down as a general principle by imperialist states. It has to be acknowledged that it takes two to really achieve nonintervention, since otherwise, as the Spanish Civil War made it abundantly clear, bleating pacifism is bound to lead to the aggressor's triumph. Even though you must not wait for murderers to start their work, it is no doubt advisable to insure that they not have a clear field before them. And the U.S. decision to deploy new nuclear missiles in Europe has made it sufficiently clear that the warmongering forces have not laid down their arms.

What is clear is that the Soviets have intervened in Afghanistan. What is less clear to a considerable proportion of public opinion is that they were already there, since in April 1978 a revolutionary movement brought to power men professing Marxism who asked, as they were entitled to do, for Soviet help.

What is even less clear to public opinion--because the media have discreetly remained silent on this point--is that the United States has done its utmost to overthrow the new Kabul government by supporting a rebellion staged by the Afghan feudal lords to whom it has supplied money and arms from neighboring Pakistan.

LE MONDE of 6 March 1979 announced that rebel leaders are periodically making appeals for armed struggle from Peshawar in Pakistan while LE FIGARO of 31 January 1979 wrote that "Huzbe Islami has set up training camps in Pakistan to teach its members how to shoot." A few days ago President Carter himself openly called for arms supplies to Islamabad to be speeded up.

These are the essential facts of an affair which is sufficiently complex to make Mr Giscard d'Estaing, who cannot be suspected of nurturing excessive love for the Soviet Union, show a caution in his judgments which is deplored by some of his political friends.

It is ture that a division of labor has been instituted and that the government has, on the other hand, given free reign to the major sections of the media on this occasion to launch a campaign of harassment not only against the USSR but above all against the French Communists. So much so that some articles are reminiscent of the good old days of Vichy propaganda.

It would be interesting to compare the energy with which radio and television commentators and some others have stigmatized the Soviet intervention in Kabul with the nonchalance with which they reported the French interventions in Gabon in 1964, Chad in 1968, Zaire in 1972 and Central Africa in 1979, not to mention the Algerian and Indochinese wars which lasted no more than 14 years and, after all, only killed 2 million people.

No doubt we cannot be content with the bad faith of our adversaries. Events in Afghanistan, like those taking place in almost all the world's hotbeds of tension, show that imperialism can no longer use its gunboat policy as it did in the past. They also prove that the workers' union is not yet powerful enough to insure that all peoples in the world live in independence and peace.

PARIS INSTITUTE BARS IRANIAN STUDENTS; U.S. EMBASSY REACTION

ID111709 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Jan 80 p 5 ID

[Unattributed report: "International Institute of French Studies No Longer To Accept Iranians"]

[Excerpts] The International Institute of French Studies, which teaches French to foreign students, has decided not to accept Iranian students on its premises until the U.S. hostages in Tehran have been released.

Mr Marcel Paccou, an institute official who is also an assistant to Doctor Nicolas About, Yvelines Union for French Democracy deputy and a member of the French parliamentary delegation which visited Tehran at the end of December, explained: "This decision had to be taken after the insulting treatment of UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim."

When told of this decision, the Quai d'Orsay expressed surprise and made no comment. The institute's officials, on the other hand, were strongly supported by the U.S. Embassy in Paris, which thinks this ban on Iranian students is the first specific measure taken in Europe against the leaders of the Iranian Revolution.

POLICE SOURCE CITED ON GROWTH OF IRANIAN 'FIFTH COLUMN'

ID111127 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 10 Jan 80 pp 1,4 ID

[Jean-Francois Crozier report: "Khomeyni Establishes Fifth Column in France"]

[Excerpts] Mysterious people are now crossing French borders. They are Iranians. In theory they are coming as tourists. The inspectors in the crime squad investigating the assassination of the shah's nephew 7 December are constantly wondering about them. They have not forgotten that 2 days before the execution of Admiral Shafiq in the 16th Arrondissement, Generals Fardust, Faruzian and Kaveh, three bosses of SAVAMA--Imam Khomeyni's secret police--had met at the Iranian Embassy, Rue Fontenoy, 17th Arrondissement.

The recent arrival of assistant SAVAMA chief Ali Assefi--he stayed in Paris for a few days before going to Nice, which is another major center for the Iranian community in France--has increased their anxiety.

"Four officials of this level have now arrived in France," a police officer told us. "We do not disguise the fact that we are expecting trouble, even though prominent figures from the former regime are being protected. At the moment many 'special envoys' from Tehran are infiltrating the immigrant communities in Trappes (Yvelines) among other places. We really feel that Khomeyni is busy installing a fifth column in France."

There is an agreement between France and Iran under the terms of which no visa is necessary for stays of less than 3 months in either country. Therefore it is very difficult to monitor the aim and real length of a visit by an Iranian national. In addition the Iranian Embassy--A real "foreign ministry abroad"--closely watches the majority of Iranians in France among whom it has a growing number of informers.

Iranian students whose families cannot keep them until the age of 30 as stipulated in the Koran [as published], have an urgent need for money, since study grants have been abolished by the revolutionary government.

"Money has become the Iranian's real religion," one of them said. "All the young people between 20 and 25 years will work for anybody who pays them. Therefore the Iranian Embassy has bought informers cheaply via an Iranian bank in Paris which has secret funds for this purpose. In exchange, these 'informers' probe the activities of their fellow Muslims; they stir up trouble in the two faculties where there are Iranian groups--Nanterre and, especially, Vincennes, where not too much attention is paid to diplomas and assiduousness. It is not unusual to meet young people in this faculty who only speak Persian and are not attending the classes."

MALFATTI RESIGNS FOR HEALTH REASONS

LD122208 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 12 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Foreign Minister Franco Maria Malfatti today communicated to Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga his decision to resign from his position. Malfatti suffered a heart attack several months ago. Following his recovery, he had resumed his post as foreign minister. At the beginning of the year, Malfatti suffered another attack and is now convalescing in a clinic near Rome. In view of his condition, Malfatti has preferred to resign a position which is particularly difficult at this moment, as well as in consideration of the fact that Italy will be assuming the presidency of the EEC for the next 6 months. Senate President Fanfani has said that Malfatti's decision proves his high sense of responsibility and service to the country.

PCI CENSURES USSR IN EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

[Text] Rome, Jan 11, REUTER--Italy's Communist Party today presented an urgent resolution to the European Parliament condemning the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan as "an open violation of the principles of independence and national sovereignty."

All 24 Italian Communist members of the European assembly, including party Secretary-General Enrico Berlinguer, signed the motion, which they demanded should be urgently discussed at next week's session.

Expressing their "gravest censure of the Soviet military intervention," the Communist document spoke of "a grave deterioration in the international situation...risking a return to the nuclear arms race and cancellation of the hard-won results of the Helsinki Agreement."

But the Communists also urged the nine EEC countries, "in the context of the Atlantic alliance and other international forums, to follow a line of negotiation and not of reprisals and heightening of tension...which could lead to irreversible breaking off of the process of debente."

AUTHORITIES DENY SOVIET SHIP PERMISSION TO ENTER GENOA

[Text] The Italian authorities have denied the Soviet ocean-research ship Georgy Ushakov permission to enter the Port of Genoa, and it is also forbidden to enter Italian territorial waters. This ban has been communicated to the Genoa harbormaster's office by Italian Navy headquarters. The decision is motivated by technical reasons, but in Genoa the possibility that there is a connection with the crisis in Afghanistan has not been excluded.

BERLINGUER SENDS GET-WELL MESSAGE TO TITO

LD132244 Belgrade TANJUG in English 2009 GMT 13 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Belgrade, Jan 13 (TANJUG)-- Communist Party of Italy General Secretary Enrico Berlinguer has sent to the League of Communists of Yugoslavia Central Committee presidency a telegramme stating: "Please convey to Comrade Tito Italian Communists' and my own best wishes for a quick recovery. In Comrade Tito we see a principle of the struggle for peace, emancipation of nations and equality and freedom in the world."

BERLINGUER ISSUES STATEMENT ON TERRORISM, ECONOMY

LD111051 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 9 Jan 80 p 1 LD

[Text of statement by PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer: "We Can Wait No Longer"]

[Text] Comrade Enrico Berlinguer has released the following statement on the political situation:

Our country has been stricken and perturbed once more by atrocious deeds--the murder in Palermo of Sicilian Regional Council Chairman Mattarella and those in Milan of officers Antoro, Cestari and Tatulli.

This bloody onslaught against civil coexistence, the democratic institutions and Italy's prospects of regeneration, which continues despite the blows dealt against subversive and terrorist organizations, should cause alarm all the more today because the state of the economy and social tensions are deteriorating at the same time and because in the international field, as well, manifestations of deterioration in relations among states which endanger the policy of detente and peace itself are increasing daily.

This dramatic and threatening course of events makes increasingly clear the need to create real solidarity among the people's and democratic forces, which will be translated into a serious program of salvation, renewal and peace and in a government of unity.

This is a national need, and the Communists are prepared to shoulder their responsibilities fully to this end. However, it is increasingly imperative that the other democratic parties--and, in the first place, the Christian Democratic Party--become aware of the duty to finally extricate the country from political instability, which is the foremost cause of its problems, by creating an authoritative and unitary political leadership. At all events, the Communists believe at the same time that the present government and Parliament must deal in the immediate future--with the utmost commitment and sense of responsibility--with the acute unresolved problems which must be tackled now.

Rapid approval of the new legislative measures against terrorism and the adoption by the government of any other organizational measure aimed at imparting the utmost efficiency to the activity of the police forces, the security services and the judiciary are essential. There is also an urgent need for an international initiative on the part of Italy and the EC to help lessen tensions and confrontations and to create an atmosphere favorable to negotiations which will make it possible to resolve the current disputes peacefully and to secure measures to reduce arms.

In the economic sphere, too, there can be no further delay in taking steps to tackle the deteriorating situation as regards inflation, the energy crisis and employment problems. I would like to add that in order to overcome this state of emergency and solve these short-term problems it is imperative that Parliament should work quickly and intensively to end increasingly serious forms of obstructionism aimed at completely paralyzing the work of the two houses and also to end deplorable cases of absenteeism.

Communist organizations and members must promote the widest possible debate among the citizens, promote and sustain the initiatives and battles necessary for detente and disarmament, for democratic security and freedom and for development and social justice, and commit themselves fully to asserting the need for a new political leadership in Italy.

SA CARNEIRO ADDRESSES PARLIAMENT, RESPONDS TO QUESTIONS

Constitution May Be Revised

LD111815 [Editorial Report LD] Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese at 1552 GMT on 11 Jan carries a 30-minute speech by Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro live from the Assembly of the Republic. The first 14 minutes of the speech are unmonitorable, but when reception improves Sa Carneiro is heard to say:

"The government will give the highest priority to the resolving real problems and is fully resolved not to allow the ideological or doctrinaire aspects of the political process to take precedence over the clear and unambiguous tackling of the everyday problems that most concern the majority of the country's citizens."

Describing his program as "a program of change and progress," he says: "The change promised by the Democratic Alliance will take place within the framework of the law and with respect for the country's democratic institutions. It will undoubtedly entail, in due course, the revision of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic." He says that the government's "first political priority" is to "safeguard the authority of the state of law."

He speaks of "the government's wish for dialog and a concerted effort with the more relevant social and cultural forces of Portuguese society." Speaking of the private sector, he declares that "the broadening and boosting of the private sector is one of the criteria that will determine the government's action because the government regards the private sector as an essential component of the country's development and an instrument for national reconstruction."

Regarding foreign policy, Sa Carneiro says: "With regard to the Portuguese-governed territory of Macao, the government and its parliamentary majority are prepared to render the necessary support to promote its cultural and material progress, to preserve the centuries-old neighborly relations between the peoples of Macao and of the People's Republic of China, and also to ensure that the discussion of the territory's new statutes will take place in a climate of consultation with regard to all measures bearing on the interests and aspirations of the local population as well as a climate of respect for the relevant constitutional stipulations.

"The government will stand by the principle of regarding Portugal as the state responsible for the territory of Eastern Timor and will not desist from battling for the self-determination of its population."

Further on he says: "The government will firmly pursue the European and Atlantic option of Portugal's foreign policy as part and parcel of the overall goal of the preservation of Portugal's independence and dignity. The same goal, albeit adopted to special historic and cultural circumstances, will motivate the deepening of relations with the other Portuguese-speaking countries."

On relations between civilian and military power the prime minister says: "As the end of the period of constitutional transition draws near, it was thought opportune at this stage to underline in some way the principle that, following the revision of the Constitution and the disappearance of the Council of the Revolution, the Portuguese Armed Forces must be politically subordinated to the government chosen by the people. Thus, the way is being paved for a new type of relationship between civilians and soldiers in the Portuguese democracy, a way which is more in keeping with the traditions and regimes of the countries of NATO of which Portugal is a member and without the slightest breach of the strict nonpartisanship of the armed forces."

After describing the need for cooperation among the various organs of sovereignty as being derived from a national imperative, Sa Carneiro declares that "the government will seek to maintain a constructive relationship with the president of the republic, expressing the respect due to the head of state without relinquishing its constitutional prerogatives."

Further on: "Aware that it is the Government of Portugal, and therefore of all Portuguese, the government will not disregard the social and political implications of the results of the 2 December elections. However, it will not allow this attitude to be interpreted as an implicit acceptance of any privileges of a geographic or social basis for any political forces. Portugal is one and, in the terms of the Constitution, the government has jurisdiction in the whole country on the basis of the principle of the citizens' equality before the law."

Concluding his address, Sa Carneiro says: "The government and its majority have been placed in power by the free vote of the Portuguese people. They intend to use this power with moderation and responsibility. But let no one nourish any illusions: They do intend to use it, thus discharging the mandate that is rightfully theirs."

"And in order to state it once more, clearly and to the point, in this house and before the nation, the government has decided to ask this Assembly of the Republic for a vote of confidence on the policy it proposes to pursue as laid down in the program presented today."

Referendum, Foreign Policy Discussed

LD120004 [Editorial Report LD] Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese at 2020 GMT on 11 January in a 60-minute live relay from the parliament broadcasts Portuguese Prime Minister Sa Carneiro's replies to a number of questions raised by several members of the Assembly of the Republic in connection with the government's program presented to the Assembly on 11 January.

Prime Minister Sa Carneiro replies to several questions raised in connection with the legitimacy of a referendum advocated by the Democratic Allaince by saying:

"Two points of view can be upheld as to what is allowed and what is forbidden. In authoritarian regimes and dictatorships, all that is not explicitly allowed is considered forbidden. In free regimes and in democracy, on the contrary, all that is not explicitly forbidden is considered allowed. [applause] It is in this light that the government and the Democratic Alliance view the referendum." He adds: "The referendum bill which we intend to submit will consider the bodies with powers to decree such a referendum and the issues which are to be the subject thereof. These will be relevant issues of collective and national interest and the line most likely to be adopted will give the two organs of sovereignty with direct popular legitimacy the possibility to decree such a referendum. As I had the opportunity to state before the elections, it is our opinion, however, that until a referendum bill is approved, it is a legitimate tool to use against the parliament, above the powers of parliament or beyond them."

Referring to a number of questions concerning the country's economic situation, Sa Carneiro says: "The government maintains the opinion already expressed in my swearing-in speech: That the only positive aspect in the Portuguese economic situation is the improvement recorded in the current account and payments balances."

Pointing out the poor performances in other sectors last year, namely, slow GNP growth, a decrease in investments, private consumption stagnation, high inflation rate and higher unemployment, Sa Carneiro says: "Let no one think that the recorded improvements have just taken place. They date from a long way back and should have already influenced economic policies in 1979, but that did not happen." He adds: "All this shows that it was not at the beginning of 1980 that the financial situation, namely, our foreign payments balance, improved spectacularly, and that this is not the first government to have better conditions than its predecessors to face the present serious domestic economic crisis."

Replying to questions about the government's future policy toward the Arab countries, the prime minister says: "It is the government's opinion that without subjecting itself to any previous conditions regarding oil supplies--although it will take them into consideration--it is in the country's interest to pursue a policy of cooperation with the Arab countries. It is obvious, however, that the government will not subordinate the basic options of its foreign policy to any conditions which, to our knowledge, have not been stipulated by those countries."

Regarding questions about government policies toward Portuguese-speaking countries, namely, the former colonies, Sa Carneiro says: "The government will not underestimate the pending contentious economic and financial issues because it is the government's view that even in that field--and there is no reason why that should be an exception--our country's interests should be defended. We must not fail to defend our own interests merely in order to attract certain progressive or Third World judgements." He adds: "We will pursue a realistic and pragmatic policy in that field as well."

Finally, Sa Carneiro says: "The government is aware that Portugal is a member of NATO, that its Atlantic option is one of the priorities of its policy", and it will not seek to present itself--or rather, it will not seek to present our country--as the most nonalined member of NATO. [applause] On the contrary, it will fulfill its commitments without any complications, and, as he adds further on, "will do so with faithfulness to our undertakings and to the defense of our interests in matters of defense within the NATO framework and the reorganization of our armed forces."

FRETILIN OFFICIAL REACTS TO SA CARNEIRO STATEMENT

[Text] In his speech introducing his government's program to the Assembly of the Republic today, Prime Minister Sa Carneiro said that the government regards Portugal as the state responsible for the territory of Eastern Timor and will not desist from battling for the self-determination of its population.

How does the Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor [FRETILIN]--the movement which leads the liberation struggle in the People's Republic of East Timor--react to this statement by the new Portuguese Government? That was what we asked Abilio Araujo, minister of state of the Republic of East Timor and member of the FRETILIN Central Committee:

[Begin Araujo recording] Regarding Portugal as the former colonizing power in Eastern Timor, the FRETILIN and the Government of the Democratic Republic of East Timor are receptive to the Portuguese Government's adoption of measures designed to secure the Eastern Timor people's right to full independence without any external interferences, currently being blatantly exerted by the Indonesian fascist regime. It should also be stated that any viable measures concerning the future of Eastern Timor will always have to take FRETILIN into account since, more than anybody else, it has consistently fought for the self-determination and independence of its people. SUAREZ, OREJA LEAVE FOR U.S., TALKS WITH CARTER

MEDIA, PARTY LEADERS 'SPECULATE' ON SUAREZ' U.S. VISIT

[Excerpt] The visit to the United States which Prime Minister Suarez begins tomorrow continues to be the main topic of the national news. There has been speculation in the media about the talks between Suarez and Carter, and opposition leaders want the government to publicly explain the reasons for the speed of the visit.

The official explanation for Suarez' visit to Washington is the one given on Friday by Josep Melia, the secretary of state for information. According to the government spokesman the reason for the visit is to exchange views on the present state of world politics, especially on the Middle East, a subject on which Spanish diplomacy has special knowledge.

Spanish newspapers this morning point to the possibility that Carter wishes to convince Suarez that it is essential for the United States to use Spanish bases in the event of a conflict with Iran, although they would only be used as support points for an airbridge. The same newspapers, citing very reliable sources, say that Spain will never authorize the use of these bases for reprisals against Iran.

Suarez' visit to the United States would thus acquire a peaceful nuance, that is, the prime minister will take this opportunity to explain to Carter the West Europe feeling against a worsening of the present crisis. In view of his recent talks with FRG Chancellor Schmidt, the Spanish prime minister could act as Europe's spokesman to try to convince the Americans of the need to bring the crisis under control and to prevent a resurgence of a dangerous cold war period for the world.

However, as we have said, at an official level there has been no comment on specific topics that the U.S. President and the Spanish prime minister will discuss. This is what opposition leaders want to know. Felipe Gonzalez said yesterday in Granada Province that in a serious international situation the government should explain to the country the reasons for Suarez' visit before his departure and the reasons for the visit upon his return. Santiago Carrillo also wants the government to speak up, and he said yesterday in Gijon that the Communist Party will ask the cabinet about the prime minister's trip to the United States.

OFFICIAL RESPONDS TO QUESTIONS ON SUAREZ' U.S. VISIT, NATO

LD121148 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Press conference given by Josep Melia, secretary of state for information, following Council of Ministers meeting on 11 January in Madrid; correspondents not identified]

[Text] Prime Minister Suarez' forthcoming visit to the United States was the primary subject at the regular press conference held Friday after the meeting of the Council of Ministers.

The first question to Josep Melia, the secretary of state for information, consisted of three parts: Has the government been informed about this trip; on whose initiative was it made; and did it have any relation to the recent visit by FRG Chancellor Schmidt to Madrid. Mr Melia said that the government was informed about Prime Minister Suarez' visit to the United States at the Council of Ministers meeting today. On the question of the initiative for the trip, Mr Melia said:

[Begin recording] [Melia] The visit is to take place at the request of both parties. Since a proposed meeting between the two leaders is an old subject which President Carter raised again in two messages to the prime minister expressing his desire to hold the meeting. Of course, international politics and the concern [as heard] which was discussed by Prime Minister Suarez and FRG Chancellor Schmidt also played a role in determining this visit.

[Question] The way in which this trip was announced gave the impression of pressure having been brought to bear, and of haste.

[Answer] Haste, yes; pressure, absolutely not. The fact that things are done quickly may be a virtue; that they take place because of pressure means that all the details necessary for the correct realization of the matter are probably not considered. The idea of pressure is incorrect; the idea of haste obviously is correct.

[Question] Spain's entry into NATO, or rather the debate and Spain's possible entry into NATO, is an important and popular topic. Will Mr Suarez speak to Mr Carter about Spain and NATO?

[Answer] I think not. Only very marginally, Basically, it is going to be an exchange of opinions on the international situation. (?This is not) the moment and [words indistinct] in a very fundamental way on the Middle East, and the contribution of the Spanish mission on its knowledge of the Islamic world.

[Question] On the subject of the Middle East, is it possible that the U.S. Government may ask the Spanish Government for something more than opinions or information?

[Answer] What the U.S. Government may ask of the Spanish Government can be done through other channels. In fact, the government, which condemned the Soviet intervention both in the Council of Ministers session on 29 December and in the speech of Spain's permanent UN representative, has supported the U.S. proposal to call the Security Council meeting, on the grounds that the Soviet intervention constitutes a violation of the most fundamental principles of international coexistence and is a violation of the policy of detente. Therefore, it does not seem that the reason for the visit lies there, but in the wish to hold in-depth talks. I think that this is why the trip will be very swift. It is a round trip in a single day, and it is a trip to make direct contact between Prime Minister Suarez and President Carter.

[Question] Once more, and to close, the subject of NATO: Will Mr Suarez tell Mr Carter of his secret agreement with Mr Schmidt this week in Madrid? The agreement, according to a Madrid evening newspaper, states that Spain will substitute its entry into NATO for a bilateral agreement with the FRG.

[Answer] If you are referring to a report which has appeared in a certain newspaper, I would have to say that the report is false and that the political thinking which lies behind this report is stupid. [end recording]

DKP'S JENSEN BACKS USSR ON AFGHANISTAN

LD111141 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 5 Jan 80 Part I p 7 LD

[RITZAUS bureau report: "Danish Communists Defend Soviet Invasion"]

[Text] Danish Communist Party [DKP] Chairman Jorgen Jensen yesterday defended the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and described others' criticism of the action as a "smear campaign." The DKP will have nothing to do with it, Jorgen Jensen told the TV-Avisen television program.

"During my life I have seen what it is like when there are no forces capable of insuring social revolution," said Jorgen Jensen, referring directly to the Soviet military move.

NEW MARXIST-LENINIST PARTY SCORES USSR AGGRESSION

LD111143 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 6 Jan 80 Part I p 13 LD

[Unattributed report: "Brutal Imperialism, Says Leftist Party"]

[Text] A recently formed Communist Party calling itself the Danish Communist Party/Marxist-Leninist [Danmarks Kommunistiske Parti/Marxister-Leninister] Saturday condemned the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. The occupation was described as brutal imperialist aggression against Afghanistan's freedom and sovereignty and as having nothing in common with any "anti-imperialist" struggle or support for the Afghan people.

"More than 50,000 Soviet troops are spilling the blood of the Afghan people in fire and napalm so that the Soviet Union can implement its imperialist plans to enslave and plunder the peoples," the party's statement said.

The Danish Communist Party/Marxist-Leninist, formed 1 year ago and led by Jan Mortensen, adds in the statement that, just as the 1968 occupation of Czechoslovakia was condemned by the progressive world public, this new social-imperialist aggression must also be condemned. The party is organizing a demonstration outside the Soviet Embassy in Stockholm Wednesday 9 January under the slogan "Soviet Union Out of Afghanistan Now."

The Danish Communist Party/Marxist-Leninist must not be confused with the Danish Communist Party whose chairman, Jorgen Jensen, wholeheartedly supported the Soviet move into Afghanistan on television Friday.

NEW COMMUNIST OPPOSITION ORGANIZATION FORMED

LD111145 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 6 Jan 80 Part I p 5 LD

["BIH" report: "New Communist Party Formed"]

[Text] The Common Course Club [Faelles-Kurs Klubben: FKK]--Preben Moller Hansen's answer to the Danish Communist Party [DKP]--is now a reality.

Some 110 members participated in the organization's general inauguration at the end of last week. The day-to-day leaders, namely Jorgen Tved as national chairman and seamen's chairman and Preben Moller Hansen as deputy chairman, were elected. Henrik Berlau of the Seamen's Federation also has a prominent place in the FKK. The same applies to Hans Dresler, formerly a member of the DKP Central Committee and a member of the Seamen's Federation Executive Committee.

A resolution adopted by the first national meeting was accompanied by the slogan "Down With the Social Democratic Party, Down With the DKP Leadership." The resolution included the following passage: "The DKP, like other parties, has throughout history been the workers' instrument for defending socialist principles against reformist ideology. But the times now demand that class-conscious workers again cry out 'take care' when their most important weapon in the struggle is threatened by apathy along with indulgence and the selling out of socialist experiences and principles."

CP SUPPORTS GOVERNING PARTY OF AFGHANISTAN

LD111108 Helsinki in English to Europe and North Africa 0930 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Finnish Communist Party has expressed its support for the people and governing party of Afghanistan. In its first official reaction to the situation in Afghanistan, the party expressed the view that the struggle in that country is against external pressures as well as internal forces of reaction. The statement by the Finnish Communist Party said that only the people of Afghanistan have the right to determine their internal development and their relations with other states. The party said that the United States has used the assistance given to Afghanistan by the Soviet Union as an excuse for a propaganda attack on both countries.

A statement from the Finnish Foreign Ministry at the end of December noted that Afghanistan would return to a normal state of affairs when Soviet troops are withdrawn, and this would correspond to the wishes of the parties involved and the international community.

In an interview with Radio Finland on Wednesday the undersecretary of state at the Finnish Foreign Ministry, Mr. Keijo Korhonen, said that Finland tries to avoid exaggerated expressions in its statements on international issues and prefers substance to formulations.

SOVIET ALLEGATION OF 'PROVOCATIONS' REJECTED

[Excerpt] The Norwegian Defense Ministry has refuted Soviet allegations concerning provocations in northern Norway on the Soviet border. Norwegian Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg notes that the TASS allegations [words indistinct]. TASS claimed in its report yesterday that the Norwegian Army had organized provocations on the Soviet border. According to TASS, the measures endanger peace and security in Northern Europe. Ulla-Maria Johanssen reports from Oslo:

[Begin Johannssen relay] TASS accuses Norway of staging provocations near the Soviet border. The measures are unfriendly toward the Soviet Union and endanger peace and security in Northern Europe, TASS points out. The background of this strong allegation is based on the report of the U.S. news agency (?UPI) last Tuesday, according to which Norway has stepped up its defenses in the north along the Soviet border due to the situation in Afghanistan. Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg categorically refutes the Soviet accusations. The TASS allegations are without any foundation whatsoever, Stoltenberg says.

The report [words indistinct] however, is not perhaps quite unfounded, because the Defense Ministry and the commander in chief of the defense forces earlier noted that because of the situation in Afghanistan, Norway has taken certain steps to improve its defense readiness, without specifying the steps and their character. AMBASSADOR, EMBASSY SECRETARY RETURN FROM IRAN

[Unattributed report: "Foreign Ministry Prepared for Cool Relations with Tehran"]

[Text] "We will be at home for an indefinite period. There is now less need for diplomatic representation in Iran," Ambassador Tormod Petter Svennevig said when he arrived last night at Fornebu Airport along with Embassy Secretary Thomas Hauff. The Foreign Ministry is obviously prepared for cooler diplomatic relations with Iran and a rather long time at home for the ambassador. The two arrived home with their families and much luggage.

Their return was agreed upon last week, and Ambassador Svennevig justified this by saying that no one knows how long the UN Security Council's negotiations on boycott actions against Iran will take.

"When a person has made up his mind to do a diplomatic job, it is disappointing to have to admit that the opportunities are so slight that he has to return home," Svennevig said.

Asked whether Norway is prepared to take part in a less comprehensive action against Iran, possibly with the United States and the European states if the Security Council does not approve sanctions, Foreign Ministry press spokesman Torstein Sando replied: "No comment."

Ambassador Svennevig, who is also accredited to Pakistan and Afghanistan, was informed by radio yesterday morning of the coup in Afghanistan. He has, however, not had time to visit Kabul to present his credentials since the situation in Iran was so demanding.

"Although the situation in Tehran appears calm, there is much going on under the surface," Svennevig said. He could say nothing new concerning the American hostages' fate, whether there is any hope of their release or whether proceedings will be instituted against them. The Iranian authorities issue statements which can be interpreted in various ways, and it is difficult to know which statements should be deemed significant, he opined.

ULLSTEN SAYS SOVIETS SHOULD PULL OUT OF AFGHANISTAN

LD111958 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 11 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten said today in an interview with TT news agency that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan signifies a very serious deviation from the policy of detente. According to Ullsten, a Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan is the only way to solve the crisis. We must demand that the big powers realize their responsibility. The Soviet Union has paid no attention to its responsibility as a big power, Ola Ullsten said. In his view the United States and the Soviet Union now will have to resume talks on relaxation of tension and the Soviet Union must reconsider its refusal to start negotiations concerning the medium-range missiles in Europe.

GOVERNMENT RECALLS ENVOY TO KABUL

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] The government today recalled the British ambassador from the Afghan capital of Kabul "for consultations" over the Soviet invasion. The ambassador, Mr Normal Hillier-Fry, flew to Delhi and will fly on to Islamabad, where he will have talks on Monday with the Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, who will be visiting Pakistan. Mr Hillier-Fry is expected to fly back to London after talks with the foreign secretary and no date has been fixed for his return to Kabul.

Britain has not recognised the new Soviet-installed government in Afghanistan and the first secretary at the embassy, Mr Micharel Howell, has been told to avoid contact with the new ministers but to carry on routine business at the seven-strong British Embassy. The government also considered withdrawing the Ambassador to Moscow Sir Curtis Keeble but the Foreign Office said today that his presence in Moscow, from where he could advise first hand was so far "preferable to recalling him."

SOVIET AMBASSADOR DEFENDS ACTION IN AFGHANISTAN

[Text] Russia's Ambassador in London Nikolay Lunkov today described international reaction to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan as "ballyhoo." Speaking on the BBC radio programme "The World This Weekend," Mr Lunkov repreated that the Russians had entered the country at the request of the government there. But he refused to say how long the Russian troops would have to stay, except "as long as the factors outside which made it necessary to remain."

Asked if the developments were the latest stage in the cold war, he said, "It depends on the leaders of the countries who try to make this ballyhoo. I don't see any drastic occasion for all these things, because the Afghanistan people have the right to settle their own destiny." The rest of the world was "absolutely wrong" to condemn Russia for its action, and the Soviet Government would press ahead with the Olympics. "We will have the Olympics in Moscow regardless of race, religion or political views."

CP CALLS FOR WITHDRAWAL OF SOVIET TROOPS

[Text] The British Communist Party tonight called for Russian troops to pull out of Afghanistan. But it also attacked American President Jimmy Carter and Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher for "sheer hypocrisy" in using the Soviet action to "step up the cold war." In a statement issued from its London headquarters, the party said that it had always supported struggles against imperialism. "Today it expresses its solidarity with the Afghan people's democratic, anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution," the statement said.

The Afghan revolution had faced complex problems, but these could not "justify the intervention of another state's military forces, which brings in a new government to follow different policies to solve these problems. Therefore we disagree with the military intervention of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, and urge the withdrawal of these forces," the statement said.

It was essential for the British labour and progressive movement to step up the fight for peace and detente the statement said.

MP: ACTION AGAINST SOVIET FISHING FLEET SHOULD BE TAKEN

LD131934 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1750 GMT 13 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Action should be taken against Soviet fishing fleets in British waters to teach Russia a lesson over Afghanistan, former Defence Secretary Mr Roy Mason, Labour MP for Barnsley, said today. In a statement from his Barnsley constituency, Mr Mason said that detente was still necessary if peace was to be maintained.

It could be so easy to slip into an ice age of East-West relations and within a slither of nuclear war. "This must be avoided. But in the wake of a naked aggressive act against Afghanistan, the aggressor must be taught a lesson." Russian fishing fleets should be prevented from exploiting British waters and denied the use of UK ports and docking facilities. He also advocated harassment of Russian "spy ships" which, he said, were "lurking off the coastline," disguised as trawlers.

U.S. GRAIN EMBARGO PRAISED, ALLIED SUPPORT URGED

[Editorial: "A Time for Solidarity"]

[Text] Now that gunboat diplomacy has seemingly become the preserve of Moscow (and in fairness neither Kabul nor Tehran is well sited for its application by the non-communist world) our leaders have great difficulty in agreeing on an appropriate response. President Giscard and Chancellor Schmidt apparently agree with Mrs Gandhi that commissars will be commissars. President Carter hopes for a trade embargo against Iran with no prospect of making it stick--and, as Mr Waldheim hardly needed to tell him, no prospect that it would alter minds in Tehran even if it did. Only the longshoremen of the port of New York have a rough and ready answer: And as the State Department rightly pointed out, international relationships are far too serious to be left to the haphazard judgment of trade unions.

It is a fortunate paradox, therefore, that Russia, albeit the second most powerful country in the world, is uniquely vulnerable to one particular sanction which the United States is in a position to apply unaided, if need be. Such is the incompatibility of communism and agriculture that Russia is incapable of feeding her livestock. So President Carter's ban on further grain shipments will hit the Kremlin where it hurts. Short of a direct military response, this is the move most nearly commensurate with the effrontery of Russian behaviour.

That does not mean that the rest of the non-communist world is entitled to stand aside and leave it to the United States. Self-respect, if nothing else, should persuade America's friends and allies to act in consort to deny the Russians even partial alternative sources of supply. They should also take what steps may be in their power to share the burdens imposed by halting grain shipments (and the Russian gold sales which would have paid for them) on the American economy. Throughout the 1940s and '50s American administrations were misguided enough to encourage the dismantlement of Western influence on the continent of Asia, with the consequences that we see today. It would be the height of folly for Europe and Japan now to repay the Americans in that same coin.

ROLANDHIS SAYS GOVERNMENT FOLLOWING BASES ISSUE CLOSELY

NC111158 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 11 Jan 80 p 1 NC

[Text] In answer to a question by Akel Secretary General Mr Ez Papaioannou that the British have conceded facilities in their Cyprus bases to the United States and whether the Cyprus Government has taken any steps to prevent their being used for an American intervention in Iran, the foreign minister replied:

"1. Recently the Cyprus Government stated (President Kiprianou's 4 December demilitarization speech) that as far as the Cyprus Government is concerned the use of the British bases will not be allowed for purposes other than those stipulated in the appropriate agreements.

"2. On the other hand, the government's stand is known for wanting full Cyprus demilitarization within the framework of a more general disarmament and a demilitarized and peaceful Mediterranean [region].

"3. In any case, the government's competent authorities are following the matter closely and with all necessary attention, in light of the treaty of establishment provision, and the necessary action is being taken to protect Cyprus' interests and its relations with the nonalined countries."

GOVERNMENT TO ASK GREECE, BRITAIN TO PRESSURE TURKEY

NC120806 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 12 Jan 80 p 1 NC

[Text] Yesterday a competent source stated that any Cyprus move toward Britain and Greece to have them undertake their responsibilities as guarantor powers in the Cyprus problem and to convince Turkey to abandon its intransigent attitude toward our problem does not necessarily mean agreement to holding a four-party conference. In asking Britain and Greece to undertake their responsibilities it is implied that they must pressure Turkey and thus back Dr Waldheim's task for the resumption of substantive intercommunal talks.

GOVERNMENTS REACT TO KARAMANLIS' FOREIGN POLICY SPEECH

[Text] The Cyprus Government will not comment on the portion referring to the Cyprus problem delivered in Greek Prime Minister Karamanlis' address at the Chamber of Deputies. Denktas: Not To Blame

TA121918 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, has said that the Turkish Cypriot community cannot be blamed for insisting on its partnership right in Cyprus, for defending its basic rights and freedoms, for opposing enosis and for not trusting the Greek Cypriots and Greece.

In a statement in Lefkosa [Nicosia] Denktas criticized the recent statement by Prime Minister Karamanlis to parliament. In his statement Karamanlis claimed that the Turkish Cypriot side is responsilble for creating the Cyprus problem and for obstructing a solution. Noting that Greece, and especially Karamanlis, had played a great role in the acts committed in Cyprus in the name of enosis, Denktas said that Karamanlis was in no position to blame Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community for the Cyprus problem. Denktas added that Karamanlis remained silent on the statement by Foreign Minister [title as heard] Averof that the Cyprus agreements are suitable springboards for enosis.

In reply to a question, Denktas said that a step toward rapprochement between the two communities in Cyprus can be taken if the Greek Cypriot administration announces that it has no authority over the Turkish Cypriot community.

KIPRIANOU CONFERS WITH FAMAGUSTA COMMITTEE

NC111546 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 11 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Today President Kiprianou received a delegation from the Famagusta coordinating committee in the presence of Foreign Minister Rolandhis. The meeting discussed in detail the latest developments in the Famagusta issue. The president assured the committee of the government's continuous interest in this serious matter and said the government had already taken many steps and was planning a series of other contacts and measures to thwart the colonization of the town and the opening of its hotels, as indicated in the Denktas statements.

During the meeting, it was decided that the government should keep in constant touch with the coordinating committee on this matter. It was also decided to form an ad hoc committee under the foreign minister and with the participation of representatives from the coordinating committee to follow the developments.

The statement also suggests that the UN secretary general should be requested to decisively intervene both in preventing the colonization of Varosha and in resuming substantive and constructive inter-Cypriot talks.

GOVERNMENT, PARTY REACTION TO ROGERS' NATO REMARKS

Government Reportedly Not Optimistic

AT111550 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 11 Jan 80 p 1 AT

[Excerpt] The government does not share General Rogers' optimism that he will personally find a solution to Greece's full reintegration within NATO's military wing. This was stressed by authoritative government circles as a result of the statements made by the NATO supreme commander. The same circles added the government will wait to express its opinions on the basis of given facts only.

KKE (Interior) Statement

[Statement issued by the press office of the KKE (Interior) on General Rogers' statements on reintegration with NATO; date not given]

[Text] The KKE (Interior) press office issued the following statement: "The new and clear Rogers statement on the goal of NATO's command for Greece's speedy reintegration into the alliance's military wing, while a formula is nearly ready, leaves no margin for doubt of the multilateral pressures being exerted upon our country--at a moment which is so critical for world peace--by the American imperialists in their effort to close the gap in the "alliance's" southeast wing in order to use Greek territory for the promotion of their interventionist activities.

"These pressures are exerted during a phase when the United States is pushing capitalist Europe and NATO member states particularly into aggressive activities beyond Europe, which are being pushed to a climax directly by Washington.

"The KKE (Interior) once again stresses that these U.S.-NATO plans--which are facilitated by the stated willingness of the Greek Government for its reintegration within NATO's military wing and by other recent pro-Atlantic statements by the government, which are contrary to a multifaceted Greek foreign policy--foster direct and serious dangers for our country and the cause of Cyprus.

"It is an imperative condition for averting these dangers that our country definitely remain outside NATO's military wing and declare its separate position against any cold war plans of the American imperialists."

KARAMANLIS, PAPANDREOU ADDRESS CHAMBER ON FOREIGN POLICY

[Excerpts] Referring to the country's foreign policy Karamanlis said recently we improved our relations with all countries. There has been a particular improvement in our relations with the Eastern countries while our ties with the West have also strengthened.

On Greek initiative a complex of relations was created in the Balkan area which considerably improved the area's climate. Greece particularly developed its always friendly relations with the Arab countries and it considerably increased its trade exchanges with them. Today they reached the level of $750 million as compared to $250 million in 1974. The prime minister then referred to his visits to the Soviet Union, China and other countries which, he said, were useful while the talks he had were sincere.

Referring to the international crisis specifically, Karamanlis said peace is in danger in the east Mediterannean, in the Middle East and Central Asia. The Palestine issue, he said, has become more severe. In Iran the situation leads toward a civil war. The detention of U.S. diplomats is an abolition of the institution of diplomatic asylum and abolition of international law and order.

On Afghanistan Karamanlis said the Soviet Union, without even keeping any excuses, invaded the country thus seriously injuring international detente. This situation is directly or indirectly related to the energy crisis which is the greatest and severest crisis to be experienced by the world since 1930.

Day by day the oil crisis is becoming deeper and the question has gone beyond the limits of collective control since even the oil produers are unable to agree amongst themselves. The position for Greece, the prime minister said, is to preserve the balance of power which is the only guarantee for peace since disarmament has already become impossible.

The prime minister then dealt with specific issues of the country's foreign policy and referred to the tragedy of Cyprus which, as he said, puts humanity to shame. The responsibility, he said, is entirely born by Turkey because dialog has produced no results specifically because of the Turkish position. Recently Turkey has even resorted to threats. If the threats are carried out they will not be a problem just for us, but also for the entire world. The Greek side, free of any predelections, will come to dialog for the purpose of reaching a national solution. The government, the prime minister said, has declared Greek solidarity toward Cypriot Hellenism.

On the Aegean issue Karamanlis said that the position of Greece is well known, firm and logical to the degree that if Turkey had demonstrated the minimum of understanding then differences could have been solved. Our country, he said, never argued that the Aegean is a Greek lake. They are both international as well as territorial waters. What Turkey must at long last understand and accept is that the Aegean is strewn with Greek islands. The responsibility for a solution rests with them and not with us. The only thing which we claim, he said, is to protect the frontiers and the security of our country without any concessions.

On NATO the prime minister said the government, as a first step, took care to create the high level of efficiency at which the armed forces now find themselves, and in its effort to strengthen collective security it discussed special relations. NATO command accepted the Greek proposal but Turkey put forth objections.

Greece, Karamanlis continued, did not finalize special relations because there was a complication involving the U.S.-Turkish agreement and because our country will not accept an overthrow of the balance of Greek and Turkish power as a result of this agreement.

The prime minister then referred to the accession of Greece to the Common Market.

PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou then spoke stressing that Karamanlis' observations of Greek ties with the West and on PASOK's positions on the EEC were unfortunate. It is well known that the EEC countries took a pro-Turkish position on the Cyrpus issue while NATO, which is responsible for the 7-year dictatorship in Greece, encourages Turkish expansionism. Papandreou also said that the role of Kissinger and Sisco in the Turkish invasion of Cyprus are also very well known.

Papandreou said that PASOK's positions toward the EEC are not anti-West as wrongly described by Karamanlis. PASOK, he added, believes that Greek accession to the EEC will not help develop Greek economy. It supports equal relations in all directions. Referring to the international situation Papandreou said we are faced at a critical period of transition from militant coexistence to cold war.

Papandreou then referred to the Cyprus issue and expressed the fear that the United States and NATO urgently want to arm Turkey and to overthrow the balance of power in the Aegean. On the Cyprus issue Papandreou accused the government of not being able to internationalize it and asked for the opening of the dossier on the July 1974 coup.

PASOK's chairman then criticized the government's foreign policy which he described as one-sided and leaning toward the West while the prime minister's visits to Moscow and other Eastern countries were conducted, as Papandreou said, for internal consumption only. This, he added, is proved by the Greek decision to agree on the missiles issue and its efforts to return to NATO's military wing.

Papandreou then referred to the invasion of Soviet troops in Afghanistan and said PASOK condemns this invasion but that it cannot fail to cauterize the hypocriey of the United States which has carried out many military interventions in small countries. The chairman of PASOK also criticized the Greek decision to support the appeal against the Soviet Union at the Security Council and asked whether our country has lodged such an appeal to the Security Council on the Cyprus issue.

Intervening, Prime Minister Karamanlis said that three appeals have been jointly submitted concerning Cyprus.

Papandreou then referred to the Greek-Turkish dispute and said Greece will only be able to defend itself under an independent defense policy and out of NATO's military and political wings. Defense of the country's territorial integrity and national independence, Papandreou said, can only be achieved if the brotherhood between the people and the army are strengthened and this cannot be achieved so long as differentation is made between polluted and nationally minded Greeks.

He also said that it is imperative that everyone help in the democratization of public life and that most importantly, the country must be drawn away from NATO's cold war coalition by taking part in an international crusade for disarmament and peace.

EDIK leader Zigdhis then spoke stating that the current debate takes place at a time when humanity is in a deep crisis and on the threshold of calamity. The Islamic Revolution has demonstrated that the basic principle of the sovereign and independent state can no longer support the function of international society. Humanity must discuss and find a form of world government. The Greek chamber ought to issue a resolution at this very moment calling on all peace-loving countries which respect international law to demand that all UN resolutions become acceptable and implemented. Only in this way will a worldwide debate start, under a Greek mantle, thus contributing to the preservation of world peace and to the country's prestige.

Zigdhis then said the prime minister added nothing new or specific with his speech. It is unacceptable, Zigdhis said, that at this moment the people should remain ignorant of the election system under which they will be called upon to vote. He then proposed to PASOK that the opposition should submit a vote of censure so that all the country's problems may be discussed and that a dialog conducted on them, instead of a monolog such as today's debate was.

On foreign policy he stressed that dangers to our country stem from Turkey, an allied country, and for this reason there must be an in-depth examination of our relations with the alliance. He added that at this moment we do not need NATO but that NATO needs us. Our position, therefore, must be to force Turkey to leave Cyprus and recall its positions on other issues, or else leave Crete and the other bases. If the government adopted such a policy then we would be considered an important factor in the preservation of peace and generally in Europe. Instead of this we followed the policy of a beggar. The debate continues.

VOTCP REPORTS HALT IN WHEAT SALES TO AFGHANISTAN

[Text] The pro-American and pro-NATO Demirel government has halted the sale of wheat to the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. The Demirel government, which is participating in the multifaceted campaign of pressure and provocation against the people and the revolution of Afghanistan led by U.S. and NATO imperialists, has halted wheat sales to Afghanistan. In addition to this, while all embassies in Ankara are being supplied with fuel oil, the Afghan Embassy is not receiving any fuel oil.

As is known, over 40 anti-imperialist organizations in Istanbul and Izmir, progressive youths, women, students and teachers in favor of union and solidarity, issued statements expressing solidarity with the people and the revolution of Afghanistan. The progressive and democratic forces of our country express the importance that our people attach to the solidarity with the people of Afghanistan and their revolutionary gains, and to the internationalist aid being extended by our great neighbor, the Soviet Union, to the people of Afghanistan

ERKMEN REPLIES TO KARAMANLIS REMARKS ON CYPRUS, AEGEAN

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said that the problems between Turkey and Greece can be resolved through bilateral negotiations. He said: Turkey is always open for negotiations. In a statement 2 days ago, Greek Prime Minister Karamanlis claimed that the problems in the Turkish-Greek relations had been created by Turkey and that the Cyprus problem was still unsolved because of the policy pursued by Turkey. Karamanlis also said that Turkey had certain limited rights in the Aegean Sea. Asked to comment on these remarks by our correspondent, Foreign Minister Erkmen said:

[Begin Erkmen recording] I do not want to start an argument over the statement made by the Greek prime minister, Mr Karamanlis. It is true that certain problems exist between Greece and Turkey. However, Turkey is not responsible for the creation of these problems. But we are not looking for who is responsible. The point is to solve these problems through negotiations as soon as possible. Turkey is always open for negotiations. Today, Turkey aims at having these problems resolved through negotiations.

Karamanlis tried to portray Turkey as the responsible party in the Cyprus issue. This is not true. The Cyprus problem is a conflict in which we are not a part. It is a problem which should be resolved by the concerned sides, the two communities living in Cyprus. In fact, we know that UN Secretary General Waldheim will soon make attempts to solve the problem through negotiations between the two sides, between the two communities. We are awaiting these attempts. We hope that the officials of the two communities meet and succeed in establishing an order whereby they can live side by side in security, under equal rights and in accordance with human rights. Everyone knows that we have always waited for such a solution and that we have always encouraged a peaceful solution.

As for the right of Turkey and Greece in the Aegean Sea, naturally, Turkey has right to this area. The rights of Turkey and Greece must be considered within borders. The issue is one of determining and agreeing on these borders. This should be resolved through negotiations as well. I hope that the secretaries general of the two Foreign Ministries will take up this issue this month and set the stage for talks at the technical level. [end recording]

DEMIREL TO MEET ECEVIT, RULES OUT COALITION

[Text] Ankara, 11 Jan (AA)--Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel announced he would be meeting with Republican People's Party Chairman Bulent Ecevit Saturday morning. Demirel confirmed his appointment with the opposition leader following his weekly interview with President Fahri Koruturk.

Demirel told reporters he would be glad to receive any contribution from anyone to pull Turkey out of its current difficulties. "I am prepared to receive any positive aid from anyone for this purpose" he stated. Demirel announced he would meet with the martial law commanders on 14 January, with a National Security Council session scheduled for 22 January.

Legislation

He noted in addition to the package legislation intended to deal with terrorism, the cabinet had submitted to parliament other drafts proposing to amend the martial law code, the penal code and the law on criminal court procedure. Asked about reports of a second letter drawn up by the commanders, Demirel told newsmen, "don't be so wrapped up with letters."

With regard to whether further legislative measures against terrorism included amendment of the elections law, Demirel said that was another matter. He believed in order to ensure stability in government and to prevent the occurence of frequent crises, certain amendments to "the Constitution and the law on elections" were necessary, "if we can muster the majority of votes required in parliament," he added.

Not the Time To Consider Coalition

The prime minister said there was no reason to consider the question of a possible coalition with another party at the moment, as there was a government in power which had recently obtained a vote of confidence. To start a debate on the formation of a government or coalition, he believed, would be evading the real question and an attempt to tie the hands of the present government.

Defense Cooperation With U.S.

Demirel declined to say whether the defense and economic cooperation agreement recently initialled between Turkey and the United States would be submitted for ratification by parliament, "because of the supplements to the agreement."

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

GRAIN EXPORTS TO USSR TO BE CONTINUED AT PRESENT LOW LEVEL

WA111457 London REUTER in English 1435 GMT 11 Jan 80 WA

[Text] Brussels, Jan 11, REUTER--The European Community will allow exports of grain to the Soviet Union to continue at their present low level, a spokesman for the EEC Commission said today. The Commission's measures to monitor and control grain exports to the Soviet Union will not contain an embargo such as the one the United States has imposed in retaliation for the Soviet military incursion into Afghanistan, the spokesman said. But he said the EEC would assure the United States that it would not increase sales to the Soviet Union to make up for embargoed American supplies. He said grain sales will be allowed to continue at their normal levels, which are so low that an embargo is thought unnecessary.

GOVERNMENT SAYS NO FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR MOSCOW OLYMPICS

LD120324 Hilversum in English to North America 0230 GMT 12 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Dutch Cabinet has decided not to recall the Dutch ambassador from Moscow for the time being. The government has, however, made up its mind not to provide any financial support for the Dutch team for the Moscow Olympics. The government does not have the power to enforce a boycott of the Olympics, however.

At his weekly press conference, Prime Minister Andreas Van Agt said that Dutch sportsmen and women are free to decide for themselves whether or not to go to Moscow.

In future talks with its allies, Holland will adopt the view that no extra wheat supplies from Europe (?must) go to the Soviet Union in compensation for the cut-back in American supplies to the Russians. The Dutch Government further decided to extend immediate assistance to Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

OW112301 Hong Kong AFP in English 2257 GMT 11 Jan 80 OW

[Text] The Hague, Jan. 11 (AFP)--The Netherlands Government has refused all direct financial support for its Olympic athletes bound for this summer's Moscow games because of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

Prime Minister Andreas Van Agt announced the cash ban after a Cabinet meeting here today, but stressed that the decision would not spill over to affect other citizens of the Netherlands. "Here people can do and say as they please and we do not go in for brain washing," he told a press conference.

Explaining the government's decision, he said it was obvious that if the Olympic Games took place in a festive atmosphere in Moscow in spite of the present climate the Soviets would draw a political conclusion from this.

The Netherlands would urge its allies not to take commercial advantage of the American cereal embargo on the Soviet Union, and to restrict the exportation of high technology products to the Soviet Union, he added.

GOVERNMENT OPPOSES UNILATERAL PROTEST AGAINST USSR

LD150905 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 10 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[An Salomonson report: "Government Thinks Measures Needed Against Russia and Iran"]

[Text] Schiphol, 10 January--[Foreign] Minister Van der Klaauw does not intend to recall Ambassador Reinink from Moscow in protest of the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. However, he considers other measures against the Soviet Union and even against Iran, due to the continued imprisonment of hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, absolutely necessary, he explained this morning on his return to Schiphol from Curacao.

The minister described the Russian invasion of Afghanistan as "an extremely serious blow to detente." "Seizing a country by military means--especially a country outside the Soviet bloc--is bound to affect the detente process considerably," Van der Klaauw said after breaking off his tour of Latin America to attend this morning's cabinet meeting on the Middle East situation.

The minister described solidarity with the United States as a "fundamental principle" in steps against Iran and Afghanistan.

He sees the CSCE as providing good opportunities for clearly expressing to the Soviet Union the general indignation felt at its recent action. "A conference on environmental matters is, I believe, due to take place shortly in the context of the CSCE. I envisage our saying that in the present circumstances we do not wish to hold such a conference," Van der Klaauw explained. He believed that to question next year's Madrid conference as yet would be going too far.

Christian Democratic Appeal Deputy J.N. Scholten's suggestion to recall the ambassador from Moscow was rejected by the minister: "That would have had to be done immediately on a bigger scale (in other words, in a European context). I do not believe that there is any point in doing so now." Nor did he see anything to be gained from all European member states' recalling their ambassadors simultaneously now.

Sanctions

If a large number of countries--the United States, Canada, Australia, and the nine European countries for example--were to impose economic sanctions against the Soviet Union together, Van der Klaauw thinks that they would certainly be effective. In the past the minister has repeatedly opposed unilateral action unless it is based on a binding decision by the Security Council or unless such a large group of countries decides to act that they are bound to be effective.

With regard to Iran, Van der Klaauw admitted that voluntary sanctions are the only possibility until the first chamber passes the sanctions law. However, in this connection the minister also thinks that consultations within the EC must be completed. He also said that he thinks it just possible that article 2 of the import and export bill could provide sound legal basis for economic sanctions.

GENSCHER DISCUSSES IRAN, AFGHANISTAN WITH ARAB ENVOYS

[Summary] Bonn--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, federal minister of foreign affairs, today intensified the dialog with the Gulf states in view of the tense situation in the Middle East. Genscher received one after the other the ambassadors of Qatar, Kuwait, and the UAE, as well as of Iraq and Oman, and the charge d'affaires of Saudi Arabia.

According to the Foreign Ministry spokesman, developments in Iran and the consequences of events in Afghanistan were discussed.

Genscher will also propose to the meeting of the nine EC foreign ministers in Brussels tomorrow an intensification of the dialog with the Gulf states, which Bonn considers to be necessary. According to Genscher, the dialog should be on possibilities for improving political and economic cooperation between the European and Gulf states. In this connection, the already initiated cooperation between the EC and ASEAN could serve as a model.

GENSCHER REPORTS TO FDP EXECUTIVE ON USSR DAMAGE TO DETENTE

LD141646 Hamburg DPA in German 1458 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and federal foreign minister, has warned the Soviet Union against attempting to acquire one-sided advantages for itself in other parts of the world through military means. In Bonn today, in a report to the FDP Executive on developments in Afghanistan and East-West relations, Genscher said that the Soviet Union will thereby do great harm to the policy of detente, which can only thrive if it is indivisible.

According to party spokesman Josef Gerwald, the Executive also had a "very businesslike and sober discussion" of the program for next autumn's Bundestag elections.

Genscher stressed the need to strengthen the desire of Third World states for independence and self-reliance and to stand as partners by their side. He expressly professed his loyalty to European-American solidarity, which he described as an indispensable prerequisite for European security, balance and all efforts for arms control, disarmament and detente. At the same time he came out in favor of consistently pursuing NATO's arms control proposals to the East.

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON INDIVISIBILITY OF DETENTE

DW140948 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 1030 GMT 13 Jan 80 DW

[Interview by reporters Paul Heinz Middeldorf and Werner Ernenputsch with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on the program "Frankfurt Talks"; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] One of the main theses of Bonn's detente policy--of Western detente policy as a whole--is always the indivisibility of detente, that it cannot be limited to a certain region. Mr Bahr, however, is an exception. He said something else recently in Washington, namely that detente has always been divisible.

I would like to turn the original thesis around by asking: Is tension divisible? Is it possible that there can be confrontation in one part of the world such as Afghanistan, and that the dialog with the Soviet Union can continue in another part, such as in Europe, as European and West European countries seem to intend?

[Answer] I do not have the text of Mr Bahr's statement at hand at the moment, but I want to answer your question very clearly: Detente policy is indivisible; the European states do not attempt to pretend that it is divisible. It is incontestable that the basic conflict, expressed in the military intervention in Afghanistan, consists of the fact that the Soviet Union has violated the integrity and independence of a Third World state, violated a nonalined status. This is a conflict between the Soviet Union and the Third World. Simultaneously, it is also a violation of the principle of detente policy's indivisibility. This is why we are equally involved, and that is why East-West relations are involved. Those who believe this is not the case will clearly see from an analysis of developments in Western states that this intervention will certainly backfire on detente policy.

The Federal Government said very clearly that the Soviet Union has inflicted grave damage on cooperation between the West and the East with its action in Afghanistan. Cooperation is specifically based on the renunciation of force, on increasing predictability and on the establishment of mutual confidence. So it is obviously--and I repeat--a basic conflict between the Soviet Union and the Third World which is striving for independence. That conflict also involves and has an effect on East-West relations and, thus, on detente policy.

[Question] You say that detente policy is indivisible. What does that mean in practice? You said that what has happened now--the attack by the Soviets on Afghanistan--is handicapping East-West relations. What conclusions must be drawn?

[Answer] First I would like to explain once more why detente policy is indivisible. It cannot develop if a state such as the Soviet Union achieves supposed or real advantages for itself wherever it seems to be connected with no risk or a small risk--as has happened now. This also explains how important it is in early 1979 [as heard] to discuss the character of Soviet armament. I think that nobody in our country will attribute to the Soviet Union a desire for war between the East and the West. But it is also prepared to use its arms potential officially when it believes it is able to achieve real or supposed advantages below the level of a military conflict between the East and West.

By saying real or supposed advantages, I mean that the advantage it has achieved through the occupation of Afghanistan will show its effect on the world; it will be demonstrated in the conflict with the Third World and in the movement that is taking place in the United Nations, in the Security Council as well as the General Assembly.

One year ago, at the Havana conference of the nonalined states, there was a discussion about whether the Soviet Union was the so-called natural ally of the nonalined. That had been said by Cuba and others, and a strong group of nonalined countries said that this was not so due to the Soviet Union's known expansionist policy in the Third World. Angola is an example. These states, represented by Yugoslavia, represented by such countries as Zambia, Tanzania and by the ASEAN states of Southeast Asia, were out for independence and they did not want to play down what was going on.

It is our task, as Europeans, to help the states of that region to preserve their independence and sovereignty, giving them political and economic options. We as the European Community have a contractual agreement with the ASEAN states which feel their independence exposed to a threat and who consider political and economic cooperation with the states of the European Community as a means of safeguarding their independence.

We believe that the states of this region who want to achieve this--we are pressing nobody--ought to be given a similar option.

That was an answer to your question on what could happen now, Mr Ernenputsch. That is one of the possible things we can contribute to stability in that region.

[Question] Let me take up the original question. Will a dialog with the Soviet Union still be possible despite these military adventures? Will it be possible with Mr Brezhnev? It has been reported that Mr Brezhnev did not initiate the Afghanistan action and that it has even taken place against his will. Is Mr Brezhnev, therefore, another partner for us, a more convenient partner than the rest of the Soviet leadership?

[Answer] Mr Middeldorf, I do not think there is much sense in speculating on who has acted like what in the Moscow Politburo, and I do not intend to join the circle of Kremlin astrologists. I think that just one thing is important for us with regard to realpolitik: Regardless of who was for or against the Afghanistan action, it is a fact that those who were in favor of applying military means for the occupation and subordination of Afghanistan prevailed. That is the reality. These seem to be the people who exert influence there.

This does not change anything about the fact, however, that the dialog, contacts and talks must naturally be continued with the Warsaw Pact states. The fact that the United States expressed its opinion in Moscow, that it listens to Soviet opinion and that we are doing the same indicates that this dialog is necessary. In this connection it is valid to say: Those who do not want to shoot must talk and negotiate. Renouncing the dialog, talks and negotiations would mean renouncing politics. This is why the Western alliance's suggestions for arms control and disarmament still stand, suggestions that were made in Brussels on 12 and 14 December 1979.

It is now up to the Soviet Union to say whether it is prepared to negotiate on arms control and disarmament or whether it wants to have a new arms race. Now one must follow suit. Our negotiation suggestions have been made. And our decision to close the arms gap is also on the table. That decision will be implemented; we did not make that decision to create a position to negotiate. We have made it for reasons of our security policy, namely as an answer to the Soviet lead in armament. Being on the table means that this decision will be implemented and not that it is up for discussion. It is now up to the Soviet Union to accept the offer of negotiatings on medium-range arms. We want to achieve a balance on as low as level of armament as possible. It is up to the Soviet Union to make a contribution. The word of the federal chancellor is valid who said that closing the arms gap efforts can be all the more negligible the more that concrete progress is achieved. But then the Soviet Union must be prepared to negotiate.

[Question] Let me get back to the consequences. U.S. President Carter has imposed several sanctions against the Soviet Union. Here in our country many citizens may have the feeling that the Federal Government voices its solidarity, but when concrete measures are involved Bonn will do as good as nothing.

[Answer] First of all I would like to say that in this problem the FRG and the European partners of the United States have the same interests as the United States. Solidarity, therefore, is not merely a friendly statement vis-a-vis the United States, but the correct stance vis-a-vis our own interests.

It is an absolute illusion for anybody to assume that one can keep Europe out of the present conflict. We are right in the middle of it; we are involved. If there is a difference at all between the situation of the United States and the situation of Western Europe, it would be the fact that Western Europe is closer to Afghanistan than the United States and that we are closer to the Warsaw Pact's sphere of influence than the United States. The solidarity demonstrated by the United States for us over and over again--by saying us, I also mean those of us in Berlin--is indispensable. No doubts can exist, therefore, that the Federal Republic and also the other European partners will show solidarity with regard to the United States. Europe will do nothing that in any way could torpedo the measures taken by the U S. Government or make them a useless instrument.

[Question] Is it true that the Americans had asked Bonn to stop the delivery of drilling equipment from the Federal Republic to the Soviet Union and that we ought to abstain from the delivery of big electronic data processing equipment?

[Answer] I say again: We will do nothing that could make the American measures useless. In other words, we will not do business in place of the United States. The United States did not request us to do anything, but a discussion is going on in the Western alliance on a catalog of possible reactions. The economic-political sector will certainly be discussed also. I believe it will become very clear that the Federal Government will point out that we will not stab the United States in the back.

[Question] Leading West German economic representatives are negotiating at present in Moscow. Do you think that this timing is good with a view to relations with our allies?

[Answer] The United States' economic relations also continue with the exception of the materials you have mentioned.

[Question] There are various forms of reaction, as you indicated. The Americans also want to react in the military field and draw conclusions from Afghanistan. They will further develop their bases in the Middle East and Asia; there will be more arms supplies for Turkey, for example, or Pakistan. Can the Federal Republic take part in this field in giving an answer to Pakistan?

[Answer] Mr Middeldorf, I want to begin where we live. The fact that the Soviet Union engages in expansionist activities wherever it sees no risks or small risks shows how important it is that we have a functioning alliance. It also shows how important it is that the FRG contribute an important share to the alliance with its Bundeswehr.

I believe that the citizens of our country must know particularly in these days that our security is based on that alliance, on the existence of the Bundeswehr. Maybe some people will now realize how important it is that we did not base the policy of detente and arrangements with the East on illusions on an illusion saying that if one follows detente policy one does not need defense any more. We have never left any doubts: The existence of the alliance and our partnership in the European Community are also the prerequisites for a peace policy vis-a-vis the states of Eastern Europe. Those who believe that we are doing too much with regard to detente, will now have thought better. I hope that this applies also to those who have criticized us with regard to our decision made last December involving closing the arms gap.

I think that if anybody in this situation needs to say goodby to illusions, it is those who have stood aside or who were critical whenever we did what was necessary for defense. That is the FRG's contribution to the security of the Western states and beyond.

There are no doubts, if I may say so, that the existence of the Western alliance does not merely create security for the states belonging to the alliance. The existence of the Western alliance also means security for those European states, for those near Eastern European states that do not belong to the alliance. Yugoslavia's independence, for example, rests on two factors: on Yugoslavia's being a member of the nonalined movement and on the existence of a Western alliance in Europe that is capable of acting. That is our contribution. As you know, arms export was a matter in which the Federal Republic acted restrictively from the very beginning. Nothing will change in this regard.

We can make very decisive contributions to the stabilization of states in that region. We did it by having played and by playing a leading role in giving economic and financial aid to Turkey. Their country holds a key position in the region involved. We are in favor of helping such a country as Pakistan. We are in favor of the European Community, as I just pointed out with regard to the states in this region, which offers the opportunity for political and economic cooperation. That is our contribution toward giving the states of the Third World in that region the opportunity to maintain their independence. Their independence is a contribution to our security, to the security of the states of the Western alliance.

[Question] You mentioned military reaction through the strengthening of the alliance. CDU security policy spokesman Woerner suggested recently that the alliance's sphere of influence and effectiveness ought to be expanded. What do you say to such a suggestion?

[Answer] I believe that the answer I have given to the last question indicates that the effectiveness of this alliance is not limited to the framework of the alliance. The reality of a Western alliance which is capable of acting will have its effect in other fields as well. I believe that this is exactly in line with the interests of the alliance partners. But I do not believe that the suggestions that have been made will lead in the right direction.

[Question] You will be in Washington in 8 days. Do you expect very serious negotiations?

[Answer] I think that this visit as well as the visit by the federal chancellor, which were planned independent of developments in Afghanistan, will take place at a time when we will have to discuss particularly important problems with our American friends. I am, therefore, very happy that I will be there next week.

[Question] Will you continue talks with politicians from the other side, from the East?

[Answer] First of all, the next thing will be a discussion of all these problems we have touched on here in the circle of the European Community's foreign ministers. I suggested that the session of the Council of Ministers that will take place on Tuesday in Brussels ought to deal as one of its main points with developments in the Afghanistan region. I would consider it quite possible that we as the European Community will not only discuss that problem but will react, as has been expressed in the suggestion of having contractual agreements with certain states. In addition, there will certainly be lively contacts with states of the Community and with states outside the European Community in the Third World. There are absolutely no doubts that these countries realize that the West wants to be a fair partner with regard to independence vis-a-vis the East, which continues to pursue its policy oriented toward old imperialist categories, namely, the establishment of zones of influence.

These countries feel that the West is doing something new, namely representing a partnership policy that is oriented toward the future; this will lead to closer contacts between these states and us. As regard talks with the Soviet Union, I will have a longer talk with the Soviet ambassador in order to exploit all possibilities for outlining our opinion, as has been done already by our ambassador in Moscow.

[Question] When your Soviet colleague was in Bonn a few weeks ago, you were invited to visit the Soviet Union. The federal chancellor also received an invitation. Is there a possibility of carrying out the invitation, if it were expressed concretely now, or is the schedule filled?

[Answer] The federal chancellor has already said that his visit was envisaged first. But no date has been set yet. I do not intend to go to the Soviet Union within the foreseeable future.

[Question] Is it still possible for the federal chancellor to meet State Council Chairman Honecker? Under present world political conditions would such a meeting be possible or called for?

[Answer] I want to stress again that talks must not be discontinued. I do not say, therefore, that I will not go to the Soviet Union; it has only been envisaged that the federal chancellor will go first. Since no date has been set yet no date has been set for me either. One must determine when the proper time is for a talk between the federal chancellor and Honecker. The fact that talks are continuing is demonstrated by the Hungarian foreign minister's visit to our country as well as by my intention to go to Czechoslovakia sometime in February.

[Question] Speculation has been voiced over and over again in connection with Afghanistan; voiced in public discussions as well as by politicians as to whether it is advisable to suggest to the national committees of the International Olympic Committee not to attend the Moscow games or to look for other places where the games could take place, as Mondale said a few days ago. What do you think of such speculations?

[Answer] The people who are responsible for German sports have commented on it. The federal minister of the interior has also said a word or two about it. It cannot be predicted now whether the situation will change.

[Question] You have pointed out several times the role played by the Third World in the present situation and with regard to future developments, and you mentioned stabilization in the region of the Third World. That means, among other things and most of all, financial support. Is the West presently in a position, since it is greatly suffering economically from oil price increases, to transfer great or greater means to these countries?

[Answer] We all know that energy price developments are creating difficult problems for our economic development. But we also know that our development will not work without security. We have always considered the policy vis-a-vis the Third World as being a peace policy, as a policy aimed at overcoming the social contrasts between the North and the South in these countries, as a policy of stabilization in these countries. In view of Soviet efforts to get a foothold wherever instability exists, a policy of sound development and thus of stabilizing the states of the Third World is certainly also a contribution to our own security. Seen that way, all the expenditures we are making for the Third World are not gifts to others, as some people say, but investments in our own future, in our own security, in the security of our children.

They are a part of peace policy and one more part of the worldwide policy aimed at social justice. It is, therefore, certainly quite wrong for politicians to make material promises at the threshold of this decade with regard to possible developments in their own country. I believe that we must be prepared in our own interest to render even greater service to states of the Third World. That will be an expression of our will with regard to freedom, of our will to bear responsibility for us and our children in this world. I am firmly convinced that the citizens of our country will have more understanding for a realistic explanation of these necessities than for cheap material election promises.

[Question] You said that detente is indivisible. One of the basic prerequisites for detente is openness, the predictability of the policy of the adversary, of the partner. Assuming there will be a second Afghanistan in some form or other, will detente then be dead for good?

[Answer] Due to the worldwide reaction to Afghanistan, the Soviet Union will realize that Afghanistan will not be considered a routine affair; the Soviet Union will realize the consequences of more such moves in that direction. The Soviet Union ought to make a contribution now to establishing confidence in the world. We discuss arms decisions in public, as we did with regard to closing the arms gap. It is time for the Soviet Union to do the same. Had it done that in its advanced armament, we would have been spared many things. We discuss our military budgets in public. The Soviets ought to eventually make this a public affair. We also discuss our security doctrine in public. The Soviet Union ought to eventually do so in public.

We ought to set up a registry in the United Nations for arms exports and arms imports to demonstrate how the arms streams flow in this world. It would demonstrate that the Soviets supply arms to the Third World, and unfortunately only a few hospitals and a few tractors. It means that the Soviet Union really needs to fill a gap here. Now it has more reason than ever to do something to improve the gravely battered confidence in the world.

[Question] Is the Soviet Union still predictable?

[Answer] Soviet policy has inflicted a severe blow to its predictability due to the events in Afghanistan. But I believe that nobody will be surprised by what has happened there because it was always a basic tendency of Soviet policy to take possession of advantages wherever it was possible to achieve this without risk.

CDU/CSU SECURITY POLICY CONGRESS HELD

Strauss Address

DW141333 Bonn DIE WELT in German 14 Jan 80 p 4 DW

[Excerpts from the second part of a speech given by Franz Josef Strauss, CSU chairman, Bavarian minister president and chancellor-candidate of the CDU/CSU, at the security policy congress of the CDU/CSU in Bonn on 12 January; the excerpts are based on an uncorrected transcript from a tape recording subsequently edited by the editor of DIE WELT]

[Text] As federal defense minister I once said in the Bundestag that, as far as we are concerned, there is only one defense situation: the preservation of our freedom, the preservation of security and the preservation of peace against the great power which, having been one of the two great victors of World War II, failed to abide by the rules of international law. [paragraph continues]

This gave the end of World War II a different historical interpretation than would have been a natural thing to do in keeping with the general principles of international law and in accordance with the yardsticks of the democratic world...

As far as I am concerned it does not mean anything for the dangerousness or nondangerousness of the Soviet armament to be established at party conventions through majority votes. To me it does not mean anything for party conventions to decide on the necessity or nonnecessity of nuclear energy, and with slight majorities to boot. I am absolutely opposed to the introduction of new weapons systems no longer being decided by responsible politicians and soberly thinking soldiers but instead being exposed to the coincidence of internal party collusions, buddying and majority shifts...

As the chancellor I would demand of my parliamentary majority, of course after thorough discussion, and likewise of the parties supporting such a government, that they accept the decisions of the head of government, which ultimately are made in keeping with the power of issuing the guidelines, or call him off.

The Example of the CSSR

Just half a year after the attack on Prague there was no longer any talk about it. World opinion had become used to it. And a year later the advocates of the new German Ostpolitik gave the invaders in Prague the highest moral and reputative credit in the world which they could have possibly been given with regard to matters of morals and reputation. This, too, is but a statement of fact.

Let us look at Afghanistan today. The excitement over the invasion of Afghanistan is not any greater than was the excitement at the time over the invasion of Prague. What should make the Soviets believe this time that the world irritation and the world condemnation and the world outrage will last any longer than following 21 August 1968? Here Willy Brandt--and the circle of the new policy's engineers--has done our security a fatal service. I say this with the urgent request that we learn from what has happened, learn from our experiences and from the mistakes we have made. The Soviet Union is in a serious economic situation. More than ever before it depends on economic cooperation and--just think of the grain deliveries--on purchases in the world. Its economic situation is anything but rosy. So one cannot but wonder: Why, then, the invasion of Afghanistan?

If it had been the invasion of a wheat surplus country one might still say that it serves to secure their own basis of nutrition. Neither does Afghanistan produce any oil. Afghanistan merely borders on the regions rich in oil. Yet the military venture in Afghanistan burdens the economy of the Soviet Union, it burdens the food situation in the Soviet Union, the Soviet Union is getting entangled in guerrilla warfare which--and one should not have any illusions about it--does not, however, have the dimensions of the Vietnam conflict. This impairs its worldwide prestige.

Afghanistan

Nevertheless the leadership of the Soviet Union decided for this action in this situation. So one should at long last learn how to draw the conclusion that as far as communist rulers are concerned, the fulfillment of their power policy goals has first, dominant priority. Especially if they believe that the excitement in the world will quickly abate....

I need not say especially what conclusions emerge from this; but one should at long last acknowledge that the system in the GDR, the system in Poland, the system in Czechoslovakia accord primary importance to their power policy goals and their political priorities, above all economic policy considerations, unless they are forced by the power of facts to place the predominance of their power policy goals behind their economic existence. I hope to have expressed myself plainly enough here.

Allow me to say about the concept of detente that detente automatically ceases to be an option if it leads to a politically psychological neutralization and to a paralysis of the military will for defense. In that case the other side would no longer need any detente.

Willy Brandt has declared that the invasion of Afghanistan proves that there has been too little and not too much detente. I do not want to take issue with him here--it does not seem to me to be worth an intellectual exercise. Yet the invasion of Afghanistan is a consequence of too much false detente policy and, hence, also of too little appropriate detente policy...

Within the framework of consecutive temporal periods detente must be indivisible geographically. There is no such thing as divisibility. I was horrified at the superficiality of the arguments of the incumbent chancellor. He advocates arguments like others stretch their legs. He changes from one argument to another.

Detente

In the Bundestag debate at the time, prior to the Helsinki conference, I attacked him because he had said that Africa is no business of ours, that no detente has been agreed upon there, whereas it has been agreed upon in Europe, and works there, too. I do not want to say anything now about the general superficiality of this argument but about a German ailment to which apparently all owners of a smart command voice are particularly prone, typically in Laenders, namely the continental narrowing of the horizon. I am not making any comparisons of any nature. I ask you to believe me, as otherwise this would be misunderstood. I am not making any comparison between Emperor William II for the incumbent chancellor. But what has always been common to German statesmen in supreme positions, it being a foregone conclusion that no moral comparison is possible between Emperor William and Hitler since they are worlds apart, has been a narrowing of the horizon, the narrowing of their vision, the inaptitude for comprehending that we are engaged in a continental but also transcontinental and international process, that any German security policy must extend its sphere of influence [einzugsbereich] globally--I do not mean its troops but its spiritual, political, historical, military sphere of assessment--and must not narrow it down to the tiny bit between Luebeck and Passau.

Honecker's Africa Corps

This [speech] does not contain the hidden call for the founding of an Africa corps. But who in the world really gets excited about Honecker's Africa corps? Thousands of soldiers of German nationality, of German tongue, with the wrong insignia, namely with hammer and sickle, are stationed in South Yemen, in Ethiopia, in Mozambique, in Angola and in many other countries.

If the Federal Republic of Germany, recognized by the entire Western world as a democratic country, a member of the European Community, a member of the Atlantic security pact, a member of the United Nations, a signatory power to all antiwar pacts and all human conventions, were to send but one company of police made up of volunteers to secure or support friends, black friends in Africa, the world would raise an outcry of outrage and disgust. We have no intention of doing such a thing. [paragraph continues]

Yet if Mr Honecker's instructors, numbering many thousands--as you know the "Legion Condor" also consisted of only instructors at the time--enhance the entire communications system in Mozambique, if they plan the attack on the south in Angola together with the Cubans as well as the extermination of the last nests of resistance--who in the world gets excited about it? Where is the cry of outrage by the world press? Where is the outrage of the United Nations? Nothing: What I hate is this hyprocrisy and this double-dealing...

Moscow's Armament

Let me advance my assessment here of the character of Soviet armament. You know, Herbert Wehner has termed the character of the Soviet armament as defensive and peaceful. He also found in the Bundeswehr some commanders--I was close to saying Guidon unit [standarten] commanders--who made utterances along his lines....By what criteria must Soviet armament be judged?

To begin with by its potential. The potential of the Soviet armament has changed gigantically in the course of detente policy. Actually this is a remarkable process. Who, anyway, allows Messrs Brandt, Schmidt, Wehner and Bahr to say that peace has become safer?....

Good, I grant that the Russians--I do not mean the Soviet Russians now--that the Russians always feared being encircled, that they have always been mistrusting, that mistrust and the feeling of insecurity have always been one of the basic components of their political-military actions. The strange thing is, however, that they would have that security problem if they stood not at the Elbe but at the Rhine. They would have it also if they stood at the Atlantic instead of the Rhine. Then they would naturally extend their security speculations to the neighbor on the other side of the Atlantic. There are some who become smaller and smaller through wars of conquest, and others who become bigger and bigger through sheer defense....

The Soviet Union developed its arms enormously, but it is also interesting to see the arms setup, the offensive components of the ground, aviation and naval armed forces have been strengthened particularly....

Missiles

Going into the cosmic sphere is one thing, equality with regard to intercontinental missiles is something else; superiority in conventional arms in Europe is a third element that is most grave for us. In addition, there is now also the shifting of the military balance through the stepped-up introduction of missiles; every week there is one more missile with a multiple warhead--the SS-20. You know about the argument on our side that makes closing the arms gap necessary.... That is the reason why we must agree to the stationing of such units on FRG territory also.

We do not agree with the gibberish of the political scientists, with the Chinese gibberish of the sociologists, with whose help the Berlin party congress resolution practically turned the topic around by saying: We must accept these medium-range missiles for the sake of disarmament. Very strange logic. Mr Bahr said it most clearly: If we want to make the Americans agree to disarmament negotiations, we must first comply with their political will...Namely, let them station medium-range missiles on German territory. That is the perversion of Mr Egon Bahr's thinking.

Vital Lines

I say this in connection with the worldwide presence of the Soviet Union and its global strategy, which I consider a fact and to which I do not add any positive or negative moral accents. Naturally one must take most seriously the communist background, the world revolutionary aim. I also believe that the rapid development of the medium-range missile system is supposed to deter the Europeans from protecting or defending effectively, together with the Americans, our vital oil and raw material supply lines.

I do not believe that these medium-range missiles have primarily been planned for the possibility of destroying Central Europe--although they are technically in a position to do so. They are the political-psychological means of pressure to keep the Europeans from defending in some way or other their vital interests in other territories outside Europe. That danger is as great as the immediate military threat.... The potential permits the Soviets to take all military options, beginning from an action such as in Afghanistan, and ranging to actions over a distance of thousands of kilometers....

Intentions

The second criterion are the intentions. I did not say that the Soviets want to have World War III.... The Soviet Union does not have a leadership consisting of adventurous criminals with psychiatric problems, as was the case with the leadership of the Third Reich prior to and during the war--these are ice-cold strategic planners and calculators. They will certainly not use violence if they have other means of implementing their power policy aims. It is, therefore, completely wrong to say that the Soviets have the preparation of World War III in mind in order to touch it off as soon as they can. If it were touched off, the potential that is decisive for worldwide predominance--namely Europe--would not fall into their hands unscathed and in such a state that it could be used within a foreseeable future....

Strategic Aims

The third [criterion] are long-term strategic aims in a combination of great Russian imperialism with world revolutionary Marxist-Leninist aims. I have been under the impression for many years that we are watching the door to the house quite well, while we sleep with regard to the other doors or fail to see them at all. I recall also.... my speech given prior to the outbreak of civil war in Angola, that was before the Helsinki Conference. At that time I said to the Bundestag in July 1975 that civil war in Angola is imminent. I will never forget the front of spiteful faces, of arrogant grinning facades who said approximately the following: The poor madman up there, what has that to do with detente? That is none of our business. How does he hope to know what will come?

Division of Work in the Alliance

Even if we must maintain more restraint than maybe the French or the British, the overall division of work in the alliance's sphere is involved. Who will protect Europe? And who has enough forces to look around in other regions of the world that could be critical for us?

I am not an advocate of some sort of world political adventures. But I cannot simply close my eyes as a responsible politician--regardless of whether I want to become chancellor or not--to the fact that our vital lifelines are being threatened and in part cut off through a global, long-term and far-reaching power strategy. Our attention must be focused also on that.

Detente is therefore geographically indivisible, and therefore one must not forget the problem of long-term strategic aims in the assessment of Soviet armament. Some day we will be bitterly awakened from our dreams if we forget this....

The Soviets sacrifice much for their power strategy, something that contradicts their economic interests. Why do they do that? I would like to name three reasons? First, in order to safeguard in the long run their own oil and raw material basis, and in connection with oil they think of the Middle East and not of Alaska. Second, by dominating this flank that is of vital importance for Europe they want to keep the Europeans in a state of dependence, vulnerability and exposure to blackmail. We must not take this too easily. The one who dominates the Middle East and who controls Africa down to the south, or at least who brings decisive power policy influence to bear on it, threatens the vital flanks of Europe and forces the Europeans to act this way or that way.

Permit me to say a third thing here: It does not make sense just to say the Americans, the Americans, the Americans: The Americans are in a position to supply themselves for a long time in a makeshift way with energy and raw materials. We cannot do that even for a short time. The Americans are less vulnerable, less dependent, have less simply to hurt and they cannot be blackmailed as simply as we can. If we show the cold shoulder to the Americans with regard to security problems which have become indivisible, we will experience the situation where we will stand absolutely alone in the hour of danger--we Germans, we Europeans, everybody....

I do not want you to understand my elaborations to be saying that military measures would be a medicine against the troops of the Soviet Union. We need a global strategy that uses all economic, political, psychological and other means in order to make it clear to the leaders of the Soviet Union that they have embarked on a way where there will be a point of no return, a point where the devilish automatic mechanisms of doom cannot be stopped anymore....

Solidarity

It is time for us to stop orienting ourselves by wishful thinking, illusions and dreams.... We must therefore show full solidarity, not merely vis-a-vis the Americans; we must be prepared, when our allies in other regions of the world take over responsibilities to safeguard security or secure freedom, prepared in Europe to replace the partial absence of these allies with regard to European security. This is why I have been speaking of a division of work....

Preparedness To Sacrifice

In our political work we must, on the one hand, avoid everything that could create fear, unrest and anxiety, because fear, unrest and anxiety are poor advisers. But we must also avoid everything that could create or support the false security of daydreams. My main reproach to the Federal Government from 1969 until this day--that pertains to Brandt as well as Schmidt and to Schmidt as much as to Brandt--is their fateful contribution to the destruction of the historic awareness of problems in Europe. Our people have very much lost the awareness of problems....

We must not ignore the appeal of history that we have received for a second time now; we must not fall asleep again, but see to it now in European solidarity and transatlantic unanimity that the bases of security and freedom in the world will be safeguarded through our contribution....

Defense Expert Woerner Speech

[Text] Bonn--CDU defense expert Manfred Woerner has called on the West to formulate a new policy toward Moscow in view of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Speaking at a CDU security congress in Bonn today, Woerner said that the conquest of Afghanistan was "a strategically decisive breakthrough and a shift in the global balance of power of unprecedented significance."

If the Soviet policy of expansion is not stopped now once and for all, other countries will soon follow and fall "like dominoes." Pakistan and Iran could be the next ones. Woerner said that the West needs to agree on a coordinated overall policy for the use of all economic, financial, technological and other levers to compel the Soviet Union to follow a policy of worldwide restraint and cooperation.

Woerner said that an expanded U.S. military presence in the Indian Ocean and the Middle East is absolutely vital. The CDU emphatically welcomes the U.S. plan to set up an intervention corps. The safeguarding of supplies of raw materials and oil must become one of NATO's central tasks. There is also a pressing need to coordinate the Eastern policy and Eastern trade policy of the NATO allies.

European agreement must also include defense. "In the long term we need a European army and the amalgamation of all European weaponry and armament efforts in a joint defense organization," Woerner noted.

Further Details

LD121202 Hamburg DPA in German 1124 GMT 12 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--Several politicians advocated a realistic policy of detente in Bonn on Saturday at the defense congress of the CDU. CDU Chancellor-Candidate Franz Josef Strauss said that a policy of detente would be all the more realistic the less it was treated like a mythical dogma.

Above all the meaning of the policy of detente should not be defined and fixed by one side alone. Concerning the intervention by Soviet troops in Afghanistan, Strauss said that this event is the result of too much of the wrong kind of policy of detente. He repeated the CDU's view that detente is indivisible. In this connection he charged Chancellor Helmut Schmidt with a superficial approach.

Earlier, CDU/CSU group disarmament expert Alois Mertes advocated a review of the policy of detente without illusions: Disarmament and arms control with undiminished security are the continued essential objectives of CDU policy.

WOERNER SAYS BUNDESWEHR BUDGET INCREASE INSUFFICIENT

[Text] Frankfurt--The CDU's defense spokesman, Manfred Woerner, has called for a broadening of NATO's tasks as a result of the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops. In an interview for the Frankfurter ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG (Friday edition) Woerner said that the safeguarding of supplies of energy and raw materials and of transport routes should become a central task of the defense alliance.

In Woerner's view, the Bundeswehr's defense budget should be increased. In view of the new assessment of Soviet policy the planned 3 percent annual increase in Bundeswehr expenditures was not sufficient. In addition, Woerner would like to see an expansion of relations with China "from the point of view of a contribution to the global balance of power." The United States should create a permanent presence in the Middle East and in the Indian Ocean together with the building up of an "intervention corps."

CONCENTRATION OF SOVIET FREIGHTERS IN HAMBURG DETAILED

[Text] Hamburg--The concentration of Soviet freighters in the port of Hamburg is currently arousing attention. Port experts confirmed on Sunday that smaller vessels (primarily between 2,000 to 3,000 GRT) from the USSR have been increasingly docking at the Hamburg port in order to take on grain. Hamburg is the second largest transshipment port for grain in Europe. However, the ships are not there to load additional grain but to take on grain brought by larger freighters from the United States. During the past few days some 23 Soviet ships have been sighted on the Lebe River. A further 46 are expected by 17 January, 23 of which are expected on Monday.

It was learned from Transnautic, the Hamburg shipping agency (51 percent Soviet capital) which is responsible for loading and maintaining Soviet vessels, that the concentration of Russian ships is nothing new but had already begun last November. Transnautic was able to convince the Soviet authorities that transshipment from large to river-navigable ships is functioning well in Hamburg. Earlier this had been done mainly in Dutch and Belgian ports.

Observers believe it possible that the Soviets have changed from the Rhine River to the Elbe River ports because of the frequency of strikes in the former. The lively activities the past few days could possibly also be connected with Soviet authorities' fear that West European dockworkers may join the boycott of Soviet ships through U.S. trade unions. Hence, as much freight as possible is to be moved beforehand.

TWO GDR BORDER GUARDS DEFECT TO WEST

FRG EXPERT ASSESSES CAPABILITIES OF PRC ARMY

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "China Is Not a Military Power"]

[Text] The U.S. secretary of defense is satisfied. So are his Chinese interlocutors. Both sides will derive benefits from the decisions that have been made. Yet the effect of this first establishment of military-strategic contacts will take its time. The events in Kabul cannot be directly influenced by this meeting. Granted, it is of significance for daily politics. It burdens the Russians psychostrategically for Beijing and Washington to draw closer together shortly after the Soviet attack against Afghanistan. Yet it will take a long time until the United States and China will be able to change Soviet behavior through a joint strategy. China is not a military power. Nor will this nation, with the greatest population figure on earth, be one before another 15 to 20 years.

The Chinese are aware of this. Zhou Enlai had always been reluctant to assess China as a world power or a great power. The incumbent government team is just as soberminded. If we analyze the military power of the Chinese we will comprehend their careful self-assessment. The array of figures is impressive. The quality which this quantity produces is low. The main armed forces of the Chinese Army comprise 120 infantry divisions and 12 armored divisions. The air force flies about 4,000 planes. The core of the naval forces consists of 80 submarines. The nuclear troops are equipped with 50 medium-range missiles and an identical number of intercontinental missiles. Including the militia units and 70 territorial divisions, the Chinese Army is estimated at a strength of 7 million soldiers.

But these uniformed masses lack nearly everything that makes an army modern. The ground forces are immobile because too little transport capacity is available. The armament is obsolete. The airplanes are hopelessly backward technically with respect to the requirements of contemporary warfare. The navy cannot take charge of any naval strategy mission; it is exclusively a weapon of coastal protection. The nuclear forces are at the beginning of their development. They are dangerous when the nuclear threshold has been crossed; they are less impressive as a deterrent force.

A Pentagon study shows what the Chinese troops would need if they wanted to develop an impact force such as the Red Army or the technical forces of the United States. The modernization would cost 40 to 50 billion. Neither the United States nor China will be in a position to make this investment. Even if U.S. assistance were to impose narrow bounds on itself and the Chinese generals raised but modest demands, the introduction of 8,000 tanks, 10,000 armored personnel carriers and thousands of antitank missiles to the mobile field army would be required.

This outline of the shortcomings shows the strategic vacuum of the military colossus China. But then, the Americans have always been optimists. They are prepared to help in the new beginning. Yet two problems will narrow down the development toward a modern army in China. The Chinese are hostile to aliens. The American advisers of Chiang Kai-shek had a hard time overcoming the distrust of the Chinese leadership. The behavior of the People's Liberation Army will not be any different. Militarily the Americans and Chinese are worlds apart. The idea of the popular war is still the central strategic idea which motivates Beijing's armies.

This attitude must not be taken as a mere continuation of a tradition. In practice, the Chinese leadership cannot even take the responsibility for planning differently. Between 20 and 30 motorized and armored Russian divisions are stationed along the Sino-Soviet border. This spearhead is being covered by 200 airplanes of the tactical air force, 300 aircraft of the operational air forces. The Russian Red Army would overrun the Chinese border troops at the very start. Deep within the combat area, however, the attackers would encounter the endlessly arrayed defense barricade of the armed nation. The People's Army and the concept of the prolonged popular war constitute China's decisive deterrent force.

Thus it will only be with care that it will be possible to take the step toward a technical army. Modernization will be possible but at a slow pace also because Chinese soldiers have little aptitude for operating modern equipment. In that respect a learning process will have to be started first. The officer corps, too, is not yet ready to advance to the 20th century. Nobody doubts the high intelligence of the Chinese. Yet intelligence also has its military side. The Chinese military bloc is not only unfinished, it is psychologically brittle. Experts on China deem it out of the question that Chinese armies could be used as expeditionary armies. Korea and Vietnam must be interpreted as partial operations of a strategic defense. Spiritually China is not a military power either. Yet it remains a significant military partner. The Chinese not only cover the strategic flanks in a Western system of security; by their undivided land mass they offer a starting position for potential (American) air raids on Siberia from Vladivostok to the Ural Mountains. These speculations alone are bound to make the Soviets think.

MARCHAIS REPORTS ON TALKS WITH NICARAGUAN LEADERS

[Unattributed report: "New Authorities in Managua Welcome Georges Marchais"]

[Text] Georges Marchais returned to Paris yesterday. Questioned on his recent visit to Nicaragua, the PCF secretary general stated among other things: "I was conscious above all of the will of the Sandinists, the government and the vast majority of the population to build a new Nicaragua. I was able to observe that the new authorities intend to put an end to poverty and to guarantee a decent life for the people as well as their participation in the country's political, economic and social life. They have decided to make a great effort to make the masses literate. The Sandinist National Liberation Front [FSLN] and the government wish to affirm Nicaragua's independence and national sovereignty and to develop international cooperation with all countries.

"I was able to appreciate their earnestness and their realism faced with the problems which confront Nicaragua." "This trip has confirmed us in the view that Nicaragua really does need major international aid, disinterested, unconditional aid, and economic cooperation to facilitate the country's reconstruction and insure its development." "I should like to underline, too, the importance of the decision taken at the end of the discussions to develop sustained and permanent relations between the PCF and the FSLN--relations of friendship, solidarity and cooperation."

Before leaving Nicaragua, Georges Marchais and Maxime Gremetz were received at government headquarters by the Junta of National Reconstruction.

The five members of the highest government authority--Sergio Ramirez, Violeta Chamorro, Alfonso Robelo, Commander Daniel Ortega and Moises Hassan--were present at the meeting.

The PCF delegation and the junta proceeded to a broad exchange of views on the country's situation and on the aid needed to raise Nicaragua from the ruins of war and 40 years of dictatorship and to reactivate a lifeless economy.

Democratic Nicaragua needs many forms of aid: food and medical, financial and material aid; long-term, low-interest loans and technical cooperation as well as personnel in different fields.

The government junta informed the PCF delegation of the inadequacy of French aid, which was largely below the level of need, of French capacity and of the aid given by other West European countries. It stressed that the French Government wanted to impose unacceptable conditions within the framework of this aid.

After revealing the course of action which the PCF pursued to force the French Government to reestablish relations and to appoint an ambassador to Managua, Georges Marchais reaffirmed the PCF's determination to pursue its action to make the French Government establish genuine cooperation with Nicaragua equal to the seriousness of the situation and commensurate with what a country like France could and should contribute.

The junta thanked Georges Marchais and Maxime Gremetz for the solidarity shown by the PCF. The PCF secretary general reaffirmed that, for French Communists, solidarity is not a matter of circumstance but a fundamental principle. He gave an assurance that the PCF would pursue its political and material solidarity effort on the basis of the results its action has already secured.

"You know," Georges Marchais stated, "that in France you can rely on loyal and dependable friends, the working people and the Communists."

At the end of the meeting, the PCF and the FSLN agreed to publish the following statement:

"During its stay in Nicaragua, the PCF delegation had discussions with the members of the FSLN national leadership, during which it expressed the desire to strengthen links with the FSLN and the Nicaraguan people.

"The two sides went on to an exchange of views on the process under way in Nicaragua and the new tasks of solidarity. The commanders of the revolution, Henry Ruiz and Bayardo Arce, explained to the PCF delegation the main features of the 1980 economic revival program and the country's socioeconomic situation.

"The PCF secretary general expressed his understanding of the problems confronting the Sandinist people's revolution. He pledged his party's solidarity and desire for cooperation, and it was agreed to strengthen relations between the FSLN and the PCF.

"In this spirit an FSLN delegation will go to France at the PCF's invitation, and another PCF delegation will visit Nicaragua at the invitation of the FSLN."

MITTERRAND CITED ON AFGHANISTAN, LEFTIST UNITY

LD142330 Paris Domestic Service in French 2200 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Speaking on French television, Francois Mitterrand has said he feels that the USSR is, for the first time, risking the appearance of being an imperialist country by its military intervention in Afghanistan. For the first secretary of the Socialist Party, one of the reasons for the split in the Union of the Left in 1977 derived from the privileged relations between the leaders of the French Communist Party and those of the Soviet Union. Francois Mitterrand called on the Communists to impose this Union of the Left on their leadership.

LE MONDE VIEWS END OF 'EUROPEAN POLICY' ON DETENTE

[Editorial: "Europe Divided"]

[Text] The Nine's experts on Asian affairs meet this Thursday, 9 January, [as published] in Rome to prepare the discussions which their foreign ministers will have in Brussels next week on Afghanistan, Iran and other trouble spots. It is customary to hope that Europe will speak with one voice in world crises which it has done, moreover, in recent years. But it is the case that, unless something dramatic happens, the matter is decided: There will be no joint European attitude on the Afghanistan question, which is to say that there is no longer a European policy on so important an issue as detente.

The Community countries have been urged by Washington to join in the reprisals against the USSR--there has indeed been an American approach, even if everyone prefers to keep quiet about it to hide the discord--but only Britain has accepted it. Mrs Thatcher has sent her foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, to encourage governments "east of Suez" to resist.

France and, to all appearances, the FRG (without saying so as explicitly as M. Francois-Poncet) have rejected the U.S. appeal.

The French Government agreed to condemn the USSR verbally at the United Nations, for example, and even raised its voice a little louder; it also agreed not to supply the USSR with goods embargoed by the Americans. But neither Paris nor the other continental capitals are planning to go beyond that.

Skepticism is the first argument advanced to justify this caution. Economic sanctions are rarely effective; rerouting trade is child's play. This has been known since Mussolini's war in Ethiopia in 1935-1936, and it took 13 years for sanctions to shake the fragile economy of the white regime in Rhodesia. What could they hope to achieve against the integrated mass of the USSR and its periphery, which form a world in themselves?

The second argument is more political. What is known of Moscow's real intentions? An abscess had formed on the supposedly vulnerable underbelly of Soviet Islam. Did the Kremlin want simply to lance that abscess--a surgically risky operation but one which would have nothing to do with East-West relations and which would not endanger detente? Or has it changed its strategy fundamentally and decided to strike at the West indirectly at one of its weak points, at the pivotal point between the oil-producing Middle East and a Southeastern Asia still ready to erupt? We should ascertain which of these hypotheses is right before radically changing the direction of East-West relations.

This, for the moment, is Giscard d'Estaing's and, it seems, Herr Schmidt's position. This is the significance of Wednesday's Council of Ministers statement asking the USSR to restore the "confidence" necessary for detente by "positive gestures," "particularly" but not only in Afghanistan. In other words, the USSR is asked to demonstrate in some tangible way, for example in Europe, its wish to continue with East-West detente.

But these good reasons--these reasonable reasons--will not stop anyone thinking that the prime motiviation for the Europeans' caution is fear; not "nuclear terror"--the Afghan affair does not alter the balance of terror on which Europe's security rests--but the constant anxiety of cold war times, the fear of being afraid, which is not a good counselor.

LE FIGARO CONTRASTS U.S., FRANCO-GERMAN APPROACH TO USSR

LD141521 Paris LE FIGARO in French 10 Jan 80 pp 1, 4 LD

[Serge Maffert article: "The Right Choice?"]

[Text] The present international crisis has given rise to two methods, two "approaches" to deal with the Soviet challenge--that of the United States and that of certain European countries, especially France and the FRG.

Following the Soviet intervention in Kabul and the consolidation of already close relations between Afghanistan and the USSR, President Carter chose to generalize the U.S. counter-action and make it "worldwide." He has responded at a worldwide level to an aggression of a local or regional nature. This has been the political equivalent of massive nuclear reprisals as distinct from a counterattack with so-called conventional arms.

The United States has recently challenged the Soviet Union in a number of spheres: the freezing of SALT, the drastic reduction of grain exports, the halting of deliveries of advanced technology, a ban on fishing in certain areas of the Pacific and so forth. Furthermore, Washington is trying to recreate round America the bloc of its traditional allies, especially Canada and European countries. Above all, Carter is deliberately playing the China card and has come to share, at least in part, Beijing's views on Soviet "social hegemonism." [paragraph continues]

The two countries will jointly adopt "appropriate measures" to contain any possible Soviet pressures in Asia. Since Japan, which has already established friendly relations with China, has loosened its relations with the USSR, the anti-Soviet front in the Far East has hardened considerably.

The future will show whether or not this counteraction is effective, but Mr Carter, who admitted that the American sanctions will not make the Soviet troops leave Afghanistan, wished mainly to make it forcefully clear that the Soviets "must go no further." This means that what the American President wanted was to prevent any similar occurrence in the future.

The trouble with any large-scale counteraction is that there is no middle course--it either achieves complete and immediate results, or if the adversary does not let himself be impressed, it fails. Assuming that the Soviet Union intends to advance more and more pawns throughout the world, it will always be able to find appropriate indirect ways to do so.

On the other hand, by transforming the Afghan crisis into a global East-West conflict the United States, which is being forced to recreate blocs similar to those which existed in the past, could well spread confusion in many countries--especially Arab and African countries--which even though prepared to condemn the USSR for its actions against Muslim Afghanistan are not prepared to enlist under the Stars and Stripes.

In short, to emphasize U.S. determination (and incidentally his own to the American electorate), Carter did not hesitate to sacrifice detente or, if you prefer, record the fact that detente no longer exists.

Franco-German views differ from U.S. views, and Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Schmidt were able to conclude yesterday that their analyses of the situation agree. They believe that even though Soviet action in Kabul is blameworthy and even though it adversely affects the policy of detente, it justifies neither a resumption of cold war nor a generalization of the crisis.

Detente--but not unconditional detente--must remain the final objective, indispensable to equilibrium and peace in Europe. Since it is essentially of a psychological nature, one of its main components--mutual trust among partners or interlocutors--should be restored. This is, for instance, what the communique published at the end of a [French] cabinet meeting states. It implies that the Soviets should withdraw their troops from Afghanistan in the near future, thus enabling--at least it is hoped--the Afghans to determine their own future.

Wishful thinking, it will be said. However, this method presents an advantage--it returns the ball to the Soviet court. It is up to the USSR to let it be known and to prove that it remains committed to detente, especially in Europe. If it refuses to give such proof, the European countries most committed to this policy will have to draw appropriate conclusions from this.

In fact, Carter has decided to use Theodore Roosevelt's "big stick". Giscard and Schmidt want to keep a carrot, in any case an argument, in store. It remains to be seen who is right. Let us hope that at least one of these "approaches" will prove effective.

ALITALIA AIRLINER HIJACKED ON FLIGHT FROM ROME TO TUNIS

NC141750 Paris AFP In English 1745 GMT 14 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Rome Jan 14 (AFP)--An Alitalia airliner with 81 passengers and five crew members on board was hijacked today on a flight from Rome to Tunis, airport sources here said. The plane had left Rome at 1520 GMT and was hijacked midway between the Italian capital and Tunis, the sources said.

The jetliner appeared to be heading toward Palermo, Sicily, after flying over the island of Malta, the sources said.

Details as to the nationality and number of hijackers were not immediately available.

Later, Rome airport sources reported that the hijacked airliner landed at the Palermo airport at 1750 GMT. At least two hijackers were reportedly on board, one of whom addressed the Palermo control tower in French.

At Palermo, the plane was immediately surrounded by Italian military armoured vehicles, informed sources at Rome airport said.

The sources added that the hijackers had planned to divert the twin-engined DC-9 jet to Tripoli, Libya, but were prevented by a sandstorm there. Also, Maltese authorities refused it permission to land on the island for a refuelling stop. Reports from Valletta said that one of the hijackers was a Tunisian and that authorities there closed the airport.

The Rome airport sources said there were 83 passengers (including two children) and five crew on the aircraft. Palermo airport was also closed to all traffic after the plane landed there.

Later reports said that the (?man in contact) with Palermo airport officials was demanding that the plane be refuelled and the pilot be given a flight plan for Tripoli in exchange for the release of the passengers, who were 23 Italians and 60 North Africans. Palermo officials believed that there was only one hijacker as the man made no reference to any companions.

Because of the sandstorm at Tripoli, clearance for the plane to go there was refused and the hijacker subsequently demanded that a journalist--French-or English-speaking--be allowed on the plane to help write out a communique. According to Palermo reports, the hijacker at no time indicated that he belonged to a political organisation.

Police sources said the hijackers were demanding the release of 25 Tunisian political prisoners. In exchange, they would free all but Tunisian passengers on board the plane, the sources said. They added that there were two hijackers on board the DC-9.

Unconfirmed reports said the hijackers intended to fly to Tunis to pick up the prisoners before going on to Tripoli, where they would release the Tunisian passengers.

Further Report on Hijacking

LD142323 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2200 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] The Alitalia DC-9 flying from Rome to Tunis hijacked this afternoon by two air pirates is still at Palermo airport. The spokesman for the hijackers has asked that radio contact be kept through the control tower with a journalist capable of speaking French. Franco Contana of Rome Radio's Palermo office volunteered, and we contacted him a short while ago. Here is the recording. [begin recording]

[Question] Franco Fontana of Rome Radio's Palermo office, you have spoken with the hijackers by radio, have you not?

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] What did they say to you? What conditions have they laid down?

[Answer] The conditions are these: If the Italian authorities do not prevent the takeoff of the aircraft, no harm will be done to anyone. At present there are 84 or 85 people on board, of whom 13 are women and 7 are children. We do not know their nationalities in detail--that is to say, we do not know how many are Italians and how many are other nationalities.

The situation at present is this: The aircraft is stationary and waiting for supplies. The conditions of the hijackers are these: They want 25 political prisoners now in prison in Tunis to be released. They declare themselves to be neither terrorists nor brigands, but they say they belong--and they reiterated this point--to a renovating political group that wants justice and equality. Their name is "Les Vivants," the living.

[Question] What nationality are they?

[Answer] Tunisians. [passage indistinct]

[Question] What is the name of the chief hijacker?

[Answer] He hasn't said. He doesn't want to give his name. He speaks as a member of this party "Les Vivants"--the living. The only dramatic thing to occur now is the fact that an attempt will be made to reach an agreement and deliver food and water. There will be a flashing of lights which will give the OK, and a double flashing of lights meaning "do not come near."

[Question] Well, Fontana, I thank you.

[Answer] Wait a moment. At this moment an aircraft is circling towards the land whereas, earlier, the airport was closed to traffic. At this moment I can hear an aircraft arriving. One moment.

[Question] It is probably the aircraft from Rome that is bringing a reserve crew.

[Answer] I understand. Probably it is that aircraft. [end recording]

[Announcer] And in fact, it was another DC-9 that took off about an hour ago from Fiumicino and landed while we were recording this conversation with our colleague Fontana. On board this aircraft are two aircraft captains, the head of Alitalia's operational services and the Alitalia press office, plus a reserve crew for the hijacked aircraft. The Italian passengers, we remind you, according to news agency reports, number 21. The others are reportedly all North Africans in transit from Fiumicino to Tunis.

Hijacker Surrenders, Passengers Safe

[Text] Palermo, Sicily, Jan 15, REUTER--A lone Tunisian gunman who hijacked an Alitalia airliner on a flight from Rome to Tunis surrendered to police at Palermo airport today and all passengers and crew left the plane unharmed, an Alitalia spokesman said.

The DC-9 airliner had been carrying 83 passengers and six crew members when it was commandeered over the Mediterranean yesterday afternoon. But late last night, 13 women and seven children were released without conditions. Earlier reports had stated that two gunmen were aboard the plane, but the Alitalia spokesman said it now appeared that only one hijacker was involved.

Negotiations for the release of the passengers and crew in the first hijack of 1980 were being directed by telephone from Rome by Italian Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni. Airport authorities later confirmed that only one hijacker had been responsible for the incident, but they refused to name him or to give other details.

The hijacker agreed to give himself up after a long radio conversation with an Italian Foreign Ministry representative, the authorities said. It was not known if any promise had been made to him to persuade him to end the hijack.

All the passengers were said to be in good health and to be staying overnight in a Palermo hotel. Alitalia said it was sending another plane to Sicily, and the passengers were expected to complete their journey to Tunis later this morning.

ITALIAN WORKERS START GENERAL STRIKE 15 JAN

[Text] Rome, January 15 (ANSA)--Millions of workers from all sectors of Italian economic life downed tools today for a general strike designed to pressure the government to take more active measures to contain the present economic [word indistinct] crisis.

The strike was called by the country's three major labor centrals, the CGIL [Italian General Confederation of Labor], the CISL [Italian Confederation of Workers Unions], and the UIL [Italian Union of Labor], whose leaders told a recent press conference that their moves might also include pushing for the ouster of the present government if no action is taken on their platform of demands.

The incumbent coalition led by Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga is a minority partnership of his own Christian Democrats, the Social Democrats, and the right-of-center Liberals. It survives thanks to the crucial abstention of the Socialists.

Writing for the Italian Communist Party daily L'UNITA yesterday, CGIL [words indistinct] Luciano Lama charged that there had been no hint of government action against inflation, unemployment in the backward south, or in favor of troubled companies. In particular, the leader of what is by far the largest union organization in the country pointed out that government measures to increase a series of tariffs and the total liberalization of many prices were in fact stoking inflation.

According to Lama, the only remedy offered by the Cabinet was "as usual", the "sterilization" of the automatic adjustment of workers' wages to offset the cost of living.

Lama added that, in the view of organized labor, the only way to face up to "such difficult and heavy problems" was to set up a "strong and representative political leadership". This would replace the present minority government "which has been reduced to adopting government decrees [words indistinct] they are not legitimate... since it fears parliamentary defeat on each of its proposals".

According to Lama, the union's step of urging a "political leadership of national solidarity" was "unusual", but justified by the "exceptional, emergency situation that so many [passage indistinct].

L'UNITA REPORTS 'FRANK' PCI-PCF TALKS ON INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

LD141449 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 6 Jan 80 p 1 LD

[Unattributed report: "Berlinguer-Marchais Talks"]

[Text] Rome--Comrades Georges Marchais and Enrico Berlinguer [respectively PCF, PCI secretaries general] met in Rome yesterday, within the framework of periodic PCI-PCF consultations. The meeting was attended by comrades Maxime Gremetz [of the PCF] and Gian Carlo Pajetta, Paolo Bufalini and Rodolfo Mechini [of the PCI].

During the conversations, which took place in a friendly atmosphere, a communique states, there was a broad and frank exchange of opinions on the situation in both countries, on the crisis and in particular on its consequences in the West European capitalist countries, and on the struggles and unitary initiatives of the working class in these countries.

The two delegations examined the developments in the international situation and both parties' efforts to defend peace and to further detente and arms reduction, and they agreed to increase their efforts to contribute to the broadest possible action by all forces willing to act for these ends. The two delegations examined the prospects for cooperation between the European workers and democratic movement and the developing countries' progressive forces in building a new international economic order.

The PCI and PCF, the communique concludes, agreed to develop their close cooperation.

MADRID REPORTS COMMUNIQUE ON SUAREZ' WASHINGTON VISIT

LD150154 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

["Final communique" issued on the 1-day visit to Washington of Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez on 14 January]

[Text] President Carter today had talks with Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez. The two leaders had a working lunch in the Cabinet assembly room with top officials of the two governments.

The President and the prime minister noted with satisfaction the close relations between their two countries. They debated a series of international topics of special interest to both of them, including the crises in Iran and Afghanistan, the situation in the Middle East, Latin America and the Caribbean and Spanish-American cooperation on questions of Western security.

President Carter, after congratulating the Spanish prime minister for his vigorous leadership in the evolution of Spanish democracy, expressed his thanks and those of all the American people for Spain's support for the international effort to secure the release the hostages unharmed.

The two leaders exchanged views on the Soviet armed invasion and occupation of Afghanistan, the communique continues. They agreed that this Soviet action, in flagrant violation of the UN Charter, is a very serious threat to international peace. In condemning the Soviet aggression, the President and the prime minister agreed on the need to strengthen Western security and express it in concrete measures that will make the USSR see the consequences of its behavior.

During their talks on other points of common interest to the two governments, President Carter expressed his admiration for the Spanish prime minister's profound knowledge based on his contacts and historic experience in the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America. The President was pleased to hear the constructive proposals that the prime minister made in connection with these regions of the world, and he agreed that it would be useful to intensify Spanish-American consultations so the two countries can work for peace and stability in these regions.

Radio Commentary

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] Without doubt, the story of the day is, the Spanish prime minister's unexpected trip to the United States--a trip which has caught the public by surprise and has also surprised even more those, who because of either a Platonic vocation or their unavoidable political duty, daily follow the ups and downs of the outside world and the diplomatic activities of the Madrid government. The strange thing is that this visit by Prime Minister Suarez, which observers are saying is unexpected, is not at all an unforeseen visit. The trip to Washington was planned.

It was postponed and, within a context of a great coming and going of changing circumstances, was planned on the basis of that strange calendar without dates which politicians almost always have to use. This is the calendar of the immediate reality, which is dictated by events which involve a risk and which need to be tackled with strict punctuality.

Prime Minister Suarez will have wide ranging talks today with President Carter. The backdrop is the international situation, the problems in the Middle East, the conflicts of Afghanistan, Iran and a lot more which will emerge naturally during a mutually frank dialog.

It is too soon to analyze an event, whose (?content) we do not know. But it is not too soon to say that on this occasion bilateral problems can remain in the background. On the other hand, it is most likely that the questions which will be given most attention will deal with a large area of the globe and will have manifold implications. All this leads us to consider the need to distinguish right now between exclusively Spanish interests and those of the United States, and what affects the two countries on the level of international solidarity and, more specifically, in the area of the common defense of the free world. Spain continues to believe in the possibility of political solutions; the means for negotiation have not been exhausted and agreement is still possible. Prime Minister Suarez' trip is consequently in the service of peace.

USSR REPORTEDLY USING CANARY ISLANDS AS SUPPORT BASE

ID150108 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 14 Jan 80 ID

[Text] Ships of Soviet registration carrying troops are using Puerto de la Luz in Gran Canarias, the DIARIO DE LAS PALMAS says today in a long report. According to this paper, last week the Shota Rustaveli was in Puerto de la Luz. It carried 746 Cuban soldiers returning to Havana from Ethiopia. Diplomatic circles consulted by the DIARIO DE LAS PALMAS expressed their concern at the possible use of the Canaries as a Soviet base. The paper adds, quoting foreign diplomatic sources, that the Canaries are being used by the Soviets as a support base for their strategic activities in Africa. The same sources said the Canaries' ports, particularly Puerto de la Luz, in practice serve as logistical support basis for Soviet ships, which, while specializing in nonmilitary areas, in fact cover operations directly connected with Moscow's strategic deployment in the neighboring African Continent. In short, these are very serious accusations.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES ENERGY SAVING, RELATED MEASURES

ID141231 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 9 Jan 80 p 33 ID

[Unattributed report: "Government To Invest 300 Billion Pesetas To Reduce Energy Dependence on Imported Crude"]

[Text] The government yesterday announced a 300 billion peseta public investments program in the energy field, whose aim will be to reduce the economy's dependence on imported crude. These investments will include the earmarking of 97 billion pesetas for several nuclear programs, including the imminent authorization by the relevant body--the Nuclear Safety Council--of two new nuclear powerplants (Vandellos II and Sagayo) and the speeding up of work on those already authorized. The government, which Monday announced an overall rise in the prices of oil-based products, also disclosed its intention to mitigate the effects of this by, among other measures, reducing the tax rate on spare parts for cars to 10 percent and abolishing the tax on the ownership and use of vehicles.

Deputy Premier for Economic Affairs Fernando Abril and Minister of Industry and Energy Carlos Bustelo explained the recent rise in fuel prices at a press conference at the Monoloa Palace yesterday. They argued that the announced increases were necessitated by the latest increases in the prices of crude on the part of the principal oil-exporting countries. Fernando Abril acknowledged that the latest decisions will force the government to undertake "a short-term readjustment" and stated that the increases in energy prices will have an additional effect on the consumer price index, which measures the rate of inflation in the economy, totaling about 2.5 percent in 1980. The deputy premier specified that 1-15 percent of this effect will be direct and immediate and the remainder indirect and over a 4-6 month period.

Policy of Clear Accounts

In his explanation of the increases in the prices of oil-based products, the deputy premier admitted the "unpopular nature of the announced measures," but stated that the government, "although aware of their unpopularity," is forced to present "clear accounts to the Spanish people" and obliged to conduct a "coherent economic policy," which makes it necessary to pass on firmly to the consumer the greater costs of imported energy.

Fernando Abril, who stated that the government also intends to increase electricity charges (according to other sources, possibly by 20 percent within a week), described the Spanish economy as dependent at the rate of 67 percent on imported crude for meeting all its energy requirements. He added that currently, as a result of "grave mistakes made previously by the government in assessing the extent of the energy crisis," Spain is in a particularly vulnerable situation.

Precisely in order to counteract this vulnerability within a relatively brief space of time, the minister of industry announced a detailed program of public investments and projects in the energy field, which, although the minister did not explain this, could be described as an "energy independence plan" very similar in its philosophy to the partly failed plan announced in 1974 by the United States. The minister of industry stated that the aim of this program, which includes public investments totaling almost 300 billion pesetas over the next 2 years, will be to reduce dependence on oil to 50 percent of our energy requirements before 1984.

Before proceeding to explain the program of government investments and projects in detail, Carlos Bustelo outlined the recent history of the situation in the world crude market and the impact which this will have on the Spanish economy. As has been traditional in the government's philosophy since last July, when another major increase in the prices of oil-based energy products was announced, both Bustelo and Fernando Abril explained the need to establish a "new, more rational price structure" on the basis of this new international situation in the oil market, and explained that the government's philosophy continues to be based in its intention to pass on increases in the cost of crude to the consumer.

In this connection, Carlos Bustelo stated that the 1980 oil bill will exceed $11 billion, and said that this is over double what was paid in 1978. He stated that the government's estimates for determining the new prices of oil products were based on a minimum price of oil per barrel of about $27.50, and expressed the government's hope that this minimum price will be held for the first 4 months of this year. These forecasts, which some experts deem overoptimistic, were based on the long-term contracts which the government or Spanish private enterprises have signed for 1980 and those recently signed, which the minister of industry described as "really favorable."

With respect to supplies, Bustelo stated that we currently have stockpiles and reserves of oil and refined products for over 112 days (2 weeks more than at the same time last year); he added that the firm contracts for 1980 negotiated by the government or by the concessionary enterprises are estimated at 41 million tons, which is equivalent to about 80 percent of oil requirements for the year.

In this connection the minister of industry stated that "Spain can pay its bill in terms of foreign exchange, but it will also be necessary to pay it in real terms and with a fair distribution of the costs throughout Spanish society." In this connection, Abril Matrorell stated that the formula found by the government for this fair distribution is a linear increase in prices, with slight adjustments to subsidy schemes and some mass consumption products, such as butane cylinders (retention of a 100-peseta subsidy).

The deputy premier rejected allegations that the increases included alterations to the tax system approved by parliament, and said: "The government has made no profit on the new prices, although they will not cost the treasury a single cent either."

In all events, Deputy Premier Abril ruled out the possibility of gasoline rationing in stating that "there is no cause to contemplate rationing at present."

[Text] Madrid, January 11 (TANJUG)--The final communique on the talks held in Sofia between Bulgarian Communist Party First Secretary Todor Zhivkov and Communist Party of Spain Secretary General Santiago Carrillo says they urged a policy of detente on the world, but makes no mention of the recent Soviet military action in Afghanistan. After returning from a five-day visit to Sofia at the invitation of Zhivkov, Carrillo announced yesterday evening, however, that he had, in his talks with his host, "clearly and openly stated the stand of the Spanish Communist Party on topical international events". In other words, Carrillo informed Zhivkov about the Spanish Communists' stand on the action in Afghanistan. The Spanish Communist Party energetically condemned the intervention, stressing in an Executive Committee announcement that this is not only a violation of the principles of sovereignty and independence, but an attack on world peace.

GOVERNMENT LEANS TOWARD BOYCOTT OF MOSCOW OLYMPICS

[By David Healy, PA political staff writer]

[Text] The government is moving towards calling for a boycott of the Moscow Olympics as part of a tough response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

No firm decision has yet been taken--this will depend on how much support is given by European and other allies, and possibly Third World countries who have already condemned the Soviet moves. The question of an Olympic boycott will be raised at two important meetings in Brussels tomorrow--the Common Market foreign ministers and the NATO Council.

The government is also painfully aware that it cannot prevent British athletes taking part in the Olympic Games, but can only apply strong pressure--pressure which was resisted by the rugby union authorities, who are going ahead with their tour of South Africa in the face of government opposition.

The front runners in calling for an Olympic boycott are the Americans, and the question was discussed by Mrs Thatcher today in a short meeting with Mr Warren Christopher, the U.S. deputy secretary of state, at Downing Street.

And in the Commons, Foreign Office Minister of State Douglas Hurd spoke of the consideration being given by the government to calling (?for an) Olympic boycott. He admitted that a final decision on a boycott, or moving the venue of the games from Moscow, was not a matter for governments in the free world. They could only advise. But he said the argument that politics should be kept out of sport was "a little too glib". There was no doubt that holding the Olympic in Moscow would be a major political event" for the Russians.

It was clear in Whitehall tonight that the government's stand on the issue is hardening in favour of a call for athletes to boycott Moscow, especially if the United States does so. But ministers are also anxious not to make an "empty gesture"--by calling for the boycott only to have it ignored by other countries, or even by British athletes themselves.

If, however, support for the call is forthcoming at the two Brussels meetings tomorrow, then the government is likely to come out in the open.

COUNCIL OFFICE IN KABUL CLOSED; CHRISTOPHER HOLDS TALKS

LD141446 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1335 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The British Council's office in Kabul was closed at the weekend in response to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the Foreign Office announced today.

Britain's ambassador was recalled on Friday for consultations, and UK aid to the country has already been suspended in retaliation over the Soviet intervention.

Five staff in the council's office teaching English to Afghans are now being found jobs elsewhere.

U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Mr Warren Christopher had talks this morning lasting two hours with Foreign Office Minister of State Mr Douglas Hurd.

They discussed Afghanistan and Iran in the light of the Soviet veto in the UN Security Council last night on sanctions against Iran for holding the hostages at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Both Mr Hurd and Mr Christopher fly to Brussels tomorrow for a NATO Council meeting to discuss the overall West's response to the Russian invasion.

Mr Christopher also had a brief preliminary meeting at Downing Street this morning with Mrs Thatcher before the detailed discussions at the Foreign Office.

He was later flying to Rome and his whistle-stop European tour will also include Bonn and Paris.

Mr Hurd was due to make a statement on Afghanistan in the Commons later this afternoon. It will be a situation report and was not expected to announce any further major action by Britain against Russia.

Government sources stress Britain is anxious to act in co-ordination with her European and NATO allies in any retaliatory measures.

Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour flew to Brussels today for an EEC Council of Foreign Ministers meeting tomorrow, when Afghanistan will be discussed.

Mr Hurd leaves Britain later this month to visit Bahrain, Qatar, and the United Arab Emirates.

The trip had been under consideration for some time, but it is now being billed in the Foreign Office as "a follow up" to Lord Carrington's present mission to the Middle East, Pakistan and India in the aftermath of the Afghanistan crisis.

KIPRIANOU ANNOUNCES MEASURES FOR RAPPROCHEMENT

NC141447 Nicosia Public Information Office in English 14 Jan 80 NC

[Text of 14 January statement by Cyprus President Spiros Kiprianou]

[Text] The Cyprus Government, in its desire to put into effect its declared policy for a sincere understanding with the Turkish Cypriots and to create the necessary climate of mutual trust between the two communities, has decided to announce concrete measures which will help the Turkish Cypriot masses and contribute to a rapprochement between the two communities which is an essential prerequisite to the finding of a peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem.

These measures are the first of a series of measures to follow, and I express the conviction that the Turkish Cypriot leadership will respond positively and constructively so as to create the right climate for the restoration of peace on our island. The measures are the following:

A) Immediate implementation of my statement about payment of old-age pensions to eligible Turkish Cypriots out of the social insurance fund and, generally, about reintegration of eligible Turkish Cypriots into the social insurance scheme.

B) Arrangements will be made to pay Turkish Cypriot workers their dues out of contributory provident funds.

C) Employment of Turkish Cypriot workers in the construction industry and other sectors in the free area.

D) Fostering of contacts between Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot organisations (scientific, professional, cultural, trade union, athletic, political, etc.), for exchanges of views and discussions on problems and matters of common interest and promotion of a climate of mutual trust.

E) Attendance of Turkish Cypriots at the Higher Technical Institute, the Hotel and Catering Institute, the Cyprus Forestry College, the English School and any other international higher educational institutions.

Beyond the above concrete and practical measures for Turkish Cypriots, the government is thoroughly studying the whole matter for the taking of all necessary measures in the internal front, which will create the necessary foundation and will help the implementation and utilisation of the policy of rapprochement with the Turkish Cypriots, a policy positively promoting understanding and efforts for a peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem for the benefit of the Cypriot people as a whole, Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots.

Our firm policy is for the dialogue and, therefore, we believe that the negotiations process is the means for the finding of a peaceful and just solution based on biregional federation--as provided in the 1977 proposals of the late President Archbishop Makarios which are still valid--which will promote the interests and cooperation between the two communities and will safeguard the unity of the country. To this end, I call on the Turkish Cypriot leadership to come to the talks, under the auspices of the UN secretary-general, on the basis of the May 19, 1979 agreement and in a spirit of sincerity and understanding so that we may build the future of Cyprus together, as citizens of the same state.

DENKTAS REPLIES TO AKEL STATEMENT ON CYPRUS PROBLEM

TA111421 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 11 Jan 80 TA

[Text] President Denktas has said that bridging the gap between the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities could only be possible if the Greek Cypriots understand the reasons of the Turkish Cypriot community on security and accept the establishment of a basis which would prevent the repetition of the acts of the years between 1963 and 1974.

President Denktas was commenting this morning on a speech by the secretary general of the Greek Cypriot communist party, AKEL, Mr Papaioannou, at the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives. In his speech Mr Papaioannou defended the view that the Cyprus problem could be solved through the framework of the Denktas-Makarios and Denktas-Kiprianou agreements with the abolition of the guarantee agreements. He also claimed that a Greek Cypriot approach to the Turkish community was very important.

President Denktas stressed that the views put forward by Mr Papaioannou were a repetition of the principles laid out in the notorious Akritas Plan. He added that with this speech, Mr Papaioannou had repeated that his party was still favoring the principles of the Akritas Plan. President Denktas said that these views overshadowed the principle that the Cyprus problem could be solved within the framework of the Denktas-Makarios, Denktas-Kiprianou and United Nations resolutions because these principles always depended on the existence of Turkish guarantee. He stated that if this guarantee was done away with it would be easy for the Greek Cypriots to destroy the independence of Cyprus.

President Denktas repeated that all the resolutions adopted at international forums where the Turkish Cypriot community was not represented were invalid. He pointed out that the [words indistinct] Papaioannou that an approach to the Turkish Cypriot community was very important with the realization which happened 16 years too late. He said that there was an inconsistency in the views expressed by Mr Papaioannou because, while he was speaking of the importance of an approach to the Turkish Cypriot community, he was asking for the abolition of the [word indistinct] guarantee which was the only security of the Turkish Cypriot community's existence. He added that the distortion by the Greek Cypriots of the agreement for the exchange of population, which was for the purpose of preventing of the acts between the years 1963 and 1974, could only give false hope to the Greek Cypriot community.

President Denktas reiterated that a situation where the two communities could live side by side in peace could only be created if the Greek Cypriots respected the founder partnership rights of the Turkish Cypriot community in the independence and sovereignty of Cyprus. He said that an approach to the Turkish Cypriot community was possible only through the Greek Cypriots giving up the guise of being the Government of Cyprus and putting an end to their attacks against the Turkish Cypriot community at international forums, discontinuing their economic embargo and giving the Turkish Cypriot community its share of the international aid extended to Cyprus.

Replying to a question on reports of a possible Greek Cypriot recourse to the United Nations on the reopening of the Varosha hotels, President Denktas said that this was a two-sided issue because there were Turkish Cypriot hotels in the south which the Greek Cypriots were operating. He stressed that the Turkish Cypriot community could put to the same use the Greek Cypriot property in the north as the Greek Cypriots were doing to the Turkish Cypriot property in the south.

VOTCP SCORES 'COOPERATION' BETWEEN U.S., PRC

[Unattributed commentary from the "Panorama of the Week" program]

[Text] The more the imperialists lose their positions, the fiercer their stand becomes against peace, socialism and all humanity. The sound of war drums beaten by the Pentagon and NATO in our region and the world has reached alarming proportions because of their aggressive preparations against Iran. Hoping to realize their hegemonist plans, the U.S. imperialists have pursued close cooperation with the Maoist PRC Government. The decision taken during the visit of U.S. Minister of War [as heard] Brown to Beijing to jointly wage an aggressive and provocative struggle against the Soviet Union, socialism, national liberation movements and the process of detente are proof of the treacherous alliance between imperialism and Maoism. This so-called cooperation--which in fact is based on the interference in the internal affairs of other countries--is being demonstrated in the intensified attacks against the Afghan revolution which has reached a new stage.

Beijing has undertaken the arming of the Afghan counterrevolutionaries being trained in Pakistan while Washington is supplying clothing and other commodities. As pointed out in the statement by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee dated 6 January, the United States is trying to form new military blocs in our region attempting to strengthen its positions. The Washington STAR reports that the United States has intensified its efforts in order to form a military bloc among Turkey, Pakistan, Oman, Saudi Arabia, Israel and Egypt. It adds that efforts are being made for the signing of new slavery agreements with Sudan and Morocco with the intention of forming new sea and air bases in these countries.

In order to facilitate the materialization of all of these plans, the imperialist forces have engaged in an anti-Soviet campaign in addition to the one initiated regarding events in Afghanistan. As the Istanbul daily CUMHURIYET points out, a slander campaign is being waged in certain countries, including Turkey, under the pretext of these events in Afghanistan to serve the hegemonist and unpeaceful aims of the United States. The U.S. imperialists--who have grossly interfered in the internal affairs of various countries, including Chile--are now posing as the defenders of the independence and freedom of humanity.

Regional and global peace have been seriously threatened because of these aggressive imperialist plans. Despite this situation, the Soviet Union is following a persistent policy of peace, waging a decisive struggle against nuclear weapons, asking for bilateral disarmament of military blocs, opposing the growing imperialist threats against Iran and supporting the Afghan revolution, as well as the national liberation movements of mankind against imperialism, reactionism, racism and fascism. The Soviet Union and the socialist countries are the main defenders of peace and security.

It is a historic task to reinforce solidarity with the Soviet Union--the bastion of peace--in order to quiet the war drums and to strengthen peace and security. There can be no other (?alternative) to this issue.

DEMIREL, ECEVIT DISCUSS DOMESTIC PROBLEMS, WILL MEET AGAIN

TA121818 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Prime Minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel and RPP leader Bulent Ecevit met today and discussed the country's important problems. The meeting, which was held upon Demirel's request, began at 1100 and lasted for 3 hours. The meeting was held at Ecevit's office at the parliament. In a statement after the meeting, Ecevit said that they had discussed in detail the country's problems which have reached great dimensions. He said:

[Begin Ecevit recording] We believe that the great majority of the Turkish nation is gradually coming to favor the extensive and widespread cooperation between the two big parties in light of the problems and crises in Turkey. The RPP also feels this necessity. However, the two parties have different views on the extent of this cooperation. As the honorable Suleyman Demirel, prime minister and Justice Party leader, stated earlier, he does not think it is right to seek cooperation within the framework of a government. He does not feel it is necessary or beneficial to dwell upon the possibility of cooperation in the form of a government partnership between the two parties. Therefore, I did not have any approach other than the views I previously explained to the press and the public because honorable Suleyman Demirel did not feel the necessity for such a thing. We, therefore, did not discuss that issue. [end recording]

Ecevit said that they had also discussed economic issues and international developments but that they had mainly emphasized the struggle against anarchy and terror. He added that Demirel had asked for his opinion on the various measures the government was considering. Ecevit continued:

[Begin Ecevit recording] We believe that terror cannot be prevented by various legal measures alone, although these legal measures might be necessary. The RPP government also felt this necessity. We believe that the approach and position to be adopted by the government, its diagnosis of terror, the way in which a government is formed and whether or not the reason for its establishment is sufficient, should be taken up as a whole. We cannot isolate the measures from the problem as a whole and the position to be taken in dealing with the problem. I said that, in spite of this, if the RPP views on the various measures are solicited we are willing to express them. Honorable Demirel requested our views on various issues. I stated that the RPP would be happy to reach an agreement but that, if not, it would continue to perform its duty as the opposition in a constructive and responsible manner--proved especially in recent months--and without increasing tension. I also said that it is clear that the RPP is not guilty of obstructive behavior. However, I also said that this problem cannot be solved with various legal measures. I also expressed my concern about the formation of the government and its approach to the problem. [end recording]

Noting that Demirel and he had decided to continue their meetings, Ecevit concluded by saying that he will report to the various authorized organs of his party on the issues discussed.

In a statement after the meeting, Prime Minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel said that, given the current situation in Turkey, he had asked Ecevit to cooperate with and help the government. He said:

[Begin Demirel recording] I emphasized the authority crisis and the necessity for restoring the state's democratic authority. I expressed the belief that the state security forces should become a deterrent force. Blood is still being shed. Therefore, all measures should be adopted without wasting time. Everyone should take a stand against anarchy, everyone should lend moral support to the security forces, which are willingly and heartily combating anarchy. The unfinished laws should be completed. This is my belief and I expressed it. As you know, some of these bills are on the parliamentary agenda. We are going to submit various new bills. Meanwhile, I emphasized the necessity for a state of emergency [law] which might be resorted to: something in between the normal state of affairs and martial law, in order to avoid a recourse to martial law each time. A constitutional amendment is necessary for a state of emergency. I also emphasized the establishment of state security courts in accordance with article 136 of our Constitution. I asked for honorable Ecevit's views on these and other issues. I hope that the assemblies will not have great difficulties in enacting the bills that have been submitted. I also hope that the RPP will view the new bills with understanding. We have to discuss the state of emergency issue. We have not reached an agreement on the state security courts, at least for the time being. Honorable Ecevit and I have agreed in principle on cooperation to solve various problems--the country's grave problems--to save Turkey from the current situation. [end recording]

Demirel said that he had decided to meet with Ecevit periodically but that it would be wrong to say that all had been solved as a result of this meeting. He said:

[Begin Demirel recording] There is a government in the country. The opposition is a prerequisite of a multiparty system. Of course, the government administers the country and the opposition has supervisory duties. It is out of the question for the government and the opposition to unite within the administration of a country--such a thing cannot even be asked. This is considered a deviation from the system. However, there are certain important issues, issues of national importance. When these issues gain national importance the government and the opposition, keeping their respective positions, form a kind of unity. Anarchy in Turkey is such an issue. It necessitates unity. I sought this unity. I consider it my duty to seek such a unity to benefit the country. I am determined to seek and preserve unity regarding anarchy, not only with the RPP but with all the parties represented in the parliament and with all the parliamentarians. I believe that such a unity will be beneficial. I hope I shall be successful. [end recording]

BRIEFS

WORKERS SENT ABROAD--In the first 9 months of 1979, over 17,000 workers were sent to foreign countries by the Labor Exchange Office. Saudi Arabia and Libya are the leading foreign countries Turkish workers were sent to. About 4,700 workers were sent to Libya and 4,800 to Saudi Arabia. From 1966 until the end of the first half of 1979, Federal Germany has received around 520,000 Turkish workers, France 56,000, Austria 34,000, Libya 29,000, Holland 20,000, Saudi Arabia 17,000, Switzerland 8,000, Australia 8,000 and England 3,000. Foreign exchange earnings sent home by Turkish workers employed abroad totalled $1.5 billion in the first 10 months of 1979, an increase of 90 percent over the comparable figure for the same period in 1978. The rise was due in part to the premiums paid on foreign currencies changed or deposited in Turkish banks by workers. [Text] [Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1435 GMT 9 Jan 80 TA]

EEC, NATO REVIEW ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH USSR 15 JAN

LD141638 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 14 Jan 80

[Text] Tomorrow the EEC Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs and the NATO Council will review in Brussels the whole range of their political and economic relations with the Soviet bloc. The objective of this review is to define a joint position with regard to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The meeting of the NATO Council is being held at the initiative of the United States, Great Britain and Canada. These three countries are the only ones up to now to have decided on sanctions against Moscow. In fact, neither France nor the FRG appear disposed to using the economic sanctions weapon.

Several members of the Atlantic alliance are worried by the American haste in the matter. Within the EEC, on the other hand, the ministers of foreign affairs are divided, concerning whether or not to maintain the de facto embargo of European cereal sales to the USSR decided last Friday by the EEC Commission.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON IMPLICATIONS OF TITO'S ILLNESS

AU151441 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1114 GMT 15 Jan 80 AU

[Johannes Fischer report on Chancellor Kreisky's press conference in Vienna after the 15 January Cabinet meeting--portions recorded]

[Summary] The illness of Yugoslav state and party chief Tito has brought some irritation and worries for neutral Austria and its government, although Chancellor Kreisky attempted to emphasize the stability of our neighbor country even in the event of Tito's death.

[Begin Kreisky recording] Actually it is not customary for a member of the government to comment on the course that events might take in another country in the event of the demise of one or another politicians. Let me merely repeat what I have been saying for years--namely, that I am firmly convinced that in our neighbor country of Yugoslavia there is such a high degree of political and military stability that it is prepared for any development. That is my conviction. The integral forces in our neighbor country are strong enough not to give any cause for nervousness. [end recording]

Nevertheless, Tito's illness seems to be causing the government some problems. Chancellor Kreisky planned to depart for a 2-week trip starting on 23 January to the Far East that was to include India, Malaysia and Saudi Arabia. In the Cabinet it is now being discussed whether the chancellor should go ahead with the trip at all. Considering that in the event of an emergency it would take him at least 16-18 hours to return, which might be too long an absence for the government chief. Asked whether he was worried about Austria's situation, Kreisky replied:

[Begin Kreisky recording] I am worried over the general world situation, but I am not worried specifically as far as our own situation is concerned. Central Europe is a highly sensitive spot in world politics. Anything that might happen in Central Europe is such a danger to world peace--that has always been so, hasn't it?--that it must be realized that anyone who would try something here would sooner or later risk a development that actually no one wants to risk. [end recording]

ROESCH INTERVIEWED ON YUGOSLAVIA, USSR TRIP

AU152001 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 15 Jan 80 pp 1, 4 AU

[Georg Possanner report on an interview with Defense Minister Otto Roesch in Vienna on 14 January]

[Excerpt] In an exclusive interview granted to DIE PRESSE yesterday, Defense Minister Roesch declared that he ruled out the possibility that military intervention in Yugoslavia would follow the Afghanistan pattern. Accordingly, he adds, no danger for Austria results from the situation existing in our southeastern neighbor. Nevertheless, a "Yugoslavia case" is included in the Austrian defense concept, and appropriate preparations have been made since the early 1960's. This was stated by the defense minister in his first information talk since his official visit to the Soviet Union at the end of 1979.

Even in the unlikely event that there might be a military action by Moscow following a change in the top Yugoslav leadership, there are "simpler solutions than the road through Austria," Roesch declared. Reports about Soviet troop reinforcements in the CSSR are not true, he said. At the same time, he confirmed that during his USSR visit he did not hear any absolute "no" to Austrian wishes regarding missile armament. However, there was no concrete decision in the positive sense, either, he added.

In his talk with DIE PRESSE, the defense minister expressly stressed that the situation in Yugoslavia does not constitute any threat to Austria. At any rate, the assertion of People's Party defense spokesman Ermacora that the defense concept failed to take the "Yugoslavia case" into consideration is unfounded, and obviously due to a lack of information.

Preparations have been made since the 1960's, Roesch said, but refused to give any concrete details about the measures that have been taken. But, as far as the protection of the sovereignty and neutrality of Austrian airspace is concerned, he said, "we are capable of countermeasures only to a limited degree."

At any rate, he believes that the Austrian Army would be capable of disarming and interning any Yugoslava units that might cross the border following a potential intervention. That is something to which Austria would be committed, he said.

Asked about his visit to Moscow, about which he reported exclusively to DIE PRESSE, Roesch declared regarding the missile issue: "Yes, it was discussed, but there was no concrete decision." Does that mean that the Soviets again refused to permit Austria to have anti-tank missiles? "They neither refused nor consented." Then this does allow some scope? "That depends on how one interprets it," Roesch declared noncommittally.

In reply to the objection that the state treaty also contains provisions for the possibility of altering the military restrictions through an agreement with the Security Council, and to the question of whether he intended to make a proposal to this effect, Boesch declared: "I cannot tell you which measures will be taken." At any rate, he added, he had asked the political parties' defense spokesman last Friday (11 January) during an information talk on his Moscow visit to look into the question of whether or not missiles would altogether lose their importance sooner or later. [According to the Vienna KURIER in German 13 January on page 3, Roesch told the defense spokesman on that occasion that the Soviet side found it difficult to understand the Austrian wish for antitank missiles since the double-wall armor plating of the new generation of tanks would no longer be vulnerable to rockets anyway].

In his talk with USSR Defense Minister Ustinov, Roesch continued, his interlocutor also broached the topic of the NATO complementary armament. On this occasion, Roesch said, I told him "that we in Austria are of the opinion that both big powers must come to an agreement on arms limitation, because the present situation causes deep concern to the small countries."

In reply to the question of whether he was asked to condemn the NATO complementary armament, Roesch declared: "Nothing was said about a condemnation--we were merely asked to take a stance on it. Whether or not my reply was satisfactory to the gentlemen, I do not know."

What were the key points on the program of the first visit of an Austrian defense minister to the USSR in 13 years? "Inspection of training installations and confirmation of a mutual exchange of visits. What I found rather striking, however, was the very extensive information we were given about the air force."

Roesch does not quite know what to make of it. When he asked for the price of the MIG-23 system, his question was left unanswered. At any rate, neither the question of [Austria's] acquiring tanks nor that of antiaircraft weapons were mentioned, he said.

GOVERNMENT UNABLE TO FULFILL HONECKER WISH FOR EARLY VISIT

AU151118 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 15 Jan 80 p 2 AU

[Unattributed report: "Honecker Visit Not Possible at Present"]

[Text] Because of President Dr Rudolf Kirchschlaeger's preparations for the presidential elections on 18 May, it was not possible to comply with the wish of GDR state and party chief Erich Honecker to pay an official visit to Austria in the very near future.

Honecker's request had been conveyed by GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer during his official visit to Vienna [7-9 January]. According to DPA, the Hamburg news magazine DER SPIEGEL declared in its latest issue that Chancellor Bruno Kreisky had rejected Honecker's wish because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

As has been announced, the official visit is jointly desired both by Austria and the GDR but, because of the presidential elections, a date for this visit can be fixed only after these elections.

CP CHAIRMAN MUHRI INTERVIEWED ON GDR-AUSTRIAN RELATIONS

LD150224 East Berlin Voice of the GDR Domestic Service in German 1605 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Interview with Franz Muhri, chairman of the Austrian Communist Party, by Guenter Schwanitz in Vienna; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Comrade Muhri, last week the GDR foreign minister visited Vienna where he held official talks with the Austrian foreign minister. In your view, what is the importance of meetings and talks of this kind between the two countries?

[Answer] Our party views the visit by the GDR foreign minister to Austria and the results of this visit very positively. The visit has helped to consolidate and develop relations between the two countries, both at the state level as well as in other fields. We are, of course, particularly interested in a good development of the economic relations achieved over past years. Particularly in Austria, where there is uncertainty in many sectors due to results of a crisis situation and job uncertainty, it can be said without exaggeration that the development of these economic relations with the GDR and other socialist countries has, in fact, helped decisively in preventing unemployment in our country up until now.

[Question] During these talks, there were frequent mentions of continuing the process of detente, especially from the point of view of good bilateral relations between two states with different social systems, namely, socialist GDR and capitalist Austria, which, of course, follows a policy of strict neutrality. Cooperation between these two states will naturally be as good as the surrounding atmosphere, as Oskar Fischer once said--in other words, as good as international conditions and the international climate.

[Answer] I think one can say that this visit took place at a time when the international situation has been somewhat aggravated. After the events in Afghanistan, the Austrian mass media also began an enormous anti-Soviet campaign, which undoubtly objectively helped those forces of imperialism which want to feed tensions there and unleash a new round in the arms race. We here believe that the visit also contributed toward the Austrian side's stressing its interest in retaining the process of detente.

The constructive foreign policy line of the GDR, which Oskar Fischer put forward here, also made a certain impression on those in charge in Austria, and in the government and other circles in Austria. There is genuine interest in not endangering the process of detente by an aggravation of the international situation, for it is quite clear that our [word indistinct] neutrality is our country's security. Naturally, good economic relations with the GDR and other socialist countries can be best developed if the political process of detente is maintained, developed further and consolidated.

[Question] Particularly at the present time, the continuation of the process of detente depends greatly upon how far it is possible to make advances in the military field. NATO made a decision in December which runs counter to these efforts. What do you see as the effect of such decisions?

[Answer] We at any rate believe that the NATO decision must be regarded very critically, that the production of these new medium-range missiles and eventual deployment of these new weapons constitutes a serious threat to the process of detente and a threat to peace as a whole. We believe that these latest aggressions (?by) imperialist forces give rise to a serious threat to peace. It is now necessary to mobilize public opinion in order to repulse the (?recent) aggressions (?by) imperialism. [passage indistinct] the reality of the situation is such that following the [word indistinct] the most reactionary circles of imperialism have increasingly gone over to the counterattack and want to prevent real steps toward disarmament.

NUCLEAR POWER CONTROVERSY OVER ZWENTENDORF GROWS

[Special report: "Zwentendorf Supporters Speak of Begging Trips to Moscow"]

[Text] One day after Austrian Trade Union Federation Chairman Benya's conservative statement on Zwentendorf [Austria's mothballed and only nuclear power plant] in his TV interview on Sunday [13 January], both supporters and opponents of nuclear power became very active yesterday. The "Citizens' Initiative for Abolishing the Law Against Nuclear Power Production" again appealed for support of its planned referendum and spoke of begging trips as far as Moscow by Austrian power companies [Federal Power Company Director General Walter Fremuth is scheduled to start talks in Moscow this week on a power link between Austria and the CEMA grid]. The nuclear power opponents criticized Benya's remark on the 1979 Harrisburg reactor accident.

"What Austrian nuclear power opponents are doing at present borders on terrorizing public opinion," a spokesman of the Zwentendorf supporters declared. "Apparently in appreciation of the support rendered them earlier by FRG antinuclear power activists they now openly threaten FRG power companies with demonstrations against a nuclear power plant that is to be built close to the Austrian border." The spokesman called it noteworthy that there are no similar intentions regarding any demonstrations against the CSSR and Hungary. However, Austria is dependent on power imports from the FRG, he said, and "anyone can work out for himself how much power the Germans will supply us if Austria exports the Zwentendorf hysteria."

The nuclear power opponents, on the other hand, are excited over Benya's statement that fortunately no harm was done in Harrisburg. They argue that such minimizing is "coming close to being criminal."

CP 'REGRETS' SOVIET INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

LD151237 Brussels LE SOIR in French 9 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "The Belgian Communist Party Regrets"]

[Text] Unlike the PCF, which has alined with Moscow, the Belgian Communist Party has issued a communique in which it "regrets" that, following internal conflicts which weakened the Afghan progressive forces, the Soviet Union "felt it had to intervene in the country's internal affairs to the extent of sending an expeditionary force to the country."

NETHERLANDS

PARLIAMENTARY PANEL QUESTIONS VAN DER KLAAUW

LD151305 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 11 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Diplomatic correspondent report: "Doubt in Chamber Over Value of Sanctions Against Iran"]

[Text] The Hague, 11 January--Should economic sanctions by the West against Iran be regarded as appropriate now that the whole Islamic world is siding with the West against the Soviet Union over the military occupation of Afghanistan? This fundamental question was raised yesterday during consultations between Foreign Minister Van der Klaauw and the second chamber standing committee on foreign affairs without the minister being able to give a clear answer.

Several deputies also had reservations about sanctions against Iran now that the Soviet Union is trying to win that country over to its side by a veto in the Security Council. Although the continued detention of hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran is a serious threat to international law, it is argued that it would be very unwise to split the united front which Western and Islamic countries have formed against the Soviet Union following the invasion of Afghanistan.

Therefore, the minister was also asked to reexamine the need for sanctions against Iran in the light of recent developments in Afghanistan. Mention was also made of the conclusions drawn by UN Secretary General Waldheim after his recent visit to Tehran. According to him, economic sanctions would be counterproductive at the moment and would fuel nationalistic and anti-American feeling.

The minister was asked no less than 51 questions about the situation in Afghanistan during the consultations. In this connection there was talk of the possibility of recalling the Netherlands ambassador to Moscow (advocated by the Christian Democratic Appeal but rejected by the minister), the possibility of boycotting the Olympic games, halting supplies of technology and grain and canceling the second CSCE conference in Madrid in the fall.

The consultations left the final impression that little can be expected from the Netherlands alone. Such measures could only be useful and effective in the broader context of the EC and NATO. This evening there will be a cabinet meeting on the situation in the Middle East.

GENSCHER HOLDS TALKS WITH CHRISTOPHER IN BONN

LD160852 Hamburg DPA in German 0821 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Deputy U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher met today in Bonn for an exchange of views. The main topic of discussion was appropriate reaction by the West to Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and developments in Iran. Christopher arrived from Brussels where he had taken part in the NATO Council's discussion of the same problems.

Details of Meeting

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Deputy U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher met for over 1 hour in Bonn today to discuss the effects of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the holding of the hostages in Tehran.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman announced afterward that Genscher had briefed his American guest on the Brussels meeting of EEC foreign ministers at which the Soviet military action was strongly condemned. Genscher positively stressed to Christopher the concurring views of the nine European foreign ministers on the question of solidarity with the United States.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman described the discussion between Genscher and Christopher as part of the process of current coordination between Bonn and Washington. The outcome would serve th Federal Government as a basis for future talks on the situation in the Middle East.

Observers assume that the deputy U.S. secretary of state also discussed Washington's thoughts regarding retaliatory measures against the Soviet intervention, including a boycott of the Moscow Olympics. Christopher previously discussed these questions with the governments in London and Rome, and with NATO in Brussels.

SCHMIDT: USSR NOW EXPERIENCING 'HITHERTO UNKNOWN' ISOLATION

LD152156 Hamburg DPA in German 2133 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--In the opinion of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Soviet Union, after the condemnation of its action against Afghanistan by the United Nations, has been isolated to an extent hitherto unknown.

According to people present, Schmidt, speaking to the SPD lower house group on Tuesday evening, made it clear that Afghanistan's occupation by the Soviets had led to a change in the military balance of Central Asia.

It was said that Schmidt has assured the United States in its conflict with Tehran of the Federal Republic's full support. He has shown understanding for the American position on Iran. The U.S. Government is under great pressure from American public opinion.

Schmidt expressed the hope that President Carter will make no decision on the hostages affair in Iran which could bring "relief" to the Soviets regarding their invasion of Afghanistan. Moscow's action in Afghanistan has evoked remarkable reactions in the Third World.

SCHMIDT REPORTEDLY IRKED BY NATO COMMANDER ROGERS

[Article signed Co.: "Chancellor Irked by NATO Chief Rogers"]

[Excerpt] Bonn--Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is irked by NATO Supreme Commander Gen Bernard Rogers. Rogers had stated that Europe, too, may well be taken by surprise any time by a Soviet blitzkrieg after the pattern of Afghanistan. Government spokesman Armin Gruenewald yesterday denied, to be sure, that Schmidt had termed these remarks "gabble," yet he confirmed that the chancellor considers them erroneous.

In this connection, Gruenewald referred to the statement of the Federal Security Council published last Friday: "The military defensive strength of the Atlantic alliance, including its early warning capability, guarantees that a situation such as that in Afghanistan would not occur in Western Europe." According to official information, this assessment was based on a NATO analysis which had also been submitted to Rogers. The U.S. general, however, had made different remarks about it--obviously foremost with a view to the United States.

Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, addressing the FDP Federal Executive Board yesterday, said that Moscow is seriously harming detente policy, which can flourish only if it is indivisible. by seeking to gain advantage for itself in other parts of the world through military action.

BONN HAS 'GRAVE CONCERN' OVER POSSIBLE U.S. MILITARY ACTION IN IRAN

[Text] Bonn--The fact that the United States is considering measures for a military blockade of Iran in the Persian Gulf has caused grave concern within the Federal Government about the foreign political and security consequences of such considerations. In Bonn today government circles expressed fears that these considerations could find such strong support among the American public that President Jimmy Carter would be forced to implement them for internal political reasons at the beginning of the presidential election campaign. This would mean a danger of military hostilities.

Bonn government circles confirmed that Washington had raised in the NATO Council its military proposals for the solution of the Iranian crisis and that the Federal Government had learned of them in this way. However, contrary to correspondents' reports from Washington, the United States has not spoken of a concrete "sea blockade", which would be a direct act of war. Reports from Washington say that the United States is considering mining the Persian Gulf. Bonn government circles stressed that Washington had expressed no specific intention of military action in the Persian Gulf, but made it clear that it reserved the right to contemplate such steps.

According to information from government circles, Bonn's attitude toward the United States in this situation is one of advising moderation. This is the stand that Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will adopt in his talks with the U.S. administration in Washington shortly and where, it is said, he will also meet President Carter. Bonn's line of exercising a moderating influence on the United States, the circles say, is not so much determined by West German oil interests, which could be badly affected by military action in the Persian Gulf, but by the fear that blockade measures could cause the "sparks of war" to fly over from the Middle East (occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union) to the Near East region.

On President Carter's role, the government circles expressed the understanding that, with his stand, the President wanted to score internal political points, but they said that one had to fear--with a view to the consideration of a blockade against Iran--that Carter, influenced by public enthusiasm in the United States, could take foreign or military political measures under internal political pressure which could later prove to be a great mistake for him.

In the Federal Government, the opinion is shared that U.S. military action in the Persian Gulf could lead to a direct confrontation with the Soviet Union.

ERTL EXPECTS 'NO STRAIN' ON EUROPE AS RESULT OF U.S. GRAIN EMBARGO

LD121224 Hamburg DPA in German 1112 GMT 12 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Munich--Federal Agricultural Minister Josef Ertl does not expect that a cut in U.S. grain supplies to the Soviet Union will lead to additional financial strains on the European agricultural funds. According to his ministry, the minister said in an article published in the Bavarian agricultural weekly today that the U.S. measures will not necessarily result in a glut or fall in prices in the world market provided that, for the time being, the Americans domestically store the quantities released, as announced. Ertl pointed out that the European Community's self-sufficiency in grain has reached 95 percent.

Terms Embargo 'Necessary'

LD131052 Hamburg DPA in German 0101 GMT 13 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Food Minister Josef Ertl has expressed support for the U.S. embargo on grain supplies to the Soviet Union as a "necessary measure" since Moscow, by intervening in Afghanistan, has gone far beyond "the limits of what can be justified." The U.S. Government has every reason to demonstrate in this case the kind of difficulties it can create for the USSR should Moscow refuse to act wisely, the minister said in an interview on Deutschlandfunk on Sunday.

However, as far as a long-term grain embargo is concerned, Ertl pointed out that this would inevitably mean enormous grain surpluses in the main exporting countries. This is irreconcilable with the increasing food requirements in large parts of the world. A large part of this grain should be made available to the poor developing countries. Ertl expressed hope that the European Community will show its solidarity with the United States and other suppliers and refrain from concluding new food export agreements with the Soviet Union. This also applies to France's traditional butter market in the Soviet Union, Ertl said.

Speaking generally about the East-West crisis, the minister said that it is wrong to speak of a failure of the policy of detente. Despite Moscow's disappointing conduct he said that he can well imagine that some form of cooperation will again be found which will promote rather than destroy opportunities for peace.

DEFENSE EXPERT WOERNER EXPRESSES WORLD SECURITY CONCEPTS

[Report on an interview with CDU Bundestag deputy and defense expert Manfred Woerner, signed Fy. "The Opposition Wants an Extension of the NATO Tasks"]

[Text] Bonn, 10 January--The extension of the tasks of NATO, for instance, as far as the securing of the energy and raw material supplies is concerned, the enhancement of relations with China with a view toward the global power balance, an increase in the defense budget by more than just a real 3 percent as envisaged by the Federal Government--these are some of the conclusions which defense policy spokesman of the opposition, Woerner, deems imperative since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The politician advocated this view in an interview with this newspaper on Thursday.

"Two weeks after the Soviet advance, the West not only faces the bitter realization that Moscow will keep this geostrategically important position occupied for the foreseeable future," Woerner said. "It is also aware that, even if it were determined to do it, the West would not be able to undo this occupation with military means of its own. This is not an incidental misfortune but the consequence of 15 years of erosion of Western power. Beyond that, however, it is also the result of an erroneous political assessment of Moscow."

Woerner said that during the past several years a certain assumption has become the dominant opinion among most Western politicians--that the Soviet leadership is peace-loving and shirks risks, that it consequently uses its resources to consolidate its sphere of hegemony while renouncing any further expansion. "This now turned out to be erroneous. After all, Brezhnev and the other members of the Politburo are not so old that they would fail to seize any available opportunity in view of the dramatic weakness of the West. Through this assumption the West has been victimized by its own wishful thinking."

If the United States and its allies want to avoid a recurrence of what happened in Afghanistan--be it in Pakistan or perhaps in Yugoslavia after Tito's demise--the first step must be the revision of their own judgement of the character of Soviet foreign policy. "The distrust which many politicians of my party have had from the very outset for the thesis that Moscow just wants to be a power equal to the United States and to have the West recognize this status, has been proved justified. We must realize that the Soviet Union is prepared to display peaceful behavior only when the strength of the potential adversary makes it deem the use of other means in expedient," Woerner said.

Since the fait accomplis created by Moscow cannot be undone anymore even by hasty military improvisations, the conclusions ought to be directed toward the future and drawn by the leading power as well as by the allies. It is necessary to realize what devastating conventional weakness is paralyzing the capability of action of the Western leading power. What the United States can muster at present for the event of an armed conflict is 15 divisions whereas the Soviet Union, after short-term mobilization, can put 126 divisions and more into action. Besides, the United States does not have any reserve units and, hence, is hardly in a position to muster the ground forces necessary for the implementation of its military concept. "President Carter is lacking the soldiers for actually setting up the mobile intervention force which is to have a strength of 110,000 men and which is intended for interventions, for example, in the Middle East," Woerner said. One cannot but wonder whether the United States could, without reintroducing conscription, put up the required present units and those reserves which it actually needs in view of the Soviet challenge. [paragraph continues]

But the Europeans, too, must intensify their efforts in the conventional field. The U.S. President is entitled to demand solidarity especially of his NATO partners for whose freedom American solidarity, in turn, is a prerequisite.

A Western policy oriented toward the future must live up to the following requirements:

Creation of a political and military assortment of instruments which will halt further Soviet expansion by making any further expansion an incalculable risk to Moscow. To this end, an overall concept must be mapped out which will include all allies of the United States and allow the coordinated use of all economic, psychological, and financial instruments as well as the other--also military--means of power;

Stabilization of the "frontline states" and the guarantee of the external security of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Israel by means of guaranteed protection;

Stabilization of NATO's southern flank--especially of Turkey--through a new sort of Marshall Plan;

Creation of a permanent presence of the United States in the Middle East and Indian Ocean. To this end the establishment of an intervention force is most urgent.

Extension of the circle of tasks of NATO by the securing of energy and raw material supplies as well as the transport routes as a central task of the alliance. For this reason it is necessary to abolish the geographical limitation of the area in which the alliance is valid;

Enhancement of relations with China with a view toward contributing toward global power balance;

Priority of the defense requirements in the pursuit of detente policy and the restoration of the power balance wherever it has been violated by Soviet preponderance;

Increase in the defense expenditures for the Bundeswehr. In view of the new assessment of Soviet policy, a schematic increase by a real 3 percent per annum will not suffice.

Enlightenment of the public about the existing dangers and the extent of Soviet armament. This is the precondition for the people's realization of the necessity of the measures to be taken and the support of these measures.

SPD SPOKESMAN OPPOSES BOYCOTT OF MOSCOW OLYMPICS

[Text] Bonn--On behalf of the Social Democrats the chairman of the SPD sports advisory board, Hermann Heinemann, has opposed a boycott of the Olympic games in Moscow. Writing in the SPD press service Heinemann said that such a boycott would not be an appropriate way of replying to the USSR's actions in Afghanistan, which are to be condemned.

Heinemann said that a boycott of the Moscow games would certainly lead to countermeasures by the Soviet Union and those countries closely allied with it politically, against the winter games in Lake Placid. The SPD will continue to do its share to see to it that the Olympic games are preserved intact and not jeopardized by threats of boycott, irrespective of which side they come from.

SPD'S BAHR DISCUSSES PROSPECTS OF RETURN TO COLD WAR

Rejects CDU's Woerner Plan

LD141508 Hamburg DPA in German 1351 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--SPD Party Manager Egon Bahr has rejected as "risky" the proposal by CDU defense expert Manfred Woerner that NATO's sphere of activity should be broadened to embrace the Middle East in view of the Soviet attack on Afghanistan. Bahr said in an interview for West German radio today that this demand, which would mean a further worsening of the international situation, would not meet with a particularly positive response in the United States either. Nobody in the United States is interested in making the situation more critical.

Referring to his recent talks with government representatives in Washington Bahr said that the American Government is fully aware of the fact that East and West must coexist. There is no alternative to this. Washington is also aware that things are too dangerous to give up the attempts of maintaining a dialog with the Soviet Union on questions of armament and arms control, for example.

According to Bahr the U.S. Government completely understands "that we in Europe are not responding to events in Central Asia or the Middle East by either tightening or escalating our situation in Europe;" [as received] but the United States naturally expects Europe to understand its attitude and to support it by reacting to a situation such as the one created in Afghanistan. It was quite clear, Bahr added, that in times of increasing tension solidarity should also increase.

Views Danger of Escalation

DW151025 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0615 GMT 14 Jan 80 DW

[Reporter Woening interview with SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Can you confirm impressions reported by correspondents in connection with the UN debates to the effect that a cold war atmosphere is being expressed in these debates and that the Americans have really been infected by this cold war atmosphere?

[Answer] Yes, I can confirm that. Public opinion in the United States reflects some people's belief that we are about to return to the times of cold war. But this is not the approach and the intention of what is called the U.S. administration or government.

[Question] What is the approach of the U.S. administration? Has there really been a change in U.S. policy? Where can that be seen?

[Answer] The American stance is based on two tracks, if I may put it that way. It says that the Soviet Union must realize that its action in Afghanistan creates a certain American attitude. In other words, what has happened in the form of an aggression, intervention or violation of international rules in Afghanistan must be answered, and the answer cannot indicate that this was just a minor matter. On the other hand, however--and this indicates the parallel character of that policy--the U.S. Government is fully aware of the fact that the East and the West must coexist. There is no alternative. Matters are too dangerous and one must try to continue talking to the Soviet Union, for example on arms and arms control problems. That is one of the reasons why SALT has not been discontinued, and why one wants to freeze it for a time. One knows that dangerous levels are involved here which must be kept under control if the world is not to face a terrible future.

[Question] The SPD federal manager was quite involved in setting up the detente policy of the Federal Republic. You have certainly tried to probe what role the Federal Republic could play in that framework, how much leeway it will have with regard to the American policy and the new discussion on detente policy. What did the Americans say about that problem?

[Answer] May I first say once more that the new policy is not a new policy with a defined intention and aim; today it is a reaction to Soviet actions with the hope of being able to return to old positions and old lines. As regards the Federal Republic, Washington shows full understanding of two points. The first point is that of full understanding for the fact that we in Europe will not react to developments in the Middle East or Central Asia that will aggravate our course, our situation or our situation in Europe. Second, it is expected naturally that the Europeans will show understanding for the American stance and that we will side with the United States wherever reaction to the Afghanistan situation is involved. It is absolutely clear that solidarity will increase in times of increased tension.

[Question] Soviet party and government leader Brezhnev strongly attacked the United States in a PRAVDA interview, charging that it speaks the language of cold war with regard to the Soviet Union. The fact that President Carter, and not merely for tactical election reasons, wants to continue strengthening the world power position of the United States is a danger to escalation, is it not? Despite the efforts to act carefully and despite statements indicating that one must be very careful in this situation, that course could lead at least to a further verbal escalation, could it not?

[Answer] It could lead not only to verbal escalation, but also to a real escalation. The situation is indeed difficult and dangerous, particularly since at this moment at least the two superpowers are not engaging in a real dialog. The U.S. ambassador has been recalled. The Soviet ambassador, who went to Moscow in early December, has not yet returned to Washington. Presently we have a situation where one party does something, the other does something, the first does something again and the other also. It means that both sides create conditions without having a hand on the pulse. That is always dangerous.

[Question] Do you see any reason or necessity for changing the policy of the Federal Government because intensified consultations with the Americans are necessary or, as CDU politician Woerner recently demanded, to improve the military situation of the Bundeswehr?

[Answer] Well, regarding consultations, they could not be more intense than they are now. The Federal Government found full understanding in Washington for its stance. I consider Mr Woerner's statement adventurous. It will not find a particularly positive echo in America either. Nobody is interested there in an additional aggravation of the situation. What Mr Woerner advised would be an additional aggravation to the international situation which would be created by us.

CDU OFFICIAL SAYS WITHDRAWN USSR TROOPS IN HUNGARY, CSSR

[Excerpt] Bonn--Most of the 1,000 Soviet tanks and troop units withdrawn from the GDR at the end of last year are said to be stationed in Hungary. This information has been received by Alois Mertes, disarmament expert of the CDU/CSU.

In an interview with DPA, Mertes said in Bonn on Sunday that "an honest and reliably informed East European interlocutor" had given him the information. Other units have been attached to the Soviet troops in the CSSR.

161 CASES OF SUSPECTED ESPIONAGE INVESTIGATED IN 1979

LD151656 Hamburg DPA in German 1140 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[Summary] Wiesbaden--According to the Federal Criminal Investigation Office [BKA], espionage activity by the intelligence services of communist states against the Federal Republic continued unabated in 1979. The BKA today announced in Wiesbaden that last year the BKA Department for Protection of the State was asked by the Federal Prosecutor's Office to investigate 161 cases of suspected espionage. In 80 percent of these cases concrete evidence of espionage activity was established and 32 arrests were made.

A large number of investigations were carried out following information supplied by Werner Stiller, former lieutenant of the GDR Ministry for State Security who defected to the Federal Republic on 19 January 1979. According to Stiller's estimates, the GDR economy has saved about DM300 million through scientific and industrial espionage.

A joint communique on the visit was not issued. Vetter had discussed questions of future cooperation with the leadership of the Polish trade unions. UN ENVOY APPEALS TO USSR TO WITHDRAW FROM AFGHANISTAN

[Nicole Bernheim dispatch: "Paris States That Moscow's Action Is Contrary to the Franco-Soviet Document on Detente"]

[Excerpts] New York--The General Assembly special emergency session on the situation in Afghanistan continued on Friday.

France's representative, Mr Leprette, recalled "the joint declaration by the USSR and France on international detente of 22 June 1977 which constituted an important step in a process which can only develop in mutual trust (note: statement published at the end of Mr Brezhnev's last official visit to France).... The USSR's action in Afghanistan is not in keeping with this solemn declaration. France appeals once again for Afghanistan's independence to be respected, for the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Soviet troops from that country so that it might recover freedom, peace and the right to determine its own future."

CRITICISM OF PCF SUPPORT FOR USSR INCREASES

Elleinstein Interview

LD151517 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 13-14 Jan 80 p 5 LD

[Benoit Rayski interview with "dissident" PCF intellectual Jean Elleinstein: "Elleinstein: Thorez Spoke in a More Dignified Way Than Marchais"--date, place not given]

[Text] Question: You listened to Georges Marchais yesterday and heard him justify the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. What do you think of that stance?

Answer: Unfortunately it confirms the analysis I made 2 years ago of the development of PCF policy: I think it could essentially be said to agree with the Soviet position.

Question: So, what has changed in the PCF?

Answer: I think the change lies in the abandonment of Eurocommunism by the party leadership, the current PCF leadership--the abandonment of an independent policy with regard to the Soviet communists.

Question: And yet Marchais still claims to be Eurocommunist....

Answer: Talking is one thing. Mere words.... Brezhnev says that noninterference in the internal affairs of other states must be respected, although he intervened in Czechoslovakia 10 years ago and still dominates that country. Therefore, I do not think you should attach more value to words than they deserve.

Question: Marchais said something surprising about Afghanistan: He said that Afghan President Amin had himself requested the intervention by Soviet troops. However, the first thing the Soviets did in Kabul was to execute Amin and his family. What are we to think of this statement by the PCF secretary general?

Answer: I do not think he really understands the Afghan situation.

Question: Do you think that, when Marchais says that, he believes it, or is he trying to convince himself that it is true?

Answer: I do not feel able to answer that question. All I know is that what he says is not true. There is no democratic process in Afghanistan. There have been military coups, and finally the Soviets, who had intervened before these past few weeks--they had been intervening for several months--officially extended and stepped up their intervention and claimed to have been called in by the Afghan leaders just as they claimed to have been called in by the Czechoslovak leaders in 1968, although everybody knows that the CPCZ and Czechoslovak authorities were hostile to their intervention.

I do not know whether Marchais believes what he says or not. However, I am sure that what he says is untrue.

Question: So, what he says about Afghanistan is untrue.

Answer: It is interesting that he has challenged anybody to have a debate with him. I am willing to take up the challenge and am prepared to debate the Soviet intervention with him...on television or in L'HUMANITE....

Question: What do you think of the tone used by Marchais with regard to the Socialists? He has said that Pierre Joxe is a lout and a little valet of Mitterrand.... Are these remarks not reminiscent of the Stalinist period?

Answer: It is difficult not to draw comparisons. However, I am not sure that anybody dared talk about people in that way even in those days. I think that Thorez expressed his views on a number of problems in a more dignified way than Marchais.

I do not say he was always right but he spoke in a more dignified and seemly way.

Question: Piterman has made a statement denouncing the campaign of systematic denigration launched by "certain comrades." Do you think he was referring to you?

Answer: I do not understand his statement. I do not know whom he is referring to. I really do not.

I believe there are Communists who are critical of the PCF's line, and I do not see what justification there is for asserting that this is an unworthy, systematic battle with the party.

Unless he thinks he is the party. Louis XIV said: "I am the state." Marchais or Fiterman said: "I am the party."

If criticizing Fiterman or Marchais amounts to waging an unworthy, systematic battle then this statement applies not just to me but to tens of thousands of Communists.

Question: Is there a re-Stalinization in the PCF?

Answer: I do not use that term. It is impossible to compare different historical situations. The PCF is cutting itself off, isolating itself. That involves a whole series of consequences, and above all taking the USSR as a sound pivot with all that implies: The USSR must be defended because it is the center of the right against imperialism and so forth....

Question: It also implies a break with the Socialist Party?

Answer: Yes, it implies the abandonment of the leftwing union. That is obvious. The current party leaders are rather nervous. That is more a sign of problems than of strength. There are many signs that there is opposition to them within the party and among the Communist electorate.

Question: Why do you remain a member of the PCF?

Answer: Because I hope to change it. Because I think that we live in a free country, that those who criticize the policies followed by the current PCF leadership cannot be stifled. And I think we must fight to change the PCF. We must fight in the open.

Question: How do you interpret the fact that the PCF leadership has not tried to expel you?

Answer: They have not dared to. Perhaps they are preparing to do so now.

Question: Why have they not dared to?

Answer: Because I believe that, contrary to what Fiterman says, they cannot count the people who are critical of the PCF leadership on one hand. It is not just one or two Communists they would have to expel but thousands and thousands of Communists.

Intellectuals' Manifesto

LD151605 Paris LE MATIN in French 12-13 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "Manifesto for 'Stamping Out Stalinism'"]

[Text] A new manifesto criticizing the PCF leadership's policy was published yesterday. It is signed by intellectuals who are either members of the PCF or close to it and who hope that the debate which has been opened in preparation for the PCF national council meeting on the intellectuals might "lead to an extraordinary congress which could finally start to stamp out Stalinism in France."

The manifesto states in particular: "It is ludicrous to use 'revolution' slogans to hide the (PCF's) desire to go it alone, and it is pathetic to see the PCF continuing a degradingly authoritarian campaign against its former Socialist ally. It is scandalous that it continues to describe the record of a regime consolidated by more than 10 million political assassinations as 'positive on the whole'.... It is aberrant to continue to give unconditional support to the Soviet Union as if the past and present facts of Stalinism were now no longer present in everybody's mind."

The signatories include Jean Elleinstein, Jean-Pierre Faye, Jean and Nina Kehayan, Artur London, Edouard Pignon, Helene Parmelin, Vercors [Jean Bruller] and Antoine Vittez.

L'HUMANITE Defense

LD151205 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 9 Jan 80 p 1 LD

[Roland Leroy editorial: "Class Reasons"]

[Text] According to LE MATIN, the PCF seeks to "look itself in a ghetto and live on attacks and criticisms from whatever quarter;" for Alain Duhamel on Europe 1, the PCF is engaging in "a process of voluntary confinement," is practicing "self-imprisonment," is motivated by a "desire to be alone," by "the logic of turning in on itself." In a word, it is "moving into winter quarters."

These, then, are people who are showing a sudden interest in our policy to the point of seeming to defend it against us.

Let us rapidly make two observations.

The first is to underline that LE MONDE, which discussed the meeting between the PCI and PCF secretaries general, refrained from publishing the cooperation communique signed by Enrico Berlinguer and Georges Marchais. LE MONDE publishes all the "useful" news and keeps quiet about the rest.

The second is to ask a simple question: What is so astounding about a trip to Moscow by the secretary general of the Communist Party? Not many months pass without a Giscard minister going to the Soviet Union; a Socialist internationale delegation went there recently. In the recent past Georges Marchais has met the state leaders of Yugoslavia, Algeria, Poland, Cuba and Nicaragua. He regularly meets the leaders of other communist parties. So is the PCF secretary general supposed to be the only unusual visitor to Moscow? Is Georges Marchais' only unusual meeting therefore his meeting with Leonid Brezhnev?

However, the greatest lie in the unbridled attack on our party is the accusation of changing policy, of being "in flagrant contradiction with the decisions of the 22d and 23d congresses."

Let us discuss this. PCF policy is expressed in its decisions, by its congresses. As early as the second paragraph of the resolution adopted by the 23d congress we can read that the prospects for democratic transformation "can become reality as a result of the new opportunities now open for mankind's progress; but they can only come to fruition through complex and bitter class struggle."

Thus we never believed that the road to change would be a kind of royal progress without upsets or difficulties. On the contrary, the democratic road to socialism means class struggle in all its forms, including respect for universal suffrage. [paragraph continues]

He said this at the 22d congress: "It is a series of dogged struggles, of mass struggles progressively to change the correlation of social and political forces in favor of the working people and all the popular strata."

Our strategy is developed today in each of our struggles. We do not accept austerity and we are fighting in a concrete fashion against it. Since the beginning of August we have developed the struggle against the Fr60-billion theft committed by the authorities. Today, in the same way, we are resisting the new Fr40-billion holdup.

We are struggling for disarmament and peace and against imperialism. In this sphere the imperialists' fury is understandable. Confronted by crisis, following the fall of the European fascist regimes, they suffered a series of stinging reverses within a matter of months: Nicaragua, Iran, Afghanistan, Cambodia--all names which denote setbacks to world imperialism.

That the enemy declares himself against us is no surprise to us; we are the political force in France opposed to the social "consensus," struggling daily and effectively against austerity. We are the party which fights for disarmament. We are the party working to bring about the broadest and most effective cohesion among the vital forces of the French people.

Our policy is a policy of struggle and of union.

That Lecanuet, that man of the past and of servitude to the United States, speaking as he did yesterday of "the PCF's alinement on the Soviet Union" is not something to worry us.

We know that many working French men and women recognize our party as the one which acts, as we recalled at the 23d congress, "against all isolation as against all alinement." They know that the strength of this party is the opportunity of the future.

Capitalist government and big bosses, the servants of American policy, seek to strike against our party for class reasons. It is for class reasons, too, that the working people have an interest in strengthening the PCF.

Implications for PS Viewed

LD151439 Paris LE MONDE in French 13-14 Jan 80 pp 1, 3 LD

[Andre Laurens article: "The PCF's Internationalist Option Affects the PS Line"]

[Excerpt] The PCF has returned to an isolation from which it had tried to emerge. Its alinement with Moscow's diplomatic ideas can be described as a positive return to the ghetto. It is obvious that after a phase of "nationalism" the PCF is trying to make up on the international plane for the solitude it is risking on the domestic plane. Eurocommunism will probably suffer, but that is because, in addition to its pro-Soviet past, the PCF does not have the dominant position in France that the PCI has in Italy.

At the same time, the return to internationalism serves as an alternative strategy. Members and supporters disappointed and demobilized by the split in the left must be offered a different hope and ideal than the conquest of electoral positions, which is fruitless from the start if it takes place in isolation. Solidarity with the progressive and socialist forces in the world and the occupation of "fields of struggle" in France, while trying to assert the party as the only real opposition party, are alternatives. "Young people are sensitive to the language of struggle and international solidarity," Mr Fiterman stressed when speaking to federation secretaries.

These options are swelling the PCF's internal opposition, which already had other motives for emerging. It is to be found not only among the well-known "fellow-travelers" and among emancipated Communist intellectuals but also among official cadres and members who have some influence over their comrades. The PCF leadership seems determined to cut its losses and is starting to question infringements of the democratic centralism doctrine. It is trying to mobilize its members against an anti-communist campaign which is real but which it has helped to revive. The media are the prime target.

Nothing can guarantee that the PCF's new line will be definitive. But nothing can show how long this phase, which places the whole left in a difficult position, will last.

Holding Course or Choosing the Autonomous Path

The Socialist Party is certainly in a difficult position, since it is just putting the finishing touches to a plan whose implementation would depend on a new leftwing union. It is torn between the ambition to force a return to a strategy which now seems outdated and the search for an autonomous line. Nobody is contemplating or dares to mention the alternative solution of an alliance with parties not in the left wing.

The majority of the PS backs Mr Francois Mitterrand in the view that they must "stand firm" and "hold course" to force the PCF to return to more unitary feelings. In particular that implies being firmly anchored in the left in order not to supply any food for the antisocialist campaign being waged by the PCF leaders. Mr Mitterrand and his supporters think that it is because they have not given way that the PCF arguments have failed to convince anybody, even within the PCF. The PS leaders regard the disturbances within the PCF as an encouragement to persist in their pressure for unity. This is the first time, they point out, that the PCF leadership has encountered such difficulty in having a change of line accepted. Therefore, in view of these positive indications, this is not the time to change strategy. This is especially true since there is no real alternative, because the ruling class in France is too jealous of its power to entrust it even to a social democratic party not linked with the PCF. Mr Mitterrand thinks that the PS would simply be a prisoner of the right if it were to move toward a third party solution, since there is no adequate social foundation to support it.

Those who want to "hold course" suspect Mr Rocard of drifting toward the third party solution. In fact Mr Pierre Mauroy is pushing himself forward more than Mr Rocard. Mr Mauroy advocates updating the Socialist plan in light of the most recent events (state of security in Europe, PCF position). He wants the PS to define a policy which is much more independent of the outdated leftwing union strategy. Mr Rocard argues in the same way, and thinks it would be both more realistic and more honest to admit that the PS and PCF uphold different and rival plans for society. They should therefore enter into open competition, he says in essence, and let the best party win, given that the voters continue to show solidarity against the right.

Beyond the PS plan, which is just another document, it is the choice of the line to be taken by the PS candidate in the presidential election which is at stake. Mr Mitterrand--and probably Mr Rocard were he to be chosen--thinks that the candidate will have the job of updating the PS' fundamental document, while Mr Mauroy would prefer the party to give its verdict on such an essential matter before choosing its champion. However, can this updating be envisaged without starting the process of choosing the candidate?

CHRISTOPHER HOLDS 14 JAN TALKS WITH RUFFINI

[Text] U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher yesterday made a brief visit to Rome. He held talks with new Minister of Foreign Affairs Ruffini. Afghanistan and Iran were the main themes of the talks. It can only be assumed that the (?prospective) intention of the United States to ask for the boycott of the forthcoming Olympic games in Moscow were discussed.

SOCIALISTS' CENTRAL COMMITTEE DEBATES GOVERNMENT ISSUES

Leftists Criticize Craxi Report

AU161045 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 16 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome January 16 (ANSA)--The Socialist Party Central Committee Assembly, entering its third day today, and today's opening of the 18th Social Democrat National Congress in Rome are dominating the Italian political scene this week.

Attention is especially focused on the Socialist leadership meetings because of the crucial role of the nation's third largest party, now in the throes of a struggle between Secretary Bettino Craxi and the left factions for the survival of Premier Francesco Cossiga's Christian Democrat-Social Democrat-Liberal Party coalition government. The Socialists back Cossiga's minority alignment by abstaining in Parliament.

Yesterday's session witnessed a string of criticism of Craxi's report in statements delivered by the leaders of the Socialist left factions, Riccardo Lombardi, ex-Secretary Francesco de Martino and Renato Ballardini.

Lombardi charged that Craxi had placed the survival of the present legislature at the top of his list of priorities. Addressing himself to the bone of contention between the secretary and the Socialist left, Lombardi then argued that the main goal for his party should be an emergency government and that the "legitimization of the Communist Party, once the party has given the necessary and sufficient signals, will serve the Socialists to be able to impose an alternative to the left".

Lombardi's statement came in reply to the section of Craxi's speech on the need to "open the path for a long term agreement in order to breathe life back into the (present) legislature, save it from the present disquieting uncertainty" and call for the ruling Christian Democrats to open "political and platform negotiations on all the big questions".

The Socialist left spokesman, after announcing that he would vote against the secretary's report, launched charges against the foreign policy section of the document.

According to Lombardi, the Socialist leader apparently (?forgot) to discuss United States' responsibility for the current international economic and political situation. He added that a mention of the U.S. role would not have, in the least, detracted from the secretary's statement on "the adventuristic initiatives of the Soviet Union".

De Martino told the Socialist leadership meeting that the controversy within the party's ranks "is not simply over tactics but touches on the most profound themes and concerns the very nature of the Italian Socialist Party". If this alignment intends to be "a part of the left, then its renewal cannot take place outside the left", he declared.

On the international front, De Martino said that "there were no concrete proposals in Craxi's report aimed at causing Europe, and especially the socialist parties, to undertake initiatives for defusing the serious dangers of war and the perils of an extension of local conflicts".

The former secretary also charged that the present secretary contributed nothing new toward an agreement among the party's leaders but, on the other hand, sharpened the terms of the differences. According to De Martino, Craxi's appeal for an emergency government "was so subtle that it cannot even be called a proposal and was reduced to a simple call on the Christian Democrats to open dealings on a variety of issues with all the democratic parties".

In this fashion, the spokesman for the left said, the policy of national solidarity becomes "a platonic aspiration, a label for a different policy".

De Martino concluded his statement with a recommendation for the speedy formation of a new government in which all the parties, including the Communists, take on their share of the responsibilities.

Ballardini, speaking for the Socialist "new left", flatly called for the resignation of the entire Central Committee on the grounds of the "political gap" between the secretary's report and the statement made by Lombardi, which signals the end of the "Turin majority" [the alliance formed during the 1978 national congress between Craxi's "autonomists" and the left now gathered behind Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile].

More on Differences

[Text] A lively debate took place at the meeting of the Central Committee of the Socialist Party following Craxi's report. Profound differences have been confirmed between Secretary Craxi and the opposition comprising Lombardi, Signorile, Mancini, De Martino and Achilli. They are especially divided on the way to raise the question of a government of national unity. Craxi wants to have room to maneuver in any way necessary and to avoid early elections by various means.

Lombardi, who today submitted a proper counterreport, and De Martino answered him that only an emergency government represented a solution to insure the governability of the legislature. Any other government, Lombardi said, would not be any better than the present one. Craxi asked the Christian Democracy to start negotiations on a government of national unity, while Lombardi and De Martino answered him that no appeal should be made to the Christian Democrats and that conditions should be put forward. They proposed an agreement between the leftwing parties before negotiating with the Christian Democrats.

Differences also emerged on the issues of party management, international policy and even on the analysis of terrorism. The split exists and can be seen, and the majority formed at the Turin Congress has been dissolved.

It is, however, still to soon to speculate on the outcome. Craxi is considering an extraordinary congress within a short time, while the adversaries say that the Central Committee has the power to rectify the political line and, as demanded by Ballardini, also to elect a new secretary.

L'UNITA: WORLD DISPUTES BETWEEN SUPERPOWERS, NOT BLOCS

LD111239 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 9 Jan 80 p 15 LD

[Alberto Jacoviello dispatch: "USSR and United States More Alone"]

[Excerpts] Washington--The meetings of the UN General Assembly on Afghanistan and of the Security Council on Iran are, in effect, becoming linked. Monday evening the USSR suffered a heavy political defeat. The motion introduced by five nonalined countries deploring the foreign intervention in Afghanistan and demanding the withdrawal of troops without explicitly mentioning the Soviet Union received 13 votes in favor and 2 against. These latter votes came from the Moscow and GDR representatives. Troyanovskiy had to resort to his right of veto to stop it. Now another motion is ready, calling for a debate and vote in the General Assembly. It is likely that the document blocked Monday will be passed in the next few days. The alinement is too broad to suggest any possibility of a sudden change of positions. It would be the first time the Third World and the USSR have been so clearly divided. Nevertheless, this does not mean that the nonalined world is now uniting around the United States. The very fact that the motion presented to the Security Council differed from the one Washington had hoped for clearly shows that the majority of nonalined countries, while adopting a position consistent with the movement's principles, is still keen to stand apart from the United States and avoid becoming involved in the cold war spiral which now seems to have formed between the two superpowers. The White House is expressing satisfaction with the split between Moscow and the majority of the nonalined capitals. But at the same time it is being careful not to regard this as an indication of a change of course.

Irrespective of how things go at the General Assembly meeting on Afghanistan and the Security Council meeting on Iran, the fact remains that the international scenario has changed considerably in little over a week. There is one central element above all: The deterioration of relation between Moscow and Washington. In the U.S. capital it is forecast that it will be a long time before we can talk of a return to the previous atmosphere. But apart from this central element, there are others which should be stressed. As has been said, over Afghanistan the historical alliance between the USSR and the nonalined countries has suffered a setback, but the alliance within the Western World has not been strengthened. On the contrary. It is true that the "Atlantic" countries did back the U.S. position on the Soviet intervention at the United Nations. But it is also true that "none" of the measures adopted by Carter against the USSR have also been adopted by America's allied and friendly countries. None. This indicates two facts. First, that for many European countries the possibility of being dragged into a cold war with the USSR is anything but reassuring. Second, in these same countries President Carter's international action prompts--and this is nothing new--several very serious worries. Hence the Europeans' caution with respect to the U.S. administration's moves. This was clearly expressed by the French foreign minister. But it is also spreading through other capitals.

To sum up, therefore, while one must talk in terms of a return to the cold war in an initial assessment of what has happened since the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, one must also add that we have not reached the "bloc versus bloc" situation which characterized the sixties. The scope for autonomous action is now much greater than it was then. This is a fact which could become extremely important since while, as the Americans say, we are moving toward a period in which all local conflicts will eventually have negative repercussions on relations between the superpowers, this does not necessarily mean that the rest of the world would be involved. We are therefore moving toward an unprecedented kind of future--marked negatively by the harshness of relations between the USSR and the United States, but perhaps positively by the possible broadening an extension of autonomous stances throughout the world.

FOREIGN MINISTER ADDRESSES PARLIAMENT, OUTLINES POLICY

[Live relay from Portuguese parliament, including address by Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Prof Freitas do Amaral]

[Excerpts] [Amaral] The international situation is neither calm nor lacking in abundant negative aspects at this time when the government is beginning its work. The proliferation of local hotbeds of conflict, the intensification of the political and military expansionism of the Soviet Union, the resulting worsening of East-West relations, the current developments in Iran, the continuing Israeli-Arab conflict, the worsening of the oil crisis and the resumption of the arms race, among other things, clearly show how delicate and worrisome the current international situation is, so delicate and worrisome indeed that President Carter has already described it as the gravest world crisis since World War II, that President Giscard d'Estaing stated on the first day of the new year that there is a potential threat of war, and that, elsewhere, similar statements have been made by the governments of Yugoslavia, the PRC and many Third World countries.

It is to be hoped, however, that the nations and their governments may be capable of averting worse by respecting, above everything else, the overriding importance of peace, and by subordinating their conduct to the universally accepted principles of international law.

Such was the substance of the [word indistinct] and enlightened message addressed to the whole of mankind a few days ago by Pope John Paul II, whose appeals for peace, justice and truth based on the full guarantee of human rights the Portuguese Government fully endorses, supports and, if it may be permitted so to do, adopts as its own.

The sudden worsening of the international situation in the last few weeks is, in the opinion of the Portuguese Government, to be blamed fully on the Soviet Union which, in blatant violation of the UN Charter and of all the other relevant international norms of conduct, invaded Afghanistan with its regular army and there carried out a coup by overthrowing the country's government and replacing it with another, thus suppressing the independence and freedom of a people who up to now constituted a sovereign state.

Upon taking office on 3 January the government was thus confronted with a situation that gravely threatened international peace and security and which, strangely enough, had not drawn from the previous government the condemnation that was imperatively due and, on the contrary, had evoked from the prime minister on her last day in office, public comments that revealed a benevolent and very understanding approach to the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan.

The government decided that it ought to react promptly, on the one hand, in order not to allow the unacceptable statements made by the prime minister of the fifth government to be seen at home and in the international community as representing the official or semiofficial stand of the Portuguese authorities on the matter, and, on the other hand, to make it clear that the Portuguese Government firmly repudiates the resounding violation of international law perpetrated by the Soviet Union and that it is not prepared to contribute, by implementing a foreign policy based on omissions and ambiguities, to weakening the NATO'S southern flank in the face of the growing Soviet threat to the Western world. [applause]

The government is aware of the goals of the so-called Finlandization of Europe pursued at present by the Warsaw Pact, and wishes to make it quite clear that Portugal for its part will do its utmost to oppose this strategy and will fight it vigorously and without the slightest wavering. We are therefore in favor of everything that may boost the Western world's defense capability and thus will unreservedly support the strengthening of NATO in the present circumstances.

The recall to Lisbon of the Portuguese ambassador to Moscow for consultations should be seen and understood in the light of what I have just said. It was a way of expressing, by the diplomatic means customary in such cases, the stand of public condemnation adopted by the Portuguese authorities; furthermore, it was also a necessary decision in order to facilitate an overall reappraisal of Portugal's policy toward the Soviet Union in the diplomatic, cultural and commercial spheres. [words indistinct] a reappraisal the results of which in due course will be announced to this house and to the country.

We do not intend to adopt drastic measures or extreme solutions but we have the right and the duty to appraise, in the light of our beliefs, the extent to which the previous governments placed--or failed to place--the intransigent defense of Portugal's interests above the naive tendency to make unilateral concessions or pursue a policy of unilateral detente characterized by successive concessions in which the West is either standing still or retreating and the communist bloc is constantly advancing.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs intends to carry out this overall reappraisal with respect to all the countries of the Warsaw Pact and its satellites. However, the Afghan crisis naturally makes it advisable that we start with the Soviet Union, and this we shall do.

Mr Speaker, honorable members: What I have just said with regard to the international crisis we are currently witnessing will already shed some light on some of the main aspects of Portugal's foreign policy that it is my duty to emphasize before this house.

First, it was evident from the Afghan issue and will be generally evident henceforth that the government feels--and is--solid with the Western world, for this represents a European and an Atlantic country that has always expressed, by great majorities, its support for such a basic line of action--a line of action that is naturally and effortlessly in keeping with the vocation and temperament of the Portuguese nation and with the structural imperatives stemming from its history, its geographic location and its culture and civilisation.

Second, it was evident from the Afghan issue and will be generally evident hereafter that the government intends to pursue a clear and unambiguous foreign policy that will contrast in no uncertain way with the equivocations, waverings and uncertainties that have marked the international action of our country since summer 1978. It has already been stated that the major options of Portugal's foreign policy are such as to leave no doubts in anyone's mind. We believe, however, that the conduct of Portugal's foreign policy in the last 18 months has been a source of doubts and perplexity to the majority of Portuguese and Portugal's allies.

I wish to make it quite clear here and now, both to our supporters and to our critics, I wish to state directly and categorically, as was stated during the electoral campaign that put us in office, that our foreign policy will be clearly pro-European and pro-West. It will therefore lack the slightest trace of any pro-Third World stances of nonalinement or of any aloofness or distancing with regard to our consciously accepted and freely upheld Atlantic responsibilities. [applause]

[Reporter] As happened on the two previous occasions, the applause came from the benches of the Democratic Alliance.

[Amaral] It was evident in the Afghan issue and will be generally evident henceforth that the government intends to take full control in directing foreign policy without leaving it to other organs of sovereignty as was done by previous administrations.

In contrast with the provisions of the 1933 Constitution, which laid down that direction of foreign policy was by right under the president of the republic's jurisdiction, the 1976 Constitution allocates this responsibility to the government. And, as stated in the program submitted to this house for debate, the government will naturally respect the responsibilities the Constitution gives to the president of the republic, the Assembly of the Republic and the Council of the Revolution, in limited terms and for specific purposes only, in the sphere of the state's international action. But apart from such limited and specific areas, the overall responsibility for conducting foreign policy falls to the government and the government will assume it fully.

Moreover, the need for a uniform foreign policy is an operational norm demanded by the greater dignity of the state and by the consistency and effectiveness of the international role to be played by Portugal. For this reason, the government will also oppose, with all the powers available, the former practice of parallel diplomacies, which serves to cast the country into international disrepute, upsets the internal operation of the state and is in fact incompatible with paragraph A of article 138 of the Constitution, which stipulates that special envoys can be appointed only on the basis of a government proposal to that effect. Parallel diplomacies must therefore come to an end.

Mr Speaker, honorable members: The rapid and complete integration of Portugal into the European Economic Community as a full member is this government's main international goal and will henceforth have the topmost priority in Portuguese foreign policy. Hence, for the first time in our country the post of secretary of state for European integration has been created in the administration.

I would like to emphasize that, as far as we are concerned--and contrary to the views of others on the matter--integration in Europe should not be viewed as an inevitable and irreversible historical process nor as an unavoidable geostrategic imperative. Even remaining in the Western camp, Portugal could, if it so wished, adopt another, alternate role without joining the Common Market as a full member. Therefore, as far as we are concerned, Portugal's full integration into the EEC does not signify the reluctant acceptance of the only possible solution but rather is the free and enlightened choice from the best of the various solutions available; it does not represent an act of submission to an irresistible fate, but rather the choice of a new collective destiny that attracts us because it is in Europe that we see the model of society, the levels of well-being and the mind of civilization and culture to which we aspire for our political system, our social framework and our point of departure toward the development of Portugal and toward a better future for our children.

It is certainly no happenstance, but rather due precisely to the reasons that I have listed, that I have been told that the Council of Europe proposes to support the organization of a major international exhibition in Lisbon on the theme of the age of discoveries. The previous governments were either not interested in this initiative or unable to bring it about. This government will do so. And it will do so for two main reasons: First, it wishes to enhance the importance of the cultural heritage of the Portuguese nation, and above all our history--the latter so misrated in 1975 and still today so badly in need of resuming its rightful place in the life of a nation yearning to overcome once and for all the identity crisis into which it was thrown.

Second, we wish to show Europe that, in our opinion, the united Europe of the future, while admittedly requiring a sound economic and financial basis, must not, nevertheless, confine itself to the narrow material boundaries of business organization, profits and money. Europe cannot become just a framework for trade. It must also, and above all, be a multinational center of culture and an exemplary focus of civilization. [applause]

Mr Speaker, honorable members: For the reasons and in the context that I have described, the government proposes to pursue a policy of clear and unequivocal affirmation of Portugal's European vocation, accepting this vocation to the fullest, that is to say, with all the direct and indirect consequences, both political and economic, connected with this option.

The government therefore intends to speed up the negotiations with the council of the European Communities and intensify bilateral contacts with the member countries. To this end, and following my coming visit to Strasbourg to chair the session of the ministerial committee of the Council of Europe, I shall travel to Rome in the near future to meet the current president of the council of the European Communities and shall be present in Brussels on 5 February to represent the Portuguese Government at the first session of negotiations at ministerial level held since negotiations began on the already distant date of 17 October 1978. I also hope to receive in Lisbon in February a visit from the vice president of the EEC commission in charge of negotiations with membership candidates, Lorenzo Natali.

These first initiatives represent the government's firm resolve to impart a strong political impetus to the process of Portugal's integration with Europe.

Mr Speaker, honorable members: Although Europe and European integration have the topmost priority in Portugal's foreign policy, the latter will simultaneously develop in other directions and on other levels. I think that the program's principles are quite clear but I shall take the opportunity to clarify some doubts raised in this house during the previous session.

I would start by reaffirming that the government has the greatest interest in maintaining and deepening what our Constitution describes as the special ties of friendship and cooperation with the Portuguese-speaking countries. The government will regard those ties on the basis of a relationship among states and not on any other basis, be it personal, partisan or ideological, that would be out of place and inviable. Moreover, the policy to be pursued vis-a-vis the new Portuguese-speaking countries will be based on a philosophy of respect for national sovereignty, of mutual noninterference in internal affairs and also, as far as we Portuguese are concerned, of safeguarding national dignity.

The friendship or cooperation agreements already signed will be honored and other initiatives deemed relevant will be taken. The outstanding problematic economic and financial issues will be examined and negotiations proposed.

As for the policy toward Arab countries, I would like to say that it is the government's firm intention to maintain and expand existing relations and seek to establish them where none exist. We shall not be doing so solely--nor indeed mainly--for economic reasons but also because these are countries whose civilization has left a profound mark on our history and in the history of mankind, countries whose spirituality and culture we much admire and whose role in maintaining world balance and peace has become increasingly enhanced and cannot fail to be taken into account as a foremost factor in contemporary international realities.

Mr Speaker, honorable members: the short amount of time available will not allow me to dwell at length--as I would have wished--on the question of emigration and the communities of Portuguese throughout the world. However, this does not mean that the problem is receiving less attention than it merits, for I always intend to place it at the forefront of the objectives and activities of my department.
Indeed, I believe that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs must no longer be limited to the role of instrument of international diplomacy. Rather, it must become an organization geared to a parallel special role of support for all Portuguese living or temporarily residing abroad. Only thus shall we be able to meet the real needs of our emigrants who must not continue to be treated as a mere source of remittances and should instead be viewed as human beings with all manner of needs, as Portuguese wishing to maintain very close links with their motherland and as full-fledged Portuguese citizens whose full civic and political rights must not continue to be illegitimately and scandalously disregarded. [applause]

The government is aware of the intentions of the parliamentary majority with regard to the submission for ratification and revision of the legislation on the situation of Portuguese abroad. The government will support such initiatives and would indeed ask the honorable members to introduce the necessary amendments to said legislation so as to place under the government's jurisdiction, which they should never have left, the legal powers pertaining to celebration of the day of the [Portuguese] communities and the holding of the congress of the [Portuguese] communities which are at present held by the Council of the Revolution or by some of its members. [applause]

Mr Speaker, honorable members: I should like to conclude by returning to my opening theme of the international crisis. At this difficult time of the worsening international crisis, my concluding words will be words of hope that developments may be kept under control, thus preserving the invaluable asset of peace. Portugal still has hopes; hopes in the good sense, the sense of responsibility and self-control of the world's politicians and rulers; hopes, above all, in the good will of men.

Portugal, a Christian country, does not forget that peace has one day heralded on earth to all men of good will. [applause]

GOVERNMENT SEEKS TO RESTORE IMPORTS OF USSR OIL

LD142234 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 14 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The sixth government's activities in the sphere of foreign policy have been characterized by the launching of several diplomatic initiatives specially designed to improve Portugal's relations with the Arab countries. This goal has more or less been a constant of the foreign policy pursued by successive constitutional governments and is now of even greater importance in view of the need to secure regular supplies of crude oil from oil-producing countries. This is indeed one of the main problems facing Sa Carneiro's government. The supply of over 3 million tons of oil, amounting to one-third of the country's annual consumption, has yet to be secured. In order to overcome these problems the government has already appointed Engineer Pires de Miranda as roving ambassador with the specific mission to make representations to the oil-producing countries to that effect.

As is known, our present difficulties in purchasing crude oil have worsened following the decision taken by the Soviet Union, one of our main suppliers, to halve the amount of oil supplied to foreign countries this year. Portugal can only count on 450,000 tons of oil this year from the Soviet Union.

In an attempt to obtain significant changes in the Soviet Union's decision and, as far as possible, to secure the import of an amount of oil similar to last year's, a PETROGAL [state oil refinery] delegation is currently in Moscow. The Soviet decision is prior to, and has n othing to do with the Portuguese Government's reaction to Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. It is not known, however, whether this reaction, described by some opposition circles as megalomaniacal, has affected or even jeopardized the negotiations of the PETROGAL mission to Moscow.

PCP ORGAN SCORES U.S., PRC, PAKISTAN MOVES ON AFGHAN ISSUE

LD111111 Lisbon AVANTE in Portuguese 3 Jan 80 p 11 LD

[Unattributed commentary: "Slander and Defamation in Imperialist Campaign Against Afghan Revolution"]

[Text] Afghanistan is again becoming the target for an imperialist campaign against the revolution and the leftwing forces in the country. President Amin's regime having been overthrown, the new Afghan leaders sought the Soviet Union's military aid to defend the revolutionary state against an enemy protected and armed by other countries. The attacks and slanders of imperialism's most aggressive circles are being directed through the Afghan revolution against the socialist countries' policy of peace and disarmament.

CIA agents and Chinese experts on subversive operations were supporting the counterrevolutionaries in Afghanistan. Possessing virtually unlimited resources in provisions, weapons, ammunition and money, armed gangs, organized on Pakistani territory, were attacking Afghan territory.

The United States, the PRC and Pakistan are involved in the armed operations against the Afghan revolution. According to reports from the most diverse sources, U.S. imperialist circles are leading a campaign of slander against Afghanistan, seeking to distract world attention from the aggressive actions against Iran, where imperialist personalities and circles are seeking at all costs to regain the positions which they lost with the fall of the shah.

A communique issued by the new Afghan Government points out the legitimacy which is on its side in the defense of a sovereign state. Within the framework of the UN Charter, no power can deprive Afghanistan of the right to defend itself, resorting to the external aid which it deems necessary. The Soviet military contingent, whose presence was requested solely to assist in the defense of that right, will remain in Afghanistan as long as is necessary and will leave the country as soon as the armed incursions and provocations from abroad cease.

In the meantime, the maneuvers of interference in Afghan internal affairs are continuing, with the aim of maintaining the famous "strategic belt" of U.S. imperialism near the Soviet Union's border, specifically through the influence of NATO and of the forces serving it. To this end, the U.S. administration has sent the deputy secretary of state to Europe.

In the meantime, an increase in U.S. arms [deliveries] has been announced in Pakistan. This move is such that it has compelled the Indian Government to summon the U.S. ambassador to India for consultations.

As far as the overthrown government in Kabul is concerned, the new Afghan authorities have revealed the brutal repression carried out by it and blame it for the deaths of thousands of people, including hundreds of workers' leaders and militants.

SUAREZ REPORTS ON RESULTS OF TALKS WITH CARTER

PA151406 Madrid EFE in Spanish 0946 GMT 15 Jan 80 PA

[Text] Madrid, 15 Jan (EFE)--Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez returned from Washington this morning. He said here he agreed with President Jimmy Carter that "all possible efforts to achieve detente and international peace and security should be made."

"In my opinion the trip was very good," Suarez said. Yesterday he held several work sessions with President Carter, Vice President Mondale, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski.

"During the talks," the Spanish prime minister added, "we broached and analyzed each of the areas of tension in the world: The Soviet invasion in Afghanistan, its repercussions throughout the Persian Gulf, the situation of the U.S. hostages in Iran, the Mideast crisis and the way to reach a settlement of that crisis, and the political, economic and even the strategic and security effects of those tensions on almost all nations."

"The United States also discussed the special friendly relations existing between Spain and Latin America and also Spain's friendly relations with the Arab world."

Suarez added that "during a work session we reviewed bilateral relations but he insisted that the key point of the talks was an exchange of information on the positions of the Spanish and American governments on the main points of the crisis that the world at large is experiencing.

"At the suggestion of the United States," Suarez remarked, "we decided to promote the maximum exchange of points of view between the two governments and personal exchanges between President Carter and myself."

Asked about the communiques on the visit, President Suarez replied: "one thing they do is state the need for the two parties to make every possible effort to achieve detente and international peace and security."

Regarding possible Spanish proposals, Prime Minister Suarez noted: "I primarily introduced a number of suggestions and proposals on the Middle East which, in a way, reflect the thrust of UN Resolution 242 and the recognition of the national rights of the Palestinian people and all countries in the area to live within definitive, safe borders."

Concerning the Spanish-American treaty, he said: "We are still starting to probe the principles for the formulation of the new treaty."

In conclusion, Prime Minister Suarez referred to the international scene: "The international situation is tense and obviously worrisome."

The Spanish Government leader's visit to Washington lasted only 6 hours. His first interview with Jimmy Carter was held in private at the Oval Office.

Press Secretary Jody Powell described the meeting as "very cordial and productive" and noted that both political figures agreed to hold periodic meetings.

Responds to Questions

LD151142 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] At 0602 this morning Prime Minister Suarez returned to Madrid, concluding his lightning visit to Washington. There was no formal press conference, but the prime minister did make a statement during the short walk from the aircraft to the car taking him to Moncloa Palace:

[Begin recording] [Question] In the final communique, prime minister, it says that both countries will study concrete measures for the defense of the West. [passage indistinct]

[Answer] No. I don't think the communique says that we have agreed on concrete measures. One of the things we agreed was that both parties would make all possible efforts--and we say this in the communique--to achieve a relaxation of tension, peace and international security. [passage indistinct]

[Question] Prime minister, how would you describe the international situation after this meeting with President Carter?

[Answer] Well, I think that the situation is tense and obviously worrisome. That's how I would describe it.

[Question] And what about parliament?

[Answer] Well, there will be no meeting of the Congress of Deputies until next month.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON SUAREZ' TALKS IN U.S.

LD151342 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Barely 1 hour after the arrival of Prime Minister Suarez in Madrid, Secretary of State for Information Josep Melia read the following official communique:

[Begin Melia recording] During these talks the two leaders expressed their concern over recent events which have seriously worsened the international situation: The Afghanistan crisis and its negative repercussions in the area of the Persian Gulf, the problem of the Middle East and possible ways of reaching a solution there, as well as other areas of tension which affect the Mediterranean and North Africa. Prime Minister Suarez made it known that apart from repercussions of a strategic kind, the continuance of the situation constitutes a serious political and economic threat to international stability. The subject of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, an Islamic, nonalined country which is the victim of armed aggression which violates the UN Charter and the principles of peaceful coexistence, was discussed.

Regarding the situation in Iran, the prime minister expressed his hope that the hostages will be released unharmed. The hostages are being held in violation of international law and the agreements which regulate diplomatic relations. President Carter expressed his thanks for the Spanish Government's efforts to put an end to this (?serious) violation of human rights and the norms which regulate coexistence between states.

The subject of the Middle East was also discussed in the talks. Prime Minister Suarez told the U.S. authorities that in order to overcome the present crisis and to stabilize the whole region it is necessary to move toward an overall solution of the problem. In this respect, he expressed the Spanish Government's view that a solution must be based on the principles contained in Resolution 242 of the Security Council, and must include reocnition of the Palestinian people's national rights and the right of all peoples of the area to live in peace, within secure frontiers which are internationally recognized. Prime Minister Suarez explained in detail to the U.S. President the Spanish position on the Western Sahara. He said it is necessary to stabilize this region which lies on the periphery of the Middle East, and to settle the conflict. The reduction of tension in the Mahgreb and fruitful cooperation between all the peoples of the area will contribute to greater solidarity in the Arab world and will have favorable repercussions throughout the whole Mediterranean area.

On the international situation, President Carter recognized the special relations which exist between Spain and the countries of Latin America whose recent solidarity he (?particularly) welcomed.

On arrival in Madrid the prime minister expressed his satisfaction with the atmosphere of friendship and trust in which the talks took place. He said that the two sides stressed the need to maintain and strengthen the West's solidarity at the present moment; to work together and hold consultations [words indistinct] between the two countries; and to work in favor of peace, detente and international cooperation. Suarez said that the decision to establish frequent personal contacts will contribute, without any doubt, to a better understanding between the United States and Spain and to an understanding of international problems. PSOE DELEGATION RETURNS FROM WASHINGTON EARLY

[Text] The deputy secretary general of the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party, (PSOE), Alfonso Guerra, returned from the United States this evening, thus suspending a visit at the invitation of the U.S. Government that should have lasted till 30 January. From Madrid's airport Alfonso Guerra went to PSOE headquarters, where the usual Federal Executive Committee meeting is being held. The PSOE deputy secretary general presented a report to the Executive Committee on his visit to the United States, which was suspended because of the uneasiness of the Socialist delegates at what they consider the nonfulfillment of obligations by Washington authorities in the meetings planned for this visit.

HURD RETURNS FROM NATO TALKS ON OLYMPICS

[Text] Foreign Office Minister Mr Douglas Hurd returned to London tonight from Brussels after NATO talks on moving the Olympic games from Moscow or organising a boycott. No decision was reached and no communique was issued, but officials in London stressed that this was not unexpected. It was intended to be a stocktaking meeting to examine the prospects.

Mr Hurd said before leaving that he had heard "a variety of views" at the NATO meeting. Observers saw this as an indication that at least some countries were less than willing to try to punish Russia for the invasion of Afghanistan by taking action on the Olympic games. Mr Hurd also told reporters that, having heard the views of the other NATO countries, Britain would consider what measures might be taken. He gave no indication of what they might be.

Mr Hurd will now report to his ministerial colleagues. Tomorrow he will see Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour, who was also in Brussels today, for a Common Market meeting. This meeting agreed to suspend food aid to the Soviet Union and the Common Market Commission was asked to propose further measures.

It is expected that Mrs Thatcher and ministers will examine what further action can be taken against the Soviet Union at a Cabinet meeting on Thursday.

MPS START CAMPAIGNS FOR BOYCOTT, TRANSFER OF OLYMPICS

LD151252 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1129 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] MPs from all the main political parties have now signed Commons motions calling for a boycott or a transfer of the Moscow Olympics to another venue because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The signatories range from left wing Labour to the right wing of the Conservative Party, and include also Liberal and Ulster Unionist MPs.

The government's own attitude to taking part is hardening and it is exploring the possibility of a united boycott with other nations at two crucial meetings in Brussels today. The meetings are of the Common Market foreign ministers and the NATO Council.

Ministers know they cannot stop any British athletes who are determined to compete in Moscow. But they feel that if a boycott call wins the support of other Western allies with the United States and Britain as well as Third World countries which have already condemned the Soviet action the pressure would be sufficient to make the athletes withdraw.

Conservative MP Mr Michael Colvin (Bristol North West) has attracted the support of 60 members--mostly Conservative--for a motion condemning the "Russian aggression" and urging the British Olympic Association to reconsider taking part in this year's Moscow games. It wants the International Olympic Committee to be reconvened with a view to finding alternative venues for the games, "thus denying the Soviet Union the use of an important propaganda weapon."

Mr Colvin says this would remind the Russian people of the seriousness with which the free nations of the West view their government's action in attacking a neighbouring state in total violation of the United Nations Charter." Among MPs supporting the motion is former Labour Minister Mr James Wellbeloved and Unionist leader Mr James Molyneaux.

Another cross-party motion supported by 41 MPs says simply that "the 1980 Olympic games should be held somewhere other than Moscow." This has the support of Tories, Liberals, Ulster Unionists and Labour MPs, including Shadow Education Minister Mr Neil Kinnock.

A third cross-party motion signed so far by six MPs calls on the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops and says the International Olympic Committee should suspend the holding of the games in Moscow. It says the games should be transferred to a country "that upholds the true spirit of international sportsmanship" and adds that all governments should re-examine the whole range of their relationships with the Soviet Union in the diplomatic, political and commercial fields.

Right wing Conservative MP Mr Nicholas Winterton has tabled a motion calling on national Olympic committees to withdraw from Moscow. His motion also calls for an end to all food sales to the Soviet Union by the Common Market and the United States and for an application to be made to the United Nations for economic sanctions on the Soviet Union.

[Text] An all-party "hands off Afghanistan" campaign was launched in the Commons this afternoon pledging itself not to allow "this defenceless country to become a forgotten victim of Soviet military power."

The campaign, which includes names from the arts and academic worlds as well as politicians, is urging, as one of its first acts, the transfer of the Olympic games from Moscow in response to this "brutal Soviet aggression".

One of the co-chairmen Mr James Wellbeloved, Labour MP from Erith and Crayford, said it was not the campaign's object to boycott the games.

He said "we think it would be intolerable if the Olympics were to proceed in Moscow, because it would be seen as an act condoning the Soviet naked aggression in Afghanistan."

And one of the joint secretaries, Mr Ray Whitney, Conservative MP for Wycombe said "we cannot hide any longer behind the phrase 'sport is higher than politics'. We do not envisage any seven-day wonder in our campaign, but something sustained until Soviet aggression against Afghanistan ceases."

Mr Winston Churchill, Conservative MP for Manchester's Stretford, one of the sponsors, commented, "It would be as unacceptable for the 1980 Olympics to be held in Moscow as it was for the 1936 games to be held in Berlin, for very similar reasons."

FOREIGN MINISTER VOICES HOPE FOR RESUMPTION OF DIALOG

NC152233 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 15 Jan 80 NC

[Excerpts] Foreign Minister Rolandhis stated tonight that our main goal in the new year is the resumption of the intercommunal dialog and that the solution must be based upon the principles that the two sides have declared--the principles of a biregional federation in an independent, integral, united and well-governed state in which justice and objectivity prevail for all citizens. The foreign minister said this in a speech at a Lions Club gathering in Limassol tonight.

Mr Rolandhis then welcomed the response of the chairman of the Democratic Rally, Mr Kliridhis, that he return to the National Council and said that, despite Kliridhis' allegation, obstacles remain and that his decision to follow a policy of detente blunts the domestic political climate. The minister then stressed the importance of the participation of all parties in the National Council, saying that in this way we may find some common denominator; that is, those procedures that may not be ideal for all but are acceptable.

Mr Rolandhis referred to today's international situation in relation to Cyprus and said that the various treaties and oppositions are creating tremors that reach our coasts. He said: Thus, in the case of our small country, even if the domestic rift of the past is forgotten or healed, there is always the danger that we will return to the disorder of divergences because of the pressure of international political currents. This is why great attention must be paid to keeping the vessel afloat.

The minister also referred to the resolutions of the international organizations and said that they must be valued and implemented correctly. They are valuable because they offer us political and economic protection, recognition, foundation and preservation; but they cannot be implemented. Even if they were implemented by force, he added, I wonder how beneficial such implementation could be. He continued: If our problem is solved and the sacred hour of return comes, this return must be certain and secure and not constitute a new adventure. Such a certain return, he concluded, can only be secured with an agreement.

GREEK CYPRIOTS PROTEST PLAN TO REOPEN FAMAGUSTA HOTELS

NC161055 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 16 Jan 80 NC

[Text] By means of special resolutions, the displaced people of Famagusta have appealed to the UN secretary general, Greece and Britain as guarantor powers, and the governments of the permanent member states of the Security Council, to intervene in the threatened Turkish colonization of Famagusta and the opening of Greek Cypriot owned hotels, asking that they exercise their influence on Turkey to abandon its intransigent policy and to agree to the immediate resumption of the intercommunal talks.

The resolutions were handed this morning to representatives of the above powers by a delegation of the inhabitants of Famagusta, following a picketing procession held in Nicosia as a step in the campaign to foil Turkish efforts to colonize Famagusta.

DENKTAS REPLIES TO KIPRIANOU RAPPROCHEMENT MEASURES

TA151636 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 15 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, has said the Federated State is ready to discuss with the Greek Cypriot administration in the south the issue of rapprochement between the two communities.

According to ANATOLLIA AGENCY, Denktas today replied to the statement made by the leader of the Greek Cypriot administration, Spiros Kiprianou, which was broadcast on the Greek Cypriot television and radio last night. In his statement, Kiprianou announces a series of measures which he claimed would secure a rapprochement between the two communities.

Denktas said the Turkish Cypriot authorities favorably received the proposal made by the leader of the Greek Cypriot administration in the south, Kiprianou, regarding old-age pensions for eligible Turkish Cypriots--whose rights have been usurped by the Greek Cypriot administration for 16 years--who would be paid out of the social insurance fund. Denktas added: To this end, the appropriate officials of the Turkish Cypriot Social Services Department have been authorized to prepare the necessary list of claimants and to meet with their Greek Cypriot counterparts at Ledra Palace under the auspices of UN officials at a time to be set with Kiprianou. The proposal to reintegrate Turkish Cypriots into the social insurance scheme can be discussed at this meeting. The meeting cannot just conclude with the announcement that Turkish Cypriots--whose rights have been unjustly usurped for 16 years--will be reintegrated into the social insurance scheme. A functional and guaranteed system should be devised by the two administrations.

Recalling that the Turkish Cypriot community had formulated its own social insurance system, Denktas said substantial work was necessary to harmonize the Greek Cypriot and the Turkish Cypriot social insurance systems, the latter of which has been in effect for the last 3 and 1/2 years. Noting that the delegation to be sent to Ledra Palace will have authority in regard to this issue as well, Denktas said: The representative of the Turkish Federated State to be sent to Ledra Palace will be ready to discuss with his Greek Cypriot counterparts the measures concerning the payment of the usurped old-age pensions. Denktas added that Turkish Cypriot officials are ready to continue official talks with their Greek Cypriot counterparts on similar issues in the light of the agreements and courses of action reached in regard to the social insurance issue. Meanwhile, Denktas reiterated the Turkish Cypriot proposal to form a provisional joint government.

TURKISH CYPRIOT MINISTER REPLIES TO ROLANDHIS SPEECH

[Text] Turkish Cypriot Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol talked to a correspondent of Bayrak Radio in connection with the speech made by Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhis in Limassol last night. Atakol said that Rolandhis' speech had certain positive aspects. The Turkish Cypriot foreign minister pointed out that in his speech Rolandhis had for the first time not insisted on the UN resolutions, to which the Greek Cypriots knew the Turkish Cypriots would not agree; that he had correctly assessed the problem of the refugees, which was resolved with the 1975 agreement of population exchange; and that in the speech there was a spirit of having accepted the principle that the two communities would live in separate regions.

Atakol expressed the hope that such views and approaches to the problem would further develop and help northern and southern Cyprus, created as a result of erroneous policies, come to the negotiating table with a realistic attitude. Atakol stressed that an appeal for the establishment of an interim joint government would be the most realistic step and that, in this way, the world would stop seeing a false image of Cyprus and the problems and propaganda [word indistinct] created artificially by the so-called [Greek Cypriot] Government. Atakol then noted that there was no problem that necessitated pressure in connection with the issue of Maras [Varosha]. He added: There is a political leadership that stops the hotel owners who want to return to their hotels. One must be realistic and reasonable regarding this matter.

I VRADHINI SCORES PAPANDREOU PERFORMANCE IN PARLIAMENT

[From the "Evening" column: "Can He Seriously..."]

[Text] Two days after the great parliamentary debate on our foreign policy, one would have difficulty finding in many of yesterday's morning newspapers any analyses or comments on this issue. Yet, no significant news item had intervened between Friday and yesterday, and the critical nature of foreign problems was recognized by all political leaders during the debate.

Therefore, how can one explain the fact that a significant segment of the press avoided dealing with Friday's debate? Could it be because no stirring revelations were made? But if no revelations were made, no recriminations noted and there were no sharp exchanges, it does not mean that there is no need for analysis. On the contrary. Many conclusions can be drawn from a debate that was conducted in a low tone, but which also added very interesting essential facts for the public's edification.

The debate's downgrading by several Sunday newspapers consequently cannot possibly be based on a journalistic evaluation. Rather it must have been based on evaluations of party expediency, because there has been a general ascertainment that, more than ever before, the PASOK chairman was unfortunate in Parliament. The newspapers which most zealously support the opposition's viewpoints judged that the less talk there is about the debate the better for PASOK. The small "rearguard battle," in an effort to somewhat cover up Papandreou's two great "blunders"--regarding recourses to the United Nations about the Cyprus issue, and about the nuclear arsenal which does not exist in Soudha--does not change the picture.

Of course, Karamanlis did not try to transform Friday's debate into a battle of impressions. Had he sought to do so, the PASOK chairman would have been compelled to leave the podium--his positions were so contradictory and incoherent, the evidence he produced was so inaccurate, and his arguments were so weak. The prime minister, however, desired to define specifically the government's foreign policy in view of the serious outstanding foreign issues. His speech was intended also for foreigners and for this reason he avoided recriminations and gave a calm tone to the debate.

Thus the unrealistic and irresponsible positions of the PASOK chairman were not directly noted except for a few observations which were more like warning shots than concentrated attacks. The positions were, however, expounded and the prime minister's direct interventions are not necessary in order to analyze them. This column will continue its notes in the belief that the debate on Friday, which fortunately was broadcast on television, will shed light on many things. It will intensify the question of whether the PASOK chairman's positions can possibly constitute the object of a serious discussion, and the uneasiness about this country's future should the Greek people ever be misled into giving to A. Papandreou's movement the opportunity to implement its incoherent foreign policy. We are afraid that then adventures will not be far off.

When we make these judgments we are not so much influenced by the PASOK chairman's "blunders" during the debate on Friday as by his more general positions.

Is it possible to discuss seriously the PASOK chairman's effort to exceed even the KKE in pro-Sovietism only a few days after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, which he himself was forced to disapprove?

Is it possible to seriously discuss (his) disapproval of the Greek Government's coendorsement of a recourse to the Security Council regarding an invasion he himself had disapproved?

Is it possible to seriously discuss the PASOK claim that it had never said that it wants Greece to be severed from Western Europe and that it desires equal relations with the west, east, north and south? But PASOK strikes out daily against the West, it strikes out daily against Western Europe, against the United States, against China, sometimes even against the Soviet Union. What is left?

Is it possible to seriously discuss the PASOK assessment on the one hand that Turkey's expansionist policy with the support of the United States and NATO constitutes the greatest danger for us, and on the other, that in order to cope with this danger we should join the nonalined? That is, thus to give Turkey the wholehearted support of the West and the United States at our expense?

Is it possible seriously to discuss the PASOK chairman's criticism of the Atlantic alliance's decision to install the "Pershing" and "cruise" missiles in Europe when NATO has 82 battleworthy divisions, 12,200 tanks and 3,162 airplanes, whereas the Warsaw Pact forces appear overwhelmingly superior with 115 battleworthy divisions, 30,750 tanks and 4,980 airplanes?

Still, the questions have not been exhausted and we shall continue.

RIZOSPASTIS CRITICIZES KARAMANLIS ADDRESS TO PARLIAMENT

AT151544 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 15 Jan 80 p 1 AT

[Editorial: "Nonalined National Course"]

[Text] A complete absence of positive prospects regarding the critical problems and future of the country, plus vagueness and uncertainty about the future, put their stamp on the prime minister's speech in parliament--essentially the government's report for an entire 5-year period.

It is true that Karamanlis referred to many and serious issues. However, one searches in vain for an enlightening fact, for some substantive forecast regarding the development of the country's important problems. The prime minister's silence reflected in relief the suffocating deadlocks in Greece's course--fruits of the 5-year administration of national affairs by the government of the right.

In any case, the prime minister's speech was sufficiently clear and complete with regard to Western interests and preoccupations. In the wake of developments in Iran and of Washington's obvious inability to weaken Iran's revolutionary orientation--and only a few days after Washington lamented the failure of its plans in the People's Republic of Afghanistan--Greece exuded a tone of "certainty" and "stability." "Greece," Karamanlis declared, "desires specifically at this moment, when the international situation is truly uneasy, the implementation of the special relationship" (with NATO)--its full and complete reconfinement. So that there would not be margins of doubt regarding the reliability and steadfastness of the government's Atlanticism, he hastened to warn threateningly that: "If Greece is ever severed from the West, it will be led to painful adventures." The doctrine of "we belong to the West," though in different words and "Europeanized," dispelled the myth of some "multidimentional" policy and was officially and undisguisedly proclaimed as the immovable axis of the government's course--the "nation's course" as the progovernment press categorically assured local and foreign "perturbed people."

However, what could be the "painful adventures" which Karamanlis has "prophetically" declared? What kind of "guarantees" and in what direction is the West prepared and ready to offer in exchange? The country's history, old and modern, is confounding. Indeed the country in its postwar course has known many adventures and innumerable hardships, and the prime minister's advice cannot but sound provocative when it is precisely our country's attachment, not "severance" from the West that propelled it, more than once, into the maelstrom of dangerous imperialist adventures up to and including participation in the armed aggression against distant Korea and installation on Greek territory of the means for nuclear disaster and an entire series of bases of death. It has also been the constant source of blunt and undisguised interventions by western "guardians" into the country's internal affairs, with the coup and 7-year fascist dictatorship as their pinnacle; has led to the Cyprus tragedy, the continuing drama of hundreds of thousands of refugees and missing persons; has supported and encouraged constant pressures and extortions by the United States and NATO against our national interests and our relations of good neighborliness and peaceful cooperation with the socialist and Arab countries; and has constituted a permanent brake on every progressive development in the country in all sectors of social life--an inhibiting factor for even the slightest positive step by official Greece in its international relations.

The continuation of this long misery can be the only prospect the West can "guarantee" to our country.

However, if in the past declarations of faith to Atlanticism and devotion to foreign "guardians" merely expressed a detrimental policy, their renewal in present circumstances takes on new, more dangerous dimensions, precisely because it implies the possibility that the country may get entangled directly and totally in the frenzied cold war attack of the Washington-NATO-Beijing axis with drastic consequences for the future of our peoples and resolution of their critical problems.

Indeed, the international situation dictates that we seek "maximum" guarantees for Greece's security. However, above all and mainly, it demands Greece's steady and determined withdrawal from the disastrous road toward which Atlanticism and dependence are leading it. It demands the charting of a nonalined policy of national independence and dignity, active defense of national sovereignty, detente, and peace in the area. It demands the charting of a policy which precisely guarantees and secures a sovereign and proud national course, avoiding subjugating commitments, in accordance with the country's needs and our people's unfulfilled desires.

AT152055 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 14 Jan 80 AT

[Text] The new chief of the National Defense General Staff, General Gratsios, addressed an order of the day in which he noted that the country's armed forces are currently at a high level of training, readiness and morale, due to the indefatigable efforts of military and political personnel. The new chief of the General Staff mentioned that he will make every effort to respond to the demands of the times, and finally stressed that, in the critical times humanity and our country are passing through, it is the duty of everyone--absolutely dedicated to our military task--to provide the Greek people with a feeling of security so that, unencumbered, they can be creative and have a feeling of pride in the strength of the armed forces.

VOTCP CITES SUPPORT FOR AFGHANISTAN, DENOUNCES U.S.

TA160703 (Clandestine) Voice of the Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 16 Jan 80 TA

[Summary] "The Peace Association as well as the Turkish Socialist Workers Party [TSIP] have announced that they support the Afghan revolution. A statement by the Executive Council of the TSIP says the Soviet Union has extended its aid to Afghanistan within the framework of proletarian internationalism. The statement opposed attempts by U.S. imperialism to establish new military pacts in the Middle East. Denouncing the anti-Soviet and anticommunist propaganda campaign by the reactionary circles in our country in connection with the Afghanistan incidents, the statement says that final victory will go to the oppressed peoples who will subdue imperialism.

"The statement by the Peace Association expresses support for the Afghan revolution and adds that the U.S. administration and NATO are using the latest developments in our region as a pretext to intensify their pressures on our country in order to transform it into an aggressive base for use against its neighbors and the Middle Eastern countries." Statements by the NATO's southern flank commander to the effect that the position of the United States in Turkey will not be permitted to deteriorate, as was the case in Iran, are an indication of the way the United States is intending to use its bases in our country.

"In addition to various progressive trade unions affiliated with DISK [Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions] and Turk-Is [Turkish Confederation of Labor], certain independent trade unions have also expressed their support for the revolutionary gains of the Afghan people as well as for the Afghan revolution. This was disclosed in a joint statement by Iplik-Is [a textile union], united Maden-Is [a union of metallurgical workers], united Besin-Is [a union of food industry workers], the Toiling Women's Association and the Youth on the Way to Unity Association." The statement points out that the Turkish proletariat and toilers support Soviet international solidarity.

A march took place in Zonguldak to express solidarity with the Afghan revolution. The demonstration was organized by the progressive youths despite the ban imposed by the Zonguldak governor. Slogans supporting the Afghan revolution were chanted during the march on Gazipasa Avenue. After the event, the police raided the offices of a trade union.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE DEBATES DEFENSE BUDGET

Defense Minister Address

TA151454 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1450 GMT 15 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 15 Jan (AA)--Defense Minister Ahmet Ihban Birincioglu said developments abroad, including those in Afghanistan, required Turkey to be "strong, awake and prepared."

NATO

Speaking during the joint parliamentary committee debate on the defense budget for 1980, the minister said Turkey would stay in NATO as long as its national interest required it. However, he added, Turkey had a right to expect her allies in NATO to be more understanding and to contribute more toward the solution of problems it faces.

Certain problems which seem local in the short run could grow into factors which reduce NATO's effectiveness in the long run, he warned. Interest in Turkey's problems alone was "not enough," he said, adding Turkey expected "concrete results" that would strengthen Turkey's confidence and belief in the alliance.

Defense Cooperation Accord

The basic and three supplementary defense and economic cooperation agreements recently initialed with the United States, the minister said, involved "joint deterrent measures" aimed at defense as required by NATO strategy. The agreements were based on "equality and mutual respect for sovereign rights," he added.

Defense cooperation with the United States would be "limited by commitments to NATO," he explained. If one of the parties to the agreement arrived at the conclusion that the other party had failed to fulfill its commitments as written in the accord, it could abrogate the accord according to the procedures provided therein.

The U.S. contribution to the defense material needs of the Turkish Armed Forces would be established by 5-year programs and by supply programs based on these 5-year periodic programs under the supplementary agreement on defense support, the minister explained.

He noted the joint installations, subject to another supplementary agreement, would function as "Turkish" installations with their officers "controlled" by Turkish commanders. The "details of the joint operation" of these installations would be regulated "separately through implementation agreements," he announced.

Senator, RPP Deputy Comments

TA151453 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1416 GMT 15 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 15 Jan (AA)--The joint parliamentary committee on the budget started debating today the Defense Ministry budget for 1980. Life Senator Kamil Karaveliogiu said terrorist "murder squads" had started to "harass" the martial law administration, and called on the authorities to declare a campaign against terrorist groups aimed at destroying them at the roots. The life senator believed the regions where martial law was in effect should be reduced in stages in order to streamline martial law. Troops under martial law command would thus be concentrated, he said.

He also called for filling the gaps in relevant legislation immediately. The National Intelligence Agency "MIT" should be made more effective, Karaveliogiu believed. The recent developments in Afghanistan were "unacceptable," the life senator said, but did not believe Turkey would be greatly (affected by them) and he was confident the necessary (precautions) had been taken.

The Republican People's Party deputy from Kayseri, Gani Asik, said events in the Middle East required Turkey to be on the alert. Nations neglecting defense may lose everything unexpectedly, he warned. Any loopholes in Turkey's defense should be removed by rallying Turkey's whole potential, he said. Noting that NATO's increasing need for Turkey was stronger than Turkey's need for NATO, Asik called for a policy in keeping with this observation.

Additional Statements

TA141511 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1505 GMT 15 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 15 Jan (AA)--Former Defense Minister Neset Akmandor called for "releasing" the armed forces from responsibility for martial law and allowing them to return to their "basic functions."

Speaking during the parliamentary budget committee debate on the 1980 defense budget, the former minister said the friendly relations Turkey had cultivated with Middle Eastern countries had ensured a peaceful atmosphere in the region.

National Salvation Party Deputy Yasar Gocmen claimed British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington's visit had something to do with preparations for a new alliance, a "secret cento", aimed to bring together Turkey, Israel, Egypt and Syria. [sentence as received]

He accused NATO with attempting to "provoke" Turkey against the Islamic world.

CUMHURIYET SCORES ERKMEN'S HANDLING OF DEFENSE AGREEMENT

NC140900 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 13 Jan 80 p 1, 11 NC

["Observation" column by Ugur Mumcu: "Fire and Property..."]

[Excerpts] The events in Iran, the occupation of the U.S. Embassy, the intervention in Afghanistan, developments around Taraki, Amin and Karmal, our force commanders' warning, the measures package and the call for a dialog--all of this was immdiately followed by the initialling of the defense and economic cooperation agreement between Turkey and the United States. This initialing was achieved in a very short time.

Such agreements which affect the future of our nation, should first be submitted for ratification to the Grand National Assembly. This is required under the Constitution. And yet, Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen can say "we are uncertain about submitting the defense agreement to the Grand National Assembly." We cannot but express our astonishment over Mr Erkmen's attitude.

"A minority government," which doubts whether it will still enjoy a vote of confidence after these agreements, cannot afford to hide from parliament any agreements likely to turn Turkey into "a focal point" in the event of clashes in the Middle East. If it does, then it will be committing an offense against our Constitution and our nation.

Why are these agreements kept secret and from whom are they being kept secret? After a 5-hour meeting with the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel spoke of "war preparations." What does this mean? If a war breaks out--on whose side are we going to fight and against whom?

What convincing reasons are there for keeping initialed or approved agreements away from the control of parliament at a time when even rumors become suspicions? Submitting the agreements to the parliament is a constitutional requirement. No one is courageous enough to evade this. A foreign minister cannot conceal important agreements from the parliament so anxiously and urgently. If he does, he is bound to have to account for it at some time.

DEMIREL HOLDS MARTIAL LAW COORDINATION MEETING

TA142107 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 14 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The expanded martial law coordination meeting has ended. The meeting, held at the offices of the Chief of Staff in Ankara, started at 0930 today and lasted about 10 hours. In a statement following the meeting, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said:

It is imperative to reassess the power of the state--within the framework of democratic principles and legal means--by using the legal state forces. Recalling that the government was dealing seriously with anarchy, terror, seccessionism and destruction--which it considers the country's most important problems--Demirel added that from the day his government took office it had made efforts to completely restore the state's democratic authority.

Demirel said that during the coordination meeting the situation in the country at large was reviewed. Demirel continued: The state is engaged in a pitiless struggle against those disrupting Turkey, against enemies of the state, traitors, against those creating unrest, against murderers, gangs and bandits. This struggle will definitely succeed. In fact no one can be stronger than the state.

Expressing his gratitude to all the members of the armed forces--from its generals to its enlisted men--for heartily carrying on this struggle, Demirel said: Everything necessary will be done to end this struggle successfully. The government will offer all support. However, this is not just a governmental issue, it is a national one. It has no political aspect. Therefore, the whole nation and the organs of the state should extend their moral support to those carrying out this task. We must help them facilitate the fulfillment of their assignments. It is imperative to (?increase) and to reassess the power of the state--within the framework of the democratic principles and legal means--by using the legal state forces. We need the legislation to do so. This legislation must be passed. Every passing day will be to the advantage of our state. The state definitely has the power to crush those disturbing the people, those trying to divide our country and those trying to disrupt our nation and republic before they are able to realize their aims. We, as the government, shall continue to deal with this problem as our major concern.

Chief of Staff Gen Kenan Evren, certain state ministers, the ministers of defense, interior, foreign affairs, finance, justice, education, public works, customs and monopolies, transportation, industry and technology, energy and natural resources, sports and youth; ground, sea and air force commanders as well as the gendarme commander attended the meeting. Also present at the meeting were the deputy Chief of Staff, the secretary general of the National Security Council, the under secretary of the Defense Ministry, as well as other officials and the martial law commanders.

OLYMPIC COMMITTEE PRESIDENT SAYS GAMES CANNOT BE MOVED

LD152038 London BBC Television Network in English 1945 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The president of the International Olympic Committee said this afternoon that it would be the athletes, not the Russians who would suffer if the Olympic games were moved from Moscow. He was asked by an Irish television reporter in Dublin if he thought the protest was mere political saber rattling. [Begin recording]

[Lord Killanin] What I am saying is that the Olympic games are being used for political purposes. They always have had political overtones, but I think its place is most unfortunate, because these kites should be flown [as heard]. And I do not think they will have any effect on the Soviet Union as far as the political sign is concerned and are very distressing for those trying to prepare for the Olympic games.

[Question] So you see no set of circumstances, political or otherwise, at the moment which might force the Olympic council to change the games and, in fact, to cancel the games altogether?

[Answer] The International Olympic Committee cannot change the venue of the games and cannot cancel them. [end recording]

Iran is not participating in the conference, so only 12 delegations are attending.

Further conference topics are the developments in the international crude oil markets and the effects of the decline in the dollar exchange rate.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT CONDEMNS USSR INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN

LD162104 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2003 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[By Geoffrey Meade, PA staff reporter in Strasbourg]

[Text] The European Parliament tonight condemned the Russian invasion of Afghanistan--and urged the International Olympic Committee to reconsider holding the games in Moscow if the occupation continues.

But it took hours of wrangling over procedural technicalities before the Parliament finally agreed on the wording. And even on this basic issue British Euro Tories and socialists here split right down the middle.

The Tories along with the Christian democrats and liberals in the Parliament voted in a majority for a 10-paragraph resolution expressing outrage at the Soviet action. But the socialist group--embracing the British members--voted with French and Italian communists against it. Afterwards Labour member Mr Richard Caborn (Sheffield) said the socialists were condemning the Russians, but could not agree to a motion which promoted the "cold war."

Mr Ken Collins (Lab., Strathclyde East) said: "The resolution was very far from having anything to do with detente. Certainly the British Labour group wants to see the Soviet Union out of Afghanistan. But this kind of resolution will merely blow the thing up."

All political groups in the Euro Parliament has spent hours trying to agree on a common resolution to present a unified position. Many had tempered down their views in a bid to ensure unanimity. The final resolution, expressing outrage and concern about the threat to international peace, called for the immediate unconditional withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Afghanistan, reaffirmed its desire for detente and deplored the "brutal intervention" of the USSR. It urged the EEC Commission to review all economic, commercial credit and financial relations between Russia and the Community, specifically in the areas of high technology and farm products.

The key paragraph, however, fell short of endorsing calls for a complete boycott of the Olympic games. It called upon the International Olympic Committee, as well as national committees of member states and the federations of the national athletic associations taking part in the games, together with the representatives of participating athletes "to reconsider whether the summer games should take place in Moscow if the occupation of Afghanistan continues."

AGREEMENT REACHED ON ACCELERATING ECONOMIC TALKS WITH SFRY

WA161426 London REUTER in English 1308 GMT 16 Jan 80 WA

[Excerpt] Belgrade, Jan 16, REUTER--With public anxiety mounting over President Tito's illness, Yugoslavia has received a sudden boost to its flagging economic situation from Western governments.

European Common Market foreign ministers, spurred by East-West tension over Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, agreed in Brussels yesterday to speed up negotiations to give Yugoslavia free access to Europe for its industrial exports. Diplomatic sources in Brussels said the action had been partly triggered by fears of instability in Yugoslavia in the event of President Tito's death.

EC COMMISSIONER DISCOUNTS MEMBERS' USE OF 'FOOD WEAPON'

[Unattributed report: "Cheysson: Europeans Have No Interest in Brandishing Food Weapon"]

[Excerpt] Questioned on possible reactions to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, EC Commissioner Claude Cheysson told the Europe 1 Press Club on Sunday, 13 January: "We are not showing solidarity with the Americans. Like them, we have our interests and we express them in a parallel way, often in the same way as them. When negotiating with the Russians the Americans express themselves in terms of power--military power, the use of the other weapons they have. The Americans have been talking about the food weapon for a long time. I have never heard any of our countries use the expression "food weapon."

"I do not think that it is in the interests of our countries to view the world's food problems in terms of power. We certainly do not stand to gain anything from all the commercial networks in this sphere being upset or from the food shortage--which is second only to energy and lies in the same context--being aggravated by sudden changes in the commercial networks by outlets closing or being opened. We protested the oil boycott. In my view we should have the same approach to a food boycott.

"I would be very surprised if the European countries--of course it is up to them to decide and the decision does not rest with the commission or the EC--were to envisage brandishing such a weapon."

THREE FRENCH-SPEAKING FRONT MINISTERS RESIGN

LD161638 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Text] There is now a government crisis in Belgium: Three French-speaking front ministers--Outers, minister for foreign trade and scientific policy; Persoons, secretary of state for French community affairs; and Defosset, minister of Brussels affairs--are no longer members of the government. The king has accepted their resignations at the suggestion of the prime minister who went to the Chateau de (Laagen) early this afternoon.

The king will appoint three new ministers from the present majority parties. That is, from the Socialist or Social Christian parties.

Now here is a statement by Mr Lucien Outers. He said: We have been dismissed just like the Walloon Rally was. Mr Outers is alluding here to the resignation of members of the Walloon Rally in the Tindemans government on 6 March 1977.

PAPER CONSIDERS IRAN GREATER THREAT TO WORLD PEACE

LD151031 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 10 Jan 80 p 7 LD

[Editorial: "How Dangerous?"]

[Excerpts] The Russian invasion of Afghanistan is undoubtedly an extremely serious matter. However, can it really be described as the greatest threat to world peace since 1945, as President Carter described it in his speech to 100 congressmen on Tuesday? This sounds even less convincing than Carter's earlier statement that the Russian action had changed his opinion of the Russians' ultimate aims more than anything else. With all the expertise available to him, the U.S. President could not possibly be as naive as he tries to suggest by that statement.

Carter's latest statement is not very convincing because it means that the invasion of Afghanistan poses more of a threat to peace than the Cuban crisis did in its time, when there was question of a direct confrontation between the superpowers. There is no question of such a confrontation in this case--certainly not unless the Russians try to penetrate through Pakistan to the Arabian Sea. Pakistan's whole reaction so far does not suggest that that country is expecting such an attack.

As far as acute danger is concerned, we still tend to regard the situation around Iran as a greater threat for the reason which President Carter gave in his speech: The absence of any governmental authority in Iran with which the outside world can communicate. The fact that such an authority is totally absent was clearly shown during UN Secretary General Waldheim's visit to Tehran. That visit produced no results at all, mainly because Waldheim could find nobody with whom he could do business.

That means that there is a complete power vacuum in Iran; therefore, complete chaos could overtake the country at any time. Under certain circumstances this could lead to a situation in which the two superpowers were in direct confrontation. Perhaps President Carter means Iran when he says Afghanistan in talking about the threat to world peace.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG, AFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR U.S. SANCTIONS

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Schmidt has assured the United States that the Federal Republic will support U.S. sanctions against Iran and against the USSR because of its intervention in Afghanistan. The chancellor also emphasized in his government statement to the Bundestag the Federal Government's determination to continue the policy of detente with the East on the basis of a military equilibrium in order to achieve progress in arms limitation.

Schmidt again emphasized his readiness to meet Soviet General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev and SED chief Erich Honecker. He thereby indirectly rejected recommendations from the CSU/CSU opposition that these meetings, planned to take place this year, should be postponed because of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. The chancellor emphasized that he does not criticize Franz Josef Strauss, CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, for having declared his readiness to visit Moscow even after the Soviet entry into Afghanistan.

SCHMIDT HOLDS UNSCHEDULED TALK WITH U.S. DEPUTY STATE SECRETARY

LD161154 Hamburg DPA in German 1135 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Following his discussion with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher also had a surprise meeting with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

The chancellor left a Cabinet meeting for 30 minutes to talk to Christopher. The discussion is sure to have centered on the consequences of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the holding of hostages in Tehran and possible retaliatory measures by the West. Christopher earlier discussed the same questions with Genscher.

CABINET BRIEFED ON ASIAN SITUATION; MORE AID TO PAKISTAN STUDIED

LD161728 Hamburg DPA in German 1621 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Schmidt today informed the Cabinet in Bonn about the government statement he will make tomorrow before the Bundestag. Its key points will be problems pertaining to Afghanistan and Iran. After the Cabinet meeting Government Spokesman Gruenewald announced that the chancellor had also made it clear what importance Europeans attach to solidarity with the United States.

According to Gruenewald, the Federal Government thinks it necessary to increase economic aid to Pakistan which is likewise threatened by the Soviet march into Afghanistan. So far a formal decision about the increase and the type of aid has not yet been taken.

On the eve of the Bundestag debate U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher held talks with the federal chancellor and Foreign Minister Genscher on the consequences of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and on the development of the Iran hostages affair. According to Gruenewald, Christopher did not raise any new major points. "We share, of course, President Carter's concern about the situation of the hostages in Tehran," the government spokesman said.

At the press conference Gruenewald refuted press reports that considerations in the United States about military reaction to the taking of hostages in Tehran had caused profound concern in Bonn government quarters.

Yesterday, serious concern was expressed by these quarters that U.S. considerations concerning blockade measures in the Persian Gulf might arouse so much public support in the United States that President Carter might be forced to act in keeping with the steps under consideration. A report to this effect was issued by DPA and several newspapers reporting independently.

With reference to the agency report, Gruenewald declared that it had contained an "inapplicable accent." The government shared the U.S. President's concern about the consequences of the Iran crisis. At the same time the government spokesman conceded that Bonn's overall position contained elements of moderation, references to which were made in the reports criticized by him.

The talks between Christopher, Schmidt and Genscher reportedly dealt also with possible countermeasures against the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, including a halt to deliveries in the technological field and the restriction of credits for Moscow. However, the two sides agreed that the door for measures of detente--such as negotiations on arms limitations and the follow-up conference to the European security conference in Madrid--must remain open.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH PAKISTAN, TURKEY ENVOYS; MAY VISIT PAKISTAN

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will probably visit Pakistan in February or March. It was learned in Bonn that Genscher will use his planned trip to the ASEAN conference in Kuala Lumpur for a visit to Pakistan.

In connection with developments in Afghanistan, Genscher today received the Pakistani and Turkish ambassadors for separate talks, during which he stressed "the FRG's commitment to the strengthening of the independence of states in this region." This was announced in a Foreign Ministry statement which also said that, in the discussions of these problems in the European Community and NATO, the Federal Government would attach importance to the elaboration of clear positions "which could contribute, in both the political and economic spheres, to safeguarding the independence of the countries of the region and, thus, to stabilizing the region."

Genscher also assured the Turkish ambassador of the Federal Republic's "continuing solidarity" in overcoming Turkey's economic problems.

GENSCHER STRESSES NEED FOR SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.

LD161318 Hamburg DPA in German 1226 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--According to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Europeans want to strengthen their close relationship of trust with the United States. In an interview with Deutschlandfunk today following his return from the Brussels meeting of EEC foreign ministers, Genscher gave his assurance that the most important result of this meeting was complete agreement on the assessment of the effects of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and on the necessity for close solidarity with the United States.

Genscher also stressed that the Europeans agreed on the principle of not replacing the United States as suppliers of goods to places where the United States has decided to no longer supply them.

DM22 MILLION DEVELOPMENT AID TO AFGHANISTAN FROZEN

LD161826 Hamburg DPA in German 1705 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--The blockade of German capital aid for Afghan development projects has frozen about DM22 million. The federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation announced today that this was the remainder of the DM400 million of capital aid promised by Bonn to Afghanistan. Payments were halted shortly after Soviet intervention because the projects were endangered. The last remaining eight German development aid experts were recalled from Afghanistan for security reasons at the end of 1979.

UN AMBASSADOR VIEWS GENERAL ASSEMBLY VOTE AGAINST USSR

DW170857 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 1215 GMT 16 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from correspondent Tietze interview with Ruediger von Wechmar, FRG ambassador to the United Nations, on the UN General Assembly vote against the USSR's actions in Afghanistan; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] This vote represents not merely the stance of Western countries but also of Asian, African and Latin American nations. Could it not be used to achieve a political strengthening of the Western position in the world as well as closer cooperation with developing countries?

[Answer] I think it would be useful if the industrial states--particularly of the West, Europe and the United States--would give some thought in the near future to the necessity of cooperating more closely in the field of development and economic policies with the Third World. They should not contradict too often and too strongly the wishes of the Third World in order to extend and intensify this constellation. I do not say it will be a lasting constellation, but it is a constellation that exists now.

The resolution is of more than just temporary value in connection with Afghanistan. It ought to be a sign--this is at least how I see it for the FRG--indicating the possibilities of cooperation between nonalined and industrial states. I think that the FRG is facing a task in connection with the great issue we must cope with in the United Nations, namely, holding a special General Assembly in the fall of this year dealing only with the global dialog, that is the North-South dialog. In this special General Assembly we must be among those who will show more understanding for the problems of developing countries. We must exploit the favorable hour in order to strengthen a constellation that has come about in connection with Afghanistan.

[Question] Do you see also a deterrent effect? Could the obvious result of the vote have stopped some further expansionist aims, maybe of the Soviet Union and its closest representatives such as Cuba and Vietnam, for example?

[Answer] If I try to imagine that I am making decisions in Moscow dealing with the occupation of one more countries or extending military influence over another country and its activities, I believe I would think twice before upsetting the Third World, as in the case mentioned, upsetting it in a way that would entail lasting damage. I cannot imagine that the Soviet Union anticipated this.

I fail to see why, with regard to the Iranian issue, the Soviet Union has foiled a proposal of the Americans through another veto, after having approved in the Security Council just a few days earlier--on 31 December in fact--a resolution which said in part: If the hostages are not released by 7 January the Security Council will decide on measures to be taken. Now these measures were to be decided, so the Soviet Union has actually contradicted itself.

The Soviet Union did not gain anything by vetoing the sanctions against Tehran. The determination of the nonalined states and the Third World states to clearly reprimand the Soviet Union here has not at all been mitigated by the obvious Soviet attempt to get chummy with them by a veto on Iran.

[Question] Is it too daring to express the hope that the vote on Afghanistan in the United Nations has perhaps somewhat mitigated, or even cooled off the highly heated feelings between the United States and the Soviet Union?

[Answer] If you mean by this that the Soviet Union has been forced to do some thinking as a consequence of this voting result, then I agree with you.

BONN ASSESSMENT OF MIDEAST PROBLEMS EXPOUNDED

[Guenther Gillessen article: "Pay More Attention to Afghanistan, Warning Against Sanctions Against Iran"]

[Text] Frankfurt, 15 January--In politically assessing the occupation of Afghanistan, the Federal Government in Bonn obviously is concerned that the bilateral U.S.-Iranian conflict arising from the taking of hostages might disturb the greater task of the alliance--to stabilize the Middle East and consolidate its contacts with the Western nations. A continuation or even intensification of the Iranian anti-Americanism would impair Pakistan's chances of exerting a moderate, sobering influence over the Iranian leadership. Pakistan is regarded in Bonn as an important starting point for a Western policy which seeks to set the indigenous forces of resistance in the Middle East region against the Soviet threat.

With the same goal in mind the Federal Government is trying to intensify contacts with the Arab states on the western and southern shores of the Persian Gulf. The trip by Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff last week is one sign of this; another is the talks of Federal Foreign Minister Genscher with the ambassadors of the Gulf states and of Saudi Arabia about the chances of closer ties with the European Community. What this involves is probing talks which, in Bonn's view, ought to lead to cooperation such as that which the European Community agreed on with the states of the ASEAN group (Association of Southeast Asian Nations: Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand).

It may be concluded from this assessment of the situation that the Federal Government continues to advise the U.S. Government to exercise restraint with regard to Iran--no matter how difficult it is in view of the American public which wants to see the hostages finally liberated. It was probably along these lines that the German spokesmen came out in the council meetings of the European Community and of NATO in Brussels on Tuesday, namely, Foreign Minister Genscher and State Secretary Van Well.

In the current conference of the top echelons of the federal ministries concerned and the chancellor's office, some parts of the picture of the situation have become clearer over the past few days.

They have not, however, forced Bonn to change its intention of letting the effects of the Soviet attack on the independence of nonalined states foment in the Third World. What Bonn intends to do is support, but not push the stirring will of resistance. The West must not shift the conflict of the nonalined countries with the Soviet Union to a form of East-West controversy too soon.

The experts believe they know that the Soviet decision to invade Afghanistan was made at a meeting of the Moscow Central Committee on 27 November 1978 [as published]--at the climax of the Soviet campaign against the imminent missile decision by NATO. Moscow wanted to prevent a regime from coming into power in Kabul which would no longer be oriented toward the Soviet Union. The decision to intervene in late December seems to have been determined, too, by speculation that the U.S.-Iranian crisis would have become more aggravated by then and might even escalate into military operation which could divert the attention of the world public from the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Thus, President Carter's reserve in the Iranian crisis has presumably amplified the calculated political costs of the invasion of Afghanistan for the Soviets.

Experts believe that the Soviet divisions will stay in Afghanistan for a long time if not forever. It must be expected that the Karmal regime, after a withdrawal of Soviet troops, would soon have the same difficulties with the rebels as its two predecessors. In addition, the occupation of Afghanistan offers far-reaching opportunities for the Soviet Union vis-a-vis Iran and vis-a-vis Pakistan with regard to making a thrust toward the Indian Ocean. A pretext for an invasion of Pakistan could be the support given to the rebels over ghe Pakistani border. Opportunities for the extension of Soviet power to Iran could be expected when the Khomeyni regime collapses and when a coalition of nationalist and communist movements succeeds, whose anticipated collapse would offer a favorite hour for the Soviet Union.

Advisers of the Federal Government discard the argument that has often been heard in the West, namely, that the Soviet Union "had" to act in Afghanistan in order to protect its own South-Asian Islamic republics against an area conflagration by the Islamic Revolution. It must be further assumed, it is said, that the intervention in Afghanistan would make the Islamic areas of the Soviet Union realize even more the contrast between Soviet Marxism and Islam--as expressed in the struggle of Afghan rebels against the Soviet occupation troops. The intervention in Afghanistan will not diminish the domestic problems of the Soviet Union; it is now being assumed that, on the contrary, it will increase them. Some believe that Afghanistan will be firmly incorporated into the Soviet imperium in the pattern of Mongolia.

The Federal Government sees both conflicts--the Iranian and Afghan conflicts--in connection with Western Mideast policy. That creates consequences for the West's policy vis-a-vis Israel. Bonn speculation goes as follows: The partial success of the American Camp David mediation policy that led to peace between Israel and Egypt on the one hand, again increased America's influence over that part of the Middle East while, on the other hand increasing the radicalism of the camp of remaining Arab states who aimed it against America, something that showed effects going deep into the Gulf region, the PLO and then the internal Iranian opposition to the shah. Camp David is listed in the catalog of reasons why the shah was overthrown. Stabilization in one part of the Middle East with the ensuing increase of American influence due to the Camp David policy entailed decreasing stabilization in the Middle East and the outbreak of strong anti-Americanism in the Gulf region as far as Pakistan. The Soviet Union hoped under these favorable circumstances to be able to risk the invasion of Afghanistan.

That kind of Bonn speculation allows us to conclude that the Western countries in the near future will increase their pressure on Israel so that it will not dodge the autonomy negotiations, but will much rather lead them in such a way that the explosive effect of the Palestinian problem will be eliminated in the Near and Middle East, thus taking the edge out of the sharp anti-Americanism existing in that region.

Bonn believes that the drafts of the arms control policy must not be changed because of the crisis. The significance of military balance as a guiding element of East-West relations has become even clearer than it was before. The Afghanistan crisis indirectly confirmed the correctness of NATO's medium-range arms decision in December. Arms policy and efforts aimed at arms control contain no contradiction whatsoever; they are two means of the same policy aimed at the establishment of a balance.

Bonn expects the next round of troop reduction negotiations to begin in Vienna in late January. The Soviet refusal of 3 January to negotiate on medium-range arms in Europe as long as NATO stands by its arms decision is not considered in Bonn as a final rejection but much rather as the beginning of negotiations. Bonn experts do not consider present arms control negotiations as very promising, but the Western offer stands as it is and if the Soviet Union will not accept it, even this failure will promote understanding for the policy of balance by the public and the parties of Western countries.

SPD ANALYZES U.S. APPROACH TO AFGHANISTAN CONFLICT

DW161305 Bonn DIE WELT in German 16 Jan 80 p 2 DW

[Report by Bonn correspondent Gottfried Capell: "SPD Analyzes U.S. Approach to Afghanistan Conflict"]

[Text] Bonn--Continuation of the detente policy would also serve the interests of the United States insofar as the priorities set by the United States in an outwardly visible way in connection with the Afghanistan crisis are at present not in line with the "inner priorities" the United States considers indispensable. That is the core of an analysis that is being presently discussed by leading SPD circles. The "rump presidium" (6 of the 11 ministers still need to be nominated at the forthcoming party Executive Board session on 28 January) of the Social Democrats have extensively discussed the situation created by the Afghan development.

The SPD has some information to the effect that the United States knew about a gradually increasing engagement of the USSR in Afghanistan. The starting point was the Kabul putsch in April 1978 which came as a surprise to the Soviet leadership. Since the new rulers of Afghanistan showed a friendly attitude toward Moscow, the Soviet Union became more and more engaged. But every one of those steps proved to be insufficient. So Moscow eventually faced the problem of either ending its acitivites completely or intensifying them with a "quality jump" in such a way that they would become promising. That has been done.

The extent of the Soviet intervention has only become known gradually. No definite findings exist indicating why the Soviet leadership believed it should take such a massive measure. According to SPD information, the Americans point out several aspects in this connection: Relations between Washington and Moscow have deteriorated so much lately that any further deterioration would not entail additional risk. [paragraph continues]

Moreover, deep disappointment and irritation exists in the Kremlin due to increased American defense expenditures, NATO's medium-range arms decision, and the uncertainty of the ratification of SALT II. Answers to the question of whether the USSR intentionally planned to accept a long-term deterioration of the entire world political climate, or whether priority was given to that Asian region, are also uncertain. The second variant is considered more likely, however, particularly since the USSR has 50 million Islamic citizens and because it was necessary to counteract the irrationality of Islam, as demonstrated by the person in power in Iran. It is most likely, however, that the Afghan events were facilitated by a combination of all these elements.

American policy is now attempting to "stabilize" the problems. This was difficult in the past week, however, because the dialog between Washington and Moscow has been disrupted and because its continuation was supposed to take place early this week.

The USSR's action is being taken most seriously. The SPD follows the analysis that the world political balance will be involved if land-based reconnaissance forces from Afghanistan are able to register the movement of ships more accurately than before and if the Soviet military strength will grow vis-a-vis Iran as well as Pakistan. There will be concern if developments in Asia gain their own dynamics despite the fact that the superpowers want to create stabilization. The United States has taken countermeasures and it does not want Europe to torpedo them. Leading Social Democrats believe that Washington is pleased by European efforts to make a contribution, but no concrete request has been uttered in this connection.

On the other hand, however, the Americans consider it more important not to completely cut off the "wires" serving the establishment of contacts with regard to arms limitation talks and the ratification of SALT II. That would also serve Western interests because the volume of potential dangers emanating from non-ratification of SALT and a failure of disarmament efforts in the medium-range field would be greater than the threats emanating from the hotbeds of crisis in Afghanistan and Iran combined.

BRANDT ON SFRY'S FUTURE, SALT II 'APPLICATION'

LD161354 Hamburg DPA in German 1213 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--SPD Chairman Willy Brandt apparently does not share the fears within the Western alliance that the Soviet Union might take advantage of an eventual power vacuum in Yugoslavia after President Tito's death to intervene. "I do not regard Yugoslavia's future as threatened," Brandt told journalists in Bonn today. However, he would not elaborate on his views.

Brandt advocated that the preparations for the long-planned autumn Madrid East-West followup conference to the European security conference should not be interrupted and efforts for cooperation should be continued in a businesslike manner. However, the SPD chairman expressed doubts as to whether the date originally planned for this conference could be kept due to present tensions between East and West.

Brandt regarded it as a "highly interesting" question as to whether the United States and the Soviet Union would in practice adhere to the conditions of the SALT II agreement on nuclear arms limitation even without the ratification postponed by Washington.

In Brandt's view, the financial burdens of arming also lead to an objective, common interest in a premature application of SALT II. The expectations of a SALT ratification had been the basis for the SPD Congress' approval in December of the NATO decision on new medium-range missiles, and had also played a role in the Belgian and Dutch NATO partners' debate at that time.

BRANDT TO MEET WITH ITALIAN CP'S BELINGUER

LD161725 Hamburg DPA in German 1624 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--SPD Chairman Willy Brandt will now hold his meeting with Enrico Berlinguer, secretary general of the Italian Communist Party, which was called off on short notice yesterday, within the next few weeks. Brandt told journalists in Bonn today that he would meet Berlinguer in Strasbourg, where both are members of the European Parliament. It is unlikely that the meeting will take place before the end of February.

SPD'S BAHR OBJECTS TO BOYCOTT OF OLYMPIC GAMES

DW161013 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1135 GMT 15 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from correspondent Keller interview with SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr; date, place not given]

[Text] [Question] Do you think that the Americans still think it is possible for a continuation of detente policy in Europe and for the preservation of what has so far been accomplished?

[Answer] It is, at any rate, the desire of the Americans not to risk anything of what has been achieved in Europe, and it is a foregone conclusion that they consider it the foremost interest of the West to insure that the matter of arms limitation, meaning specifically what has been accomplished by SALT, will not be jeopardized and that contacts with the Soviet Union will continue.

[Question] How do you assess Brezhnev's remarks over the weekend from which we might derive that the Soviet Union remains interested in detente in Europe?

[Answer] I assess these remarks to mean that the Soviet Union is not interested in an additional aggravation in Europe. I do not regard this as an attempt to push different positions so as to come between Europe and the United States, an attempt that would be futile anyway. There is no difference of opinion between myself and Mr Genscher as to the assessment of the situation and what ought to be done. Mr Genscher himself said the other day in Stuttgart that we must be interested in seeing the state of stability we have in Europe transposed to other regions as well. I fully share this view. In fact, I have advocated it all along.

[Question] Where do you see the main sources of danger at the moment, dangers that might emanate from the situation in Afghanistan and Iran?

[Anwer] Actually I see danger in the fact that both areas of conflict might be combined and that additional dangers may well result from actions and counteractions by both sides, dangers which might be harder to manage than they have been to date.

[Question] CDU Deputy Alois Mertes has said that the chancellor should not hold talks with Brezhnev and Honecker, at least not now. What do you think about that?

[Answer] As far as I am concerned this would be but an empty demonstration which would not be commensurate with the situation. I think the chancellor is absolutely right in saying that it is perhaps more important to talk in critical times than it is in normal times.

[Question] Can you imagine the Federal Republic boycotting the Olympic games?

[Answer] In view of the prevalent situation I cannot visualize it at all, nor do I see any particular sense to it. You must not forget that the United States, at the moment anyway, would not even think of refusing to issue the visa to the Soviet sportsmen for participation in Lake Placid.

[Question] Has your assessment of the Soviet Union changed in any way after Afghanistan?

[Answer] Nothing has changed in the assessment of the Soviet Union. As before, I am convinced that the Soviet Union assesses properly and as dominant the danger potentials, the real danger potentials, existing between itself and the United States, and in Europe. I have always advocated the view that wherever these detente treaties are not applicable, the Soviet Union continues to seek to make its interests prevail even through such actions which, I am convined, harm the Soviet Union most of all, last but not least because this is a factor which countries of the Third World justly regard as threatening.

CDU'S WOERNER ENDORSES EXTENSION OF NATO AREA

[Bonn correspondent Ruediger Moniac report: "Woerner: Strengthen the Bundeswehr, But Leave It at Home"]

[Text] Bonn--The CDU/CSU demand to lift the geographic limits of NATO does not mean using the Bundeswehr outside the alliance's area. That has been pointed out by Manfred Woerner, the opposition's defense policy spokesman in Bonn, in a talk with DIE WELT.

He said that this would be problematic for many reasons. First of all for the following: "The Bundeswehr hardly has the necessary means for safeguarding the area of our state. For this reason alone it cannot take over further tasks."

The union parties' demand to drop the geographic limits of the alliance means adapting to that realization. "The main danger threatening Western security is not Moscow's direct aggression with regard to Europe, but the USSR's cutting off or gaining control over Western oil or raw material supplies. By doing this we could be ruined without a shot having been fired." The "decisive danger" comes from outside the current NATO area: "It is therefore politically and logically necessary to redefine the framework of the alliance.

"A coordinated overall strategy of the West as an answer to the USSR's global power policy is involved. Such a policy must include the use of all political, economic, financial, technical and other means of power."

In order to explain these aims, the CDU politician said: "After the occupation of Afghanistan, safeguarding Pakistan is an important task. It would be sensible in this connection if the European NATO states were to render intensified development assistance and technical support, while a military presence in the Indian Ocean should be solely a matter of the United States."

Does that not mean in general that NATO would have to become active whenever a small crisis takes place somewhere in the world, asked DIE WELT.

Woerner: "I do not plead at all for a general responsibility for NATO. It must concentrate on problems and regions that are decisive for the security and freedom of the states of the alliance." He said one could not understand the alliance dealing with improving environmental protection while leaving out the safeguarding of energy supplies, although "this is the most important problem for our survival."

The CDU/CSU defense expert denied the question of whether extending NATO's sphere beyond the present limits would increase tension in the world. Woerner: "Quite the contrary. The more clearly and the more decidedly NATO acts, the more the Soviet Union will realize that there is no alternative to peaceful cooperation." The policy of the alliance remains based on the double concept of "detente and defense," and the West remains prepared to cooperate with the Soviet Union. But Moscow must not use detente for its conquest.

KOHL CALLS FOR SOLIDARITY WITH UNITED STATES

[Excerpts] Berlin--CDU/CSU parliamentary group chairman Helmut Kohl sees no basis at present for a joint realistic policy of detente by the government and the opposition. At a meeting of the CDU/CSU Bundestag parliamentary group in the Berlin Reichstag building today, Kohl held the government and the coalition parties responsible for this. He said that even following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan they both obviously still cling to a policy of detente which was founded on an illusion.

Kohl called for solidarity with the United States. Above all the United States needed the public support of its allies. Because detente is indivisible, the West Europeans could not act as though the Soviet challenge only concerned the Americans. He said that sanctions against the Soviet Union must be discussed by the alliance, and all partners in the alliance must then adhere to the decisions taken. Europe and the Federal Republic must be prepared to make sacrifices. Under no circumstances must the economies of Europe and the Federal Republic step into a gap that could occur following a supply embargo by the Americans. There must be no business at an alliance neighbor's expense.

DPA PROTESTS DISTRIBUTION OF ACCREDITATIONS FOR OLYMPICS

[Text] Hamburg--DPA today protested in Moscow and to the National Olympic Committee [NOC] for Germany against the distribution of accreditations for the Olympic games.

According to DPA, the agency has so far only been granted the necessary accreditations for written reportage but not for technical or secretarial staff. This was probably due to the differences of opinion existing between Moscow and the NOC on the question of whether technical staff should be numbered among the press journalists' quota or not. The Federal Republic's quota laid down by the International Olympic Committee is 191, for which the NOC has 270 applications.

DPA also regards visual reportage from Moscow as being jeopardized because the NOC has so far only granted accreditations for three of its photographers. DPA has also requested the chairman of the IOC press commission, and Spanish Ambassador to Moscow Juan Antonio Samaranch to help in settling the accreditation problem.

BONN-PARIS VIEW ON AFGHANISTAN 'DISSOCIATION' FROM U.S.

DW161227 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 1810 GMT 14 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpt from Hans-Wilhelm Vahlefeld commentary]

[Text] The reaction to the events in Afghanistan seems to show two camps: The members of one camp--they seem to stand in Bonn and Paris--do not want detente policy as a whole to be called into question because of Afghanistan. They tend, roughly speaking to believe that detente is divisible and that it can be limited to Europe. The others believe that considering detente as divisible indicates traces of illusions.

London and Washington, the born Atlantics, so to speak, stand on the one side, the continental European--Paris and Bonn--on the other. Such a grouping is not new in the Western camp, but the accents set by Bonn are surprising. Never before in a critical situation was there so much agreement between a German federal chancellor and France as there seems to be now between Schmidt and Giscard.

Agreement with Paris, however, because of the typically national character of French foreign policy, simultaneously means more or less clear measure of dissociation from the United States. The federal chancellor is also naturally an Atlantic, but since Carter has ruled in Washington, his Atlantic heart no longer beats so loudly. Schmidt believes that the American President lacks leadership strength and a strategic concept.

PAPER TAKES DIM VIEW OF CDU DEFENSE POLICY CONGRESS

DW151403 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 12 Jan 80 p 3 DW

[Commentary signed MAC.: "Dangerous Path"]

[Text] The CDU security policy congress in Bonn has made it plain that in this field, too, there are hardly any common platforms left between the government and the opposition. Likewise, it made clear that Manfred Woerner is probably controversial in the CDU and the CSU as a potential defense minister in a CDU/CSU government. But above all the congress--especially through Woerner's speech--spotlighted on what dangerous paths this party's security policy concepts are moving.

In the past, too, Woerner had demanded an extension of the area of validity of the North Atlantic pact, of course. Yet obviously, as a result of the current events in Afghanistan, he and other CDU/CSU politicians blew their fuses.

Is this brutal action by Moscow, which indeed provided post facto all those politicians far into the SPD with arguments for the NATO arms decision, going to lead to a complete return to cold war and thence to the brink of a "hot" oil war? Should not an attempt be made to continue detente policy at least in the European region? The CDU would only like to do what it can do best because it is the simplest: Rattle the sabre. This is not only adventurous but also dangerous. It is up to the voter to present the bill for such a concept to its authors.

UN REPRESENTATIVE COMMENTS ON IRANIAN SANCTIONS

[Nicole Bernheim dispatch: "Washington Resolved To Apply Economic Sanctions Against Tehran"]

[Excerpts] New York--As expected, the Soviet Union voted on Sunday, 13 January, against the tough resolution on sanctions against Iran, submitted by the United States Thursday at the UN Security Council. Nevertheless, the American resolution collected 10 votes in favor (United States, France, Great Britain, Norway, Portugal, Jamaica, Zambia, Philippines, Tunisia and Niger), and 2 opposed (USSR and German Democratic Republic). Bangladesh and Mexico abstained and China did not take part in the vote.

France's permanent representative, Mr Leprette, stated: "My government does not intend at all to hurt the Iranian people, with whom the French people have ties of long-standing friendship. It is no longer a question of trying to alter the course of the revolution. The Iranians alone, and we have said this many times, can and must decide their own destiny. We hope that the economic sanctions which the Security Council may adopt this evening, and which are prompted solely by the violation of international law--to wit, the taking of hostages--will prove very soon to be unnecessary as soon as the reason for their being advocated has itself disappeared."

CHRISTOPHER ARRIVES FOR TALKS ON AFGHANISTAN

PCF KABUL CORRESPONDENT SEES NEED TO 'REVIVE ENTHUSIASM'

LD161623 [Editorial Report LD] Paris L'HUMANITE in French on 14 January 1980 carries on page 8 a 1,700-word Martine Monod Kabul dispatch dated 13 January describing at length the release of political prisoners from Pol-e Charkhi Prison near Kabul and repression under Hafizollah Amin's regime, which was, he states, "backed by external forces."

Monod comments: "It seems obvious that if no attempt had been made to stop this process Afghanistan would have fallen into a foreign and civil war. This would have had an incalculable effect on peace in the whole region and on world peace. This is particularly true of Iran, toward which Amin's violently hostile ideas barely differed from those of the Americans. In view of the prospects opened up for him by the former president's policy, it is easy to understand Mr Jimmy Carter's bitter regrets over his loss.

"Amin's fall, the statements of national unity made by President Karmal, the sweeping amnesty measures and the message to Khomeyni have undoubtedly been welcomed. However, it will take time to revive the enthusiasm which followed the April Revolution and to make everybody understand the meaning of the Soviet aid. The people have gone through too much. They still have hope, but they must now be shown the real face of socialism. That is what the militants who overthrew Amin intend to do."

L'HUMANITE EXPANDS PCF POSITION ON INTERVENTION

LD161431 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Jan 80 pp 1, 7 LD

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "The Alined"; capitalized passages printed in italics]

[Excerpts] Of course, it is possible to share our analysis of the situation in Afghanistan without being suspected of willingly working for Washington. A military intervention is a grave matter even when it is not pursuing expansionist goals, and it is understandable that the Soviet leaders hesitated for a long time, as they maintain they did, before resigning themselves to this action. Moreover, the Spanish and Italian Communists do not have the same opinion as us on this point (Note: However, their stance is not enough to draw gratitude from our common adversaries. In Italy the Christian Democratic right thinks that the PCI has stopped halfway and should break completely with the Soviet Union. In France LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, for instance, criticizes them for remembering "intermittently that this superpower is also the homeland of Lenin and of a great revolution," and refuses to give them a certificate of complete honorability: "That does not make the Italian Communists authentic liberals or democrats"--J. Daniel).

On the other hand people of good faith can be in no doubt that the "shadow of Kabul" as [French Democratic Labor Confederation leader] Edmond Maire so smoothly describes it--he did not wait for this incident before opening fire--is being used as a pretext for launching a formidable propaganda operation against the PCF with a barrage of lies and slander. As can easily be demonstrated, this operation has nothing to do with the cry of a tortured conscience or with a desire to uphold human rights. If it did, the indignation of these noble souls would not have allowed so many opportunities to pass without expressing themselves. The same fierce insults and simplified arguments are to be found from the Socialist press to the extreme rightwing press: Marchais is painted as Brezhnev's vassal and the PCF as unconditionally alined with Moscow. Francois Mitterrand, who in the Socialist plan saw radio and television commentators as a kind of "auxiliary police force for the regime", now no doubt realizes that these auxiliaries have their uses since they are hammering out to 50 million French people every day the same ideas as he is and the same attacks on the Communists. This proves once again that the media in our country have only a semblance of pluralism and [that their stance is] determined by alinement from above. This is really a single-party system.

It may be objected that this perfect agreement simply expresses, beyond the diversity of political opinions, the protest of honest people at the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan. This argument would be acceptable if this indignation were not rigorously selective, and if the major sections of the media now storming against the Soviet Union in the name of lofty principles, because the Soviet Union is helping a revolutionary movement in Kabul, had not shown friendly benevolence when the imperialist states were launching long and bloody colonial expeditions. What were these champions of peoples' rights doing in the feverish days of the Algerian or Indochinese wars when communists were prosecuted, imprisoned, tortured or executed? They justified the crime.

Let us take another example--the example of Santo Domingo in 1965. The United States sent 40,000 Marines to overthrow Juan Bosh's government which they did not trust despite the fact that it affirmed its basic hostility to Castro's regime. How did the press react? LE FIGARO wrote: "Johnson: Our country will not, should not and cannot tolerate a second communist government in the Western hemisphere," or [LE FIGARO's] Max Clos: "I have seen thousands of Marines hesitating to use their fantastic weapons in order to spare civilians" (4 May 1965).

LE MONDE: "President Johnson's Mistaken Assessment" (2 May 1965). FRANCE-SOIR: "U.S. Warning Shot To Prevent Another Cuba" (30 April 1965). PARIS-MATCH carried the headline: "Save the Americans" and published photographs of Marines carrying children in their arms. LES ECHOS: "The international repercussions are likely to affect the U.S. position in Vietnam" (3 May 1965). LE POPULAIRE, organ of the French section of the Workers International: "It is doubtful whether President Johnson has chosen the best way of solving the Dominican problem" (4 May 1965).

You just have to compare these reactions--ranging from admiring support to courteous admonition--with the present howl of protest from all the media to realize that the court's judgments will paint you white or black according to whether you are "Western" or Soviet.

And yet there is an essential difference between the Soviets' action in Afghanistan and the constant intervention by imperialist states IN ALL THE REGIONS OF THE WORLD WHERE THEY CAN STILL DO SO WITH IMPUNITY. In Indochina, Algeria, Indonesia, Iran, Africa, Santo Domingo, Guatemala and Chile the imperialist powers were trying or are trying to maintain capitalist exploitation and the old imperial order at any price, drawing support from feudal lords and regressive forces.

In Afghanistan it was a revolutionary movement which seized power in April 1978 and the feudal lords and regressive forces, financed and armed by the United States, who from bases in Pakistan had for months been trying to destabilize the people's government. The Soviets had to face the following dilemma: Should they leave the way clear for the foreign intervention or else respond favorably to the request for aid submitted by the Kabul government under the terms of the mutual aid treaty signed in 1978? Those who have so long applauded the massacres of colonial wars or the U.S. military interventions do not seem to us to be qualified to invoke lofty principles.

We, for our part, have shown--some of us at the cost of their lives--to what extent we are attached to the independence of peoples, be it our people or those who were oppressed in the name of France. At that time we would have liked the new freedom crusaders to speak louder and more clearly on radio and television and elsewhere. However, we also know that independence is won, not granted. History has shown that there is no real independence if imperialism has a free hand since the nature of imperialism is to keep peoples under its domination and to intervene wherever and whenever it thinks it can do so with impunity. Of course, revolution cannot be exported and it is up to each people to forge their own destiny. But nonetheless ought we--in the name of principles which imperialism invokes against us while it violates them each day--allow imperialism to freely export counterrevolution? In the name of nonintervention the French and British governments enabled intervention by Hitler and Mussolini to strangle the Spanish Republic. Closer to home, there is reason to think that President Allende would not have been assassinated in Chile by putschists financed by the CIA if his country had been on the borders of the USSR and if his government had enjoyed a mutual aid pact with Moscow.

That does not mean, as some people pretend to believe, that we would be in agreement with any military intervention provided it came from a socialist country. When Jacques Fauvet writes: "Should 'democratic forces' which are 'fighting for socialism' in any country in the future be threatened by 'imperialism' and appeal to 'international solidarity,' in other words to the Soviet Union, Georges Marchais supports in advance Moscow's armed intervention." He is distorting our position, and it is not difficult to guess why. We do not give unconditional support to anybody and are not afraid to say NO, to the Soviet Union too, every time we feel it is right to do so. Our stance on Czechoslovakia, which has not altered since 1968, is valid for the future and is an unambiguous reply to Fauvet: "We support nothing in advance and certainly not with our eyes closed."

Of course, it is regrettable that the world has not emerged from prehistory and that noninterference is not yet a universal reality. It is regrettable that, to obtain independence, peoples are still forced (as in Vietnam) to wage bloody 30-year wars. But whose fault is this? We support those who are oppressed and are trying to break their chains. On France-Inter Saturday Michele Cotta discovered in America's absence that we were against the STATUS QUO in the world--which is true--but deduced from that--falsely--that we had abandoned the theory of peaceful coexistence. If she had glanced at the documents we have published in the past 30 years she would have avoided this mistake. We have never said that peaceful coexistence implied stopping the class struggle on an international scale--which is an objective reality--but that peaceful coexistence--hence, nonintervention--creates the most favorable conditions for the emancipation of peoples, for their liberation struggle and their capacity to build democracy and socialism.

DEBATE CONTINUES ON PCF'S STANCE ON AFGHANISTAN

Marchais Press Conference

LD161139 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Jan 80 p 7 LD

[Unattributed report: "We Grasp Firmly the Banner of Union"]

[Text] Having replied to numerous questions on international policy from journalists present at the press conference held by the PCF delegation at Roissy, Georges Marchais declared to a journalist who spoke of "waves" stirred up by his remarks about [Socialist Party member] Pierre Joxe: "I have said, and I repeat, that I have nothing to learn from Pierre Joxe or from any Socialist leader. Moreover, one cannot say that the Socialist leaders have demonstrated much courage in the hard tests that our people and our country have had to suffer recently."

PS About-face

To another journalist who considered that "the Moscow stand" threatened to lead the Socialists to "overturn their alliances," Georges Marchais replied:

"But they have overturned their alliances: When Francois Mitterrand abandoned the joint left program, when Francois Mitterrand abandoned the policy of union in 1977, he renounced the policy that we had managed to set up in 1972. It is the Socialist Party [PS] which has renounced the perspective that we opened up together. It now refuses to lead the fight resolutely with the PCF in defense of workers' claims against the policy of austerity and unemployment. The PS approved the installation of missiles in several countries that NATO has just decided on. The PS lines up with U.S. imperialism on the issue of Iran, of Kampuchea, in all the regions and countries where they would like to restore the old colonial order. The PS change of direction is no longer still to be made--it was made in 1977; and the struggle that the PCF is waging, still grasping firmly the banner of union, is precisely to construct a new union which, this time, will be capable of withstanding the test of the class struggle."

Communists' Accord

A journalist then asks Georges Marchais for his comments on the criticisms put forward by a certain number of Communist intellectuals, particularly those of Jean Elleinstein.

"Do not confuse the mass of 70,000 party intellectuals with a few comrades who continue to express disagreement and who moreover sometimes put themselves in positions which I consider somewhat distressing, not for the PCF but for themselves. On my return from Cuba I examined a broadcast involving Jean Elleinstein, during which he let himself be spat on for over an hour. They would not have done such a thing to me.

"You speak of 'criticisms.' But my friend Gaston Plissonnier told me that the joint declaration adopted with the CPSU has already been massively approved by Communists who have been telephoning and writing even though it was only published yesterday morning. They are satisfied because this declaration is indeed in line with our 23d congress. It is based on an accurate analysis of the relationship of world forces in favor of social progress, democracy, national independence and socialism. It takes into account, too, the counteroffensive that imperialism has just manifested in diverse measures: the NATO decision to install the missiles, the intervention in Afghanistan and the veritable ideological war against the communist parties, against the Soviet Union in caricature of our policy and our positions--we, the PCF, who are a revolutionary party, a party of struggle for the defense of the workers' interests, for peace and for socialism.

"At the same time the joint declaration reaffirms our wish to work for the union, to rally all forces, including the Socialist and Social Democratic parties and the Christian forces.... There are on these grounds possibilities for joint actions. It is to be regretted that such is not the case in France, because of the PS' attitude, but it gladdens me to see that the socialists and the Social Democrats in the Netherlands and in Belgium or elsewhere are also fighting against the deployment of the new U.S. missiles in Europe, for example. Well, we are ready to act with all forces, at home and abroad, who will determine with us objectives and forms of action meeting the interests of peace."

To the accusation of the PCF's "turning in" on itself and returning voluntarily to the "ghetto", Georges Marchais replied:

"You know, there have been attempts in the past to put the PCF in the 'ghetto.' Now as then, those who attempt this have neither the strength nor the means. the PCF is a great party which influences nearly one Frenchman in four. Recent elections confirm this: I read a study in LA CROIX, before leaving for the Soviet Union, which demonstrates that all the by-elections in the last year have demonstrated a consolidation of our party while the PS has weakened slightly. In consequence, our party is a great force which, I believe, is going to increase further its influence in the future. Far from being a party turned in to itself, we have a great policy, a very great policy for our working class, our people and our country.

"In practice, our line of action takes three directions:

"1) To do everything to defend the workers' claims, to be present everywhere on the field of struggles. Giscard d'Estaing will not have the consent of the PCF. The PCF is with the workers wherever they are, wherever they struggle.

"2) To do everything for peace and disarmament. The imperialist counteroffensive will not make us turn back in this field. On the contrary, we are going to continue to increase the initiatives and proposals. We must put an end to the stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction--the fate of mankind and the security of the peoples are at stake.

"3) We will continue to display our solidarity with all the democratic, national and revolutionary forces fighting throughout the world for their independence, for progress and for socialism.

"These three objectives are closely linked to the desire to rally all who are ready to act, to do something in defense of the interests and happiness of men. If you call that a policy of turning in on oneself, well: You are mistaken; it is a great rallying policy. The banner of union is still firmly in the grasp of the Communists and no one has the power to take it from them."

Interview With Dissident Historian

LD160953 Paris LE MATIN in French 9 Jan 80 p 2 LD

[Didier Buffin interview with "communist historian" Jean Rony: "Eurocommunism and the PCF--an Illusion"; date, place not given; first paragraph is editorial introduction]

[Excerpts] PCF approval of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has shocked many communist militants. More generally, it has confirmed the radicalization of the party leadership. Jean Rony, a critical intellectual and expert, among other things, on the PCE and PCI, on which he has reported for FRANCE NOUVELLE for several years, explains here why Eurocommunism has never gone beyond the "incantation" stage as far as the French Communists are concerned. As for the 1981 presidential election, he believes that any decision about presenting a Communist candidate can only be adopted by a congress.

LE MATIN: What do you think about the Politburo's approval of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan?

Jean Rony: Any possibility of the PCF's extending its direct influence and spreading its ideas has been directly affected by the Politburo's attitude to Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The arguments used could have served just as well to justify intervention in Prague in 1968.

I would like to remark in passing on the respect shown by L'HUMANITE for its readers. They are told: The new Afghan Government is opening prison gates for thousands of prisoners who were kept there. But were the readers informed that the Amin government, which was also pro-Soviet, filled these prisons? No. Similarly in Kampuchea the Pol Pot regime was called a bloodthirsty tyranny only after Vietnamese intervention. Nothing of this was mentioned either in L'HUMANITE or in the communist press in general prior to this intervention. Since then Andre Lajoinie has even invented the concept of "red fascism" to describe Pol Pot's Kampuchea.

LE MATIN: How do you explain the PCF's approval?

Jean Rony: The fewer prospects the PCF sees in France, the harder it clings to its tradition and its identity or, to be more exact, to the most questionable aspects of that tradition, even when as a result it is bound to find itself in a difficult situation and to discredit the blueprint for society which it advocates. An impression has long prevailed, but has become even more noticeable in recent months, that the political leadership is no longer in control of many things, working in fits and starts and sometimes losing its head. The attitude adopted to demonstrations by women, Goldman's assassination, the Boulin affair and the often shameful campaign waged against Francois Mitterrand are indications of this state of disarray. A new and interesting development has taken place in the past 3 months or more: Any blunder by the leadership has created unrest in the party ranks and has caused protests, which have been expressed more or less publicly.

Having no influence on reality, the party leadership has followed the line of least resistance and has adopted a primitive antisocialist stance, giving excessive prominence to workers, revolutionary phraseology and now this expedition to Moscow, which is being treated with quite unwarranted solemnity.

LE MATIN: What remains today of Eurocommunism?

Jean Rony: Eurocommunism in the PCF has never passed the stage of being an incantation. Maxime Gremetz wrote in November 1978, I believe: "Eurocommunism exists, we have often repeated it." Now, Eurocommunism only has meaning if one takes into account the working movement such as it is and develops a strategy of union aiming to change everything that can be changed, to locate the main adversary and to champion all progress, however partial or precarious.

Eurocommunism inspires the PCI and PCE party lines. The PCI has basically embarked on a line tending toward power-sharing and increasing the weight of the working movement in the institutions. For this it did not ask guarantees from its eventual partners, knowing that these eventual guarantees exist only in the initiative of the masses. Its temporary setback does not put its policy in doubt. Moreover the PCI, a constituent part of Eurocommunism, is directing a plan on the European scale for struggle against the crisis which would bring together the various political and trade union sections of the European working movement. Such a plan is incompatible with the PCF's policy.

On this basis Eurocommunism is only a form of words pinned loosely onto the present reality of the PCF leadership. I say present indeed, because in 1973-74 Georges Marchais seemed to have imbibed some elements of the Eurocommunist stance ahead of time with, to be sure, a certain politician's narrowness. Self-management is a word which he is not yet accustomed to saying; feminism, democracy at grass roots level, he is insensitive to all that. But he proposed the outlines of a great policy of reconstituting the working movement on the European scale.

Reread his interview with Harris and Sedouy, remember his Swedish trip to meet Palme, and the victory bulletin published in L'HUMANITE when, in the Ruhr, Georges Marchais was received by the Social Democratic mayor of a small town. All things considered, I should willingly have made Georges Marchais my presidential candidate. Especially when, judging by the particularly cordial passage addressed by the Politburo to Francois Mitterrand the day after the second round of the 1974 presidential election, the rule on reciprocal withdrawal would have been respected. This great policy capsized with the fateful 21st congress in October 1974.

LE MATIN Editorial

ID161435 Paris LE MATIN in French 12-13 Jan 80 p 2 LD

[Editorial: "A Brutality Coming From Abroad"]

[Text] In the atmosphere of a political meeting brutality can pass unnoticed. But when it asserts itself on television within the framework of a very polite interview and when it is one of the country's foremost representative political leaders who is guilty of it, it becomes both out of place and alarming. This is the impression which many people probably had when they listened to Georges Marchais and watched him on French television channel one in a program transmitted direct from Moscow studios yesterday. In fact, the PCF secretary general chose the Soviet capital to tell Socialist Pierre Joxe--who had asked him to explain his views on Afghanistan--that he "would not be lectured on courage by the nonentity, that insolent fellow, that small-time lackey of Francois Mitterrand."

Like some similar occurrences in the past, this will not improve the image of politicians in the eyes of the public. Georges Marchais was not only tense and aggressive--to say the least--but also obviously rattled. Should he not have thought seven times before using the word "lackey?"

It seems that the PCF has again opted, as it did at the time of its intellectual hegemony, for arrogance and provocation. Satisfied neither with approving the Soviet military operation in Afghanistan in Paris nor with paying tribute as vassal to the Kremlin overlord, Georges Marchais restated to dumbfounded, if not horror-stricken, television viewers, with reference to Afghanistan, that the Soviet Government "had refused to respond to any plea for intervention for several years in order not to increase international tension. It decided to act only because of the imperialist threat."

The PCF has stuck to its line and confirmed it. At the same time, the Italian ommunists have officially condemned this intervention and expressed their "disapproval" in a communique. The PCF has a right to differ. However, by mentioning only ideological arguments in support of its attitude, it deceives its members and its electorate. Contrary to Georges Marchais' assertions, there is no "formidable operation aimed at making peoples rise against the USSR." There are only self-evident facts: The Red Army has just occupied a foreign country. It has violated the fundamental principle of national sovereignty, as the PCI has already emphasized, and, finally, it is behaving like an occupier. During the Vietnam war the United States behaved in an identical manner, and international opinion and a majority of U.S. citizens finally violently repudiated such a behavior. Does this mean that "peoples were made to rise against the United States?"

Perhaps disoriented by an exceptional acceleration of events, the PCF leaders have decidedly embarked on a path which could deal an unexpected blow to their electoral strength, even though their behavior has certainly been motivated by the belief that it would have the opposite effect. Be that as it may, Georges Marchais has recently lost his cool. Even though France's history has been very stormy, few leaders of the left have settled their political accounts from abroad.

L'HUMANITE Rebuttal of Elleinstein

ID161459 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Jan 80 p 6 LD

[Unattributed report: "One More Step"]

[Text] In an interview with Benoit Rayski, FRANCE-SOIR's anticommunism expert, [PCF dissident] Jean Elleinstein made very effort to distort the PCF strategy by dreaming up allegations of alinement with the USSR which he baptized "sound pivot." In this way Hersant's newspaper has avoided talking about the real content of the PCF-CPSU communique on socialism and its diversity. The historian [Elleinstein] is playing his part in the falsification of history which FRANCE-SOIR readily uses.

PCI DOCUMENT ON AFGHANISTAN, FOREIGN POLICY ISSUED

LD161231 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 6 Jan 80 pp 1, 15 LD

[Text of PCI Directorate 4 January document: "PCI Proposes European Initiative To Safeguard Peace and Relaunch Detente"]

[Text] Rome--The PCI Directorate, which met Friday to discuss foreign policy issues on the basis of a report delivered by Paolo Bufalini, approved the following document at the end of the proceedings:

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is the latest grave episode in the escalation of political and military tensions which are jeopardizing world peace. In view of such an intervention, which constitutes a violation of the principles of independence and national sovereignty, the PCI reasserts its complete disapproval, invoking the stances adopted at its recent 15th congress: "There are no reasons which can justify interference and intervention in a state's internal life. It is inadmissible to violate states' integrity and sovereignty to lend support to reactionary systems, and to export revolution, to teach punitive lessons or to avert more or less hypothetical threats." These stances are consistent with the conception and strategy worked out and pursued over many years by the Italian Communists, according to which safeguarding peace, detente and peaceful coexistence and cooperation are not merely supreme assets and, under present conditions, a prime requirement for the survival of human civilization, but also the ground on which the movement to free the peoples from imperialism and of mankind's progress toward socialism can most freely develop. The fundamental truth that the peoples' liberation processes can only be carried out by the peoples themselves is more valid than ever.

At the same time, the PCI expresses its deep concern and opposition with respect to the reprisal measures adopted and proposed by the Carter administration, including tabling ratification of SALT II and the request for negative changes in relations with the USSR. Such approaches and aims further increase the tensions, which have already been aggravated by NATO's missiles decision refusing any preliminary negotiation attempt. By embarking upon this path the U.S. Government is assuming grave responsibilities.

Growing Threats

International relations have thus reached an extremely acute state of crisis. The threats to peace are growing daily. The alarm expressed in the past few days by European statesmen, various political forces and the pope--with his great authority--is therefore fully justified.

The old regional crises--from the Middle East to Southeast Asia--are not being resolved; they have been joined by new ones, including the dramatic crisis that has arisen between Iran and the United States following the popular uprising which overthrew the shah's tyrannical regime and the inadmissible seizure and continued detention of U.S. hostages, countered by heavy threats of U.S. military interventions.

North-South relations are deteriorating continuously, with the exacerbation of the problems of underdevelopment and famine for billions of people. The energy crisis, the race to control raw materials, the capitalist economies' contradictions and the monetary and commercial turbulence are increasing the disarray and stability of the world situation. The world situation is still characterized by the continued existence of widespread social injustices and vast wastage and the exploitation of the populations of entire regions through the fault of the privileged classes, the neocolonialist and imperialist forces and all those who oppose building a new order based on justice and equal rights for all people.

U.S.-USSR relations are in danger of returning to a phase of diametric opposition reminiscent of the cold war era. Everything is burdened by the resumption of the arms race, at a time when this means a dangerous qualitative leap forward in nuclear weapons and their dangerous proliferation in an increasing number of countries.

Insecurity, fear. the use of force and military methods are spreading; there is renewed talk of war, and the spirit and practice of detente--which is the only passable road for mankind in view of the disastrous prospect of a nuclear conflict--are obscured and in a state of crisis.

An end must be put to this grave and rapid deterioration in international relations, to the accumulation of threats and dangers to world peace. Woe betide us if the spiral of violent acts in response to other violent acts is not broken by a great mobilization of the masses, peoples, governments and all peace-loving forces.

There is a pressing need to save detente and relaunch it on more secure foundations. This demands the revival in international life of the major principles of peaceful coexistence, observance of the independence and national sovereignty and noninterference in the internal life of individual countries, and negotiation to resolve interstate disputes. It demands that the logic of counterposed blocs and power politics be smashed. It demands a determined and specific tackling of the major problems of a more equitable world political and economic order, which can only stem from active cooperation among states and countries with differing social systems.

The most pressing tasks is to bring about a definite resumption of negotiations and accords on the road to arms control, to achieve a balanced disarmament and ultimately a ban on all nuclear weapons. To this end the prime condition now is the rapid approval of SALT II by the United States and the opening of negotiations on medium-range missiles and weapons in Europe, so as to guarantee a balance between the blocs at the lowest possible level and mutual and collective security.

The Italian Communists are more committed than ever to contributing their utmost to developing the most varied and broad action for peace before it is too late.

Already, with particular vigor, a very broad spectrum of political and social, cultural and religious forces has--each in its own individual manner--expressed alarm and a profound desire for peace and is mobilizing: In Italy they include, apart from the workers movement, the Catholic world and the church. First an appeal must be made to the Italian Government and the European governments to intervene actively and without delay to defend--and even more than to defend: to relaunch--the great cause of detente, and primarily for the resumption of the U.S.-USSR dialog. In this context an irreplaceable, autonomous and nondelegable role awaits the West European countries, the EEC and in particular all its democratic and peace-loving forces, many of which are already speaking out. First and foremost a major role awaits the European socialist and leftwing-oriented forces, which are expressing awareness of the vital need for Europe to avoid the logic of the counterposition of the two major powers and to develop an effective initiative to emerge from the present dire straits. A no less important role awaits the nonalined countries' movement, especially at present.

The Communists ask the Italian Government--which has hitherto demonstrated little awareness of the gravity of the present situation and a passive and acquiescent attitude--to announce, primarily within the Atlantic alliance, a steadfast line making no concessions to measures which could entail further exacerbations but which will, on the contrary, be aimed at facilitating detente and the resumption of dialog and negotiations.

In particular the Communists propose that the Italian Government, whose turn it is to fill the 6-month chairmanship of the EEC Council of Ministers, take the initiative for an immediate top-level meeting of the nine EEC countries, to propose and assert a joint European stance and initiative in favor of detente and peace.

L'UNITA DETAILS PCI INITIATIVE IN EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

ID161253 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 12 Jan 80 pp 1,16 LD

[Franco Petrone report: "PCI Proposes Action to Europeans"]

[Excerpt] Rome--Following the dramatic shift in international relations the Italian Communists, convinced of the role that West Europe must play while observing its present alliances to guarantee mutual security and peace and to surmount every form of interference and prevarication in interstate relations, have taken another initiative addressed to the European Parliament. All the deputies elected on the PCI slate to the Strasbourg assembly presented, with a view to the European parliamentary session opening Monday, a resolution calling for an urgent discussion urging actions and initiatives designed to halt the threats of and thrusts toward a cold war.

Among other things, the resolution calls on the European Parliament: 1--To express its most serious condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, which constitutes an open violation of the principles of national independence and sovereignty;

2--To urge the nine EEC countries, within the context of the Atlantic alliance and in all international forums, to work to make the line of negotiation prevail, rather than the line of reprisals and of exacerbation of relations, which is partly aimed at halting or weakening economic and cultural exchanges and would entail an irreversible halt in the detente process which must be safeguarded and carried forward steadfastly. All this is necessary to secure the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan, and to achieve agreements and understandings designed to attain arms control and reduction, starting with the U.S. ratification of SALT II and the initiation of negotiations on medium-range missiles and other weapons, which will make it possible to avoid the deployment of new missiles in Europe and to guarantee both a balance between the blocs at the lowest possible level and mutual and collective security;

3--To call on the EEC Council of Ministers to adopt promptly, within the context of political cooperation, a joint stance to assert and propose a European initiative in favor of detente and peace.

SARAGAT, LONGO MAKE OPENING SPEECHES AT PSDI CONGRESS

ID162252 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] The opening remarks at the 15th Italian Social Democratic Party [PSDI] Congress by party President Saragat indicated the two trends which the Social Democrats will be invited to consider in the immediate future. The first is that of the grave international situation dominated by Soviet imperialism of which, according to Saragat, the destabilizing action of our terrorism is also a manifestation. The other trend is Italy's internal situation. The PSDI will work for peace, not by associating the Communist Party with the government, but by working for the removal of obstacles placed in the way of the evolution of this party and by convincing it to consider inviolable the values of freedom and democracy.

Saragat's opening speech was followed by a report by Pietro Longo, PSDI secretary, in which an examination of the international situation received primary attention. The situation is characterized, Longo said, by the extreme peril of Soviet hegemonism, which aims at dividing the NATO members and even at changing the map. According to Longo, a new alinement by China in a pro-Soviet direction is not impossible. The USSR must receive responsible, courageous, sensible and clear responses, particularly following the aggression in Afghanistan. The peace offers and the attempts to build a new detente in the world must be accompanied by firmness due to the possibility of a military response.

Regarding internal problems, Longo spoke first about the economic crisis. To solve them it is necessary to think in terms of structure and to concentrate political and governmental attention on guidelines which will bring Italian society to the circle of industrialized countries and a high standard of living.

Thus, inflation must be tackled, the rebirth of the south must be promoted, state participation in industry must be revised, construction activity must be stimulated by the development of the reforming mechanism of the fair rent system, an adequate energy policy must be pursued free from maneuvers and scandals, and tax evasion must be combated.

As for labor struggles, Longo called on democratic trade unionists not to remain silent over demands that appear unacceptable. We cannot accept, he said, that undemocratic conformism should prevail at meetings. The regulation of strikes is a necessity which is felt universally. Regarding terrorism, Longo's words were very clear: The false assurance of certain sectors of Italian culture and politics is completely erroneous. We must protect Italians from terrorism and common crime by effective laws and by a political and moral commitment which fully seeks to safeguard democratic freedom, rights and our peaceful coexistence.

In reference to the Communist Party, Longo said that we need [from the PCC] precise terms for NATO membership, the general condemnation of the USSR, the acceptance of a joint Europe-U.S. strategy, the acceptance of our system and the rejection of Leninist concepts, as to relations with the socialist party, Longo stressed that the PSDI will not fail to promote all possible agreements in the conviction that they will lead to the formation of a great democratic bloc of the left which will insure in the immediate future the stability and governability of the country.

FINANCE MINISTER SPEAKS ON ECONOMIC STRATEGY

LD152236 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 15 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] Parliament has been debating the sixth government's program since morning. Foreign policy was debated during the morning session and the economy in the afternoon. Our team of reporters in Sao Bento Palace will summarize today's proceedings:

The minister of finance, Cavaco E. Silva, spoke during the afternoon session. He began his speech by analyzing the country's present economic situation, referring to the 1979 indicators:

[Begin Silva recording] In 1979 production increased by only 2.5 percent. Private consumption remained at the same level. Investment probably decreased by 1 percent. Unemployment [word indistinct]. Deterioration of the environment was not stopped. Inequalities in the distribution of wealth increased. There was no improvement in meeting the social needs of the people. [end recording]

This panorama, which according to some circles is in answer to Ramalho Eanes' speech during the swearing-in ceremony of this government, can be augumented by another passage in which the minister dismisses as of little relevance the results achieved by the previous governments regarding the current accounts balance and the balance of payments:

[Begin Silva recording] There is little comfort to be taken in the fact that the latest estimates indicate a surplus, I repeat, a surplus in the current accounts balance worth around $100 million, and a surplus in the balance of payments of over $1 billion, or in the fact that as a result of the increase in the price of gold, the Bank of Portugal's reserves were worth around $10.4 billion at the end of 1979, with gold valued at the average price of the past 3 months. [end recording]

Continuing to review the negative factors of the present situation and (?breaking down) many of the known indicators, Cavaco e Silva said that, up to the present, our country had not had an economic policy in the true sense of the word.

It is bearing this in mind that he promised, as of now, adoption of measures integrated in and coherent with an overall plan aimed at overcoming the negative effects of the present situation and launching anew the Portuguese economy:

[Begin Silva recording] The government will accept the challenge of expanding the Portuguese economy and lowering the rate of price increases when there is a significant decrease in both economic growth and the rate of inflation in the Western world. The government will try to contradict the predictions made by the OECD last November, according to which the growth of production in Portugal in 1980 would be less than in 1979 and the rate of inflation would increase. [end recording]

The speech made by the minister led to statements from the Socialist and Communist benches, the most expressive of which was the one made by [Communist] Bital Moreira who, referring to the economic indicators and the analysis mentioned by the minister, leveled severe criticism at the parties which support the government because, he said, these results are the consequence of policies dictated by the IMF, which those parties supported. Now, he said, those parties are complaining about the present situation.

UCD Decision Precipitates Resignation

[Excerpt] The subject of regional autonomy (?is the main news) after the meeting yesterday of the ruling Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] Executive Committee. One of the immediate consequences of the agreements adopted yesterday by the government party was the resignation of Culture Minister Manuel Clavero Arevalo. Mr Clavero, according to an EFE news agency report, submitted his resignation today to Prime Minister Suarez because of the position adopted by the UCD in connection with Andalusian autonomy.

In its meeting yesterday the government party decided to propose abstention in the Andalusian autonomy referendum which will be held on 28 February. This decision raises the possibility that Andalusian autonomy will not be approved by the majority of voters as established in the Constitution. Therefore, according to the Constitution, 5 years would have to pass before another vote could be held. The government, following the resolution of the autonomy of the Basque country and Catalonia, has opted for a slow approach to the problems of self-government of the other Spanish regions.

In legal terms, the UCD has turned to Article 143 of the Constitution instead of Article 151, which until now had been the main guideline for the autonomy processes. However, this ruling party decision does not only affect Andalusia. According to the document approved yesterday by the UCD Executive Committee, which was made public this evening, the government party will favor abstention or blank votes in the autonomy referendums planned under Article 151 of the Constitution. This position of the centrist party essentially means the very probable freezing of autonomy for 5 years. In its document the UCD states that the very complex transformation of a very heavily centralized state to an autonomous one cannot be speedily realized without high economic and social costs. The UCD document also points out that some political groups mistakenly see the subject of autonomy as an assault on the state and as a solution to economic, social and cultural problems from which some Spanish regions suffer.

PCE's AZCARATE HITS 'HASTE TO BURY EUROCOMMUNISM'

LD151553 Paris LE MATIN in French 10 Jan 80 p 12 LD

[Article by PCE International Section chief Manuel Azcarate: "For Spain, Eurocommunism Is More Necessary Than Ever"]

[Text] Certain media are trying to bury Eurocommunism using the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan as a pretext. To this end and to denounce as "ambiguous" the Eurocommunists' attitudes, voluntarist distortions have been committed: [paragraph continues]

The PCE's position has been clear; its Executive Committee "has been anxious to make public its condemnation of the intervention by Soviet troops in Afghanistan," considering "that the entry by troops of one country into another violates the principles of sovereignty and independence and contributes to greater tension in international relations, creating new threats to world peace. The fact that, at other times, certain imperialist powers have used similar methods to those we condemn today does not constitute an excuse for what has happened." Where is the ambiguity then?

Faced by the crisis of capitalism, Eurocommunism's raison d'etre was to open the democratic road to socialism and to formulate the concept, the plan of a socialism within freedom.

But in these moments of transition between the seventies and the eighties, international problems are becoming extremely serious. We are facing the threat--especially after the NATO decisions, imposed by U.S. pressure despite strong European reluctance--of a new arms race on the old continent. We are facing the "oil crisis" with all its consequences and the threat that the most aggressive imperialist sectors will resort to military and colonialist methods to put a brake on the sensational awakening of peoples who yesterday were still slaves but today are determined to become masters of their destinies and of their wealth. One could easily cite other aspects. But it is evident that, in this international situation characterized by a heightening of tension and an accumulation of dangers, sending troops into Afghanistan helps to make matters worse, to create new zones of tension and to cause new threats to coexistence and peace.

The United States hastened to freeze ratification of the SALT II treaty (even if the Senate had already adopted a negative attitude before the events in Afghanistan). At the same time it adopted measures aimed at worsening the USSR's economic situation, the effect of which will doubtless be to harden positions.... The progress achieved on the road to detente after years of efforts has been wiped out at a stroke. We are on the road back to cold war.

The European left devotes itself to preventing such a process from starting. Must we spell out that we are in a very different situation from that of the fifties. The crisis of bipolarization is real, despite the reactivation of confrontations between the military blocs. The dangers threatening us are grave. But equally, new factors exist which can help us out of the tunnel. Above all, there is the importance of the nonalined movement with its decisive weight in the United Nations.

Another fundamental subject is Europe's role: The need for Western Europe to place itself outside the logic of blocs is more apparent than ever. Europe must take initiatives which open the way to negotiation and to a realistic examination of the problems and contradictions. It must divine concrete solutions capable of reestablishing the UN principles and permitting the search for new forms of security based on the reduction and not the increase of armaments.

To accomplish that, the European left would have to reject the temptation to revert to an alinement based on bloc politics and would have to succeed in "playing politics," affecting events and influencing reality. And one condition of this success is precisely the strengthening of Eurocommunism, not only, as some claim, by adopting a critical attitude to the USSR but, far more than that, by having the capacity for elaboration, initiative and dialog with the progressive forces, to struggle against this new international order. Is not this haste in some quarters to bury Eurocomminism due precisely to the fact that it is more necessary than ever for the peace and progress of peoples?

VAYRYNEN, OLESEN DISCUSS AFGHAN CRISIS, NATO PLANS

LD151021 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 9 Jan 80 p 8 LD

[Hagen Cumlet RITZAUS bureau/NORWEGIAN TELEGRAPH BUREAU Helsinki dispatch: "Mild Finnish Criticism of Soviet Union"]

[Text] Finland partially broke its official silence over the Soviet military invasion of Afghanistan during the official visit of Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen on Monday and Tuesday.

Finnish Foreign Minister Vaake Vayrynen indirectly appealed to the great neighbor to the east, the Soviet Union, to exercise restraint. A high-ranking Foreign Ministry official in Helsinki, speaking in a press interview, described the situation as "a very, very serious superpower conflict which it would be best for the small countries to keep out of."

Must Think Again

Foreign Ministry Deputy Secretary Keijo Korhonen, regarded as a confidant of President Urho Kekkonen, said that countries like Finland must think twice before reacting officially in particularly serious situations, indicating in the interview that the Afghan situation is particularly serious.

Drawing a parallel with "other crisis situations which have recently aroused concern in Finland and among the world community," Finnish Foreign Minister Vayrynen said in Helsinki Monday evening, during a dinner speech for his Danish guest, that Finland "hopes for a swift deescalation and stabilization...to prevent the international political atmosphere from being further exacerbated."

Political observers believe this to be the clearest expression yet of the Finnish attitude to the Soviet military intervention in Islamic Afghanistan.

Hitherto the Finnish Government has outwardly merely noted Moscow's promises that the Soviet troops will be withdrawan when "the situation permits."

Caution

The Finnish Foreign Ministry's caution over the invasion of Afghanistan should be viewed against the background of Finnish neutrality which has developed around the 1948 friendship and cooperation treaty with the Soviet Union.

Following the talks with his Finnish host, Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen told journalists that both countries expressed "great concern over recent developments in the field of security policy, and there was no great optimism concerning adequate progress in disarmament efforts such as has been generally seen in recent years."

Kjeld Olesen directed his comments about the worrisome developments at no particular target, but observers discerned a reference to the invasion of Afghanistan and the U.S. shelving of the final Senate ratification of the SALT II treaty with the Soviet Union.

NATO Decision

The NATO decision to acquire new medium-range nuclear missiles which, in certain circumstances, would be intended for targets in East Europe was also mentioned during the foreign ministers' meeting. On several occasions Finland has strongly criticized the NATO nuclear modernization plans, which Helsinki believes could endanger international peace.

At a final press conference in Helsinki on Tuesday, Kjeld Olesen said that the two countries both want the Afghan crisis resolved primarily under UN direction.

Denmark and Finland believe that the current tense situation could complicate the Conference on European Security and Cooperation in Madrid later in the year. But the Danish foreign minister emphasized that none of the 35 countries participating, including the United States and the Soviet Union, has ruled out the Madrid meeting because of the Afghan crisis or for any other reason.

Norway Stepping Up Its Readiness

Norwegian defense has stepped up its readiness on account of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, ADRESSEAVISEN wrote on Tuesday.

"In the tense situation which has arisen over the Soviet forces' move into Afghanistan, the defense authorities have implemented certain measures and will increase these to the extent required by changes in the situation," according to a statement from the Norwegian High Command.

Civil Defense Has Not Been Expanded

In a crisis, an interdepartmental committee would be called together for consultations. The situation in Afghanistan has not yet made it necessary to assemble the committee.

CP REPORT QUESTIONS SOVIET POLICY IN AFGHANISTAN

LD151153 London MORNING STAR in English 15 Jan 80 pp 1, 4 LD

["Major extracts" of report by Jack Woddis, head of the British Communist Party's International Department, to the party's Executive Committee "this weekend"]

[Text] Recent events in Afghanistan raise fundamental questions of political principle.

Ever since its foundation our party has struggled for the interests of the working people and for peace, in solidarity with all struggles throughout the world for democracy, national liberation and socialism. We take our stand on that basis.

We express our complete solidarity with the Afghan people's democratic, anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution.

But we express our disagreement with the intervention of the Soviet Union's Armed Forces in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and call for their withdrawal.

And we will oppose with all our strength the efforts of the British and U.S. governments to exploit the situation to increase international tension, step up the arms race, and create new bases in Asia and the Middle East for imperialist adventures.

Since April 27, 1978, with considerable assistance from the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, the Afghan people have made important changes in their country. Particularly important have been the ending of feudal debts, the carrying through of land reform, and the decree ending social inequality between men and women, and abolishing the feudal bride price. Economic planning has begun, and trade unions have been established. Over 600 new schools and colleges have been opened, and one million enrolled in literacy classes.

Difficulties

The attempt to implement these far-reaching changes has been made in the face of many difficulties, aggravated by long-standing and deep divisions among the leaders of the revolutionary movement itself. These differences were expressed particularly in the personalities of Nur Mohammad Taraki, Hafizollah Amin and Babrak Karmal, all of whom were associated for many years in the revolutionary movement, especially after the formation of the People's Democratic Party in 1965.

Following the national democratic revolution of April 27, 1978, Taraki became president and prime minister, Babrak Karmal deputy prime minister and Amin deputy prime minister and foreign minister. Shortly afterwards, Babrak Karmal was demoted and sent as ambassador to Prague, to be subsequently accused of high treason. Amin later became prime minister.

Some months later Taraki was killed and Amin became president. Now Amin has been killed and Babrak Karmal has been made president. Amin, after the killing of Taraki, accused the latter of personal rule and mass repression, and announced the release of the political prisoners.

Prisoners

Now, after Amin's death, similar charges are made against Amin, and thousands of Amin's political prisoners are being released.

While we in no way expect revolutionary processes in Afghanistan--or in other developing countries--to follow similar patterns to those in bourgeois democracies, we cannot but express our concern at the course events have taken. The explanations given provide no basis for a serious scientific analysis, and they carry no conviction. This is true also regarding the overthrow of the Amin government.

The serious divisions among the revolutionary forces have undoubtedly been aggravated by an elitist and putschist tendency in the movement. This approach is indicated, for example, in the official biography of Taraki, published in Kabul on August 23, 1978. There it is claimed that, on the basis of the specific conditions in Afghanistan, Taraki "found a short cut for wresting political power" by winning over the army and bringing it under the "party command and instructions."

Political and ideological differences in the revolutionary leadership have been largely settled not by democratic debate and mass involvement, but by decisions taken at the top, and, above all, by an apparent reliance on armed force, again at the top. This elitist and militarist trend runs right through the official history of the April Revolution, as published by the political department of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan. The entire story revolves around winning over the young officers in the armed forces and preparing for a military coup. Only at the very end are the people mentioned--and even here it is simply a reference to the people having "welcomed the revolution with great enthusiasm" as soon as "the news spread far and wide."

There is no doubt that the people were involved in struggles over a number of years before the April Revolution. There were strikes, marches, mass demonstrations, and big public meetings. The revolution itself was preceded by a huge funeral procession of 10,000 people in honour of one of the leaders of the People's Democratic Party who had been killed by the former Daud regime. Yet there is none of these actions by the people in the official pamphlet on the revolution, nor in Taraki's official biography.

It is clear, nevertheless, that the revolution was popularly received, that it had progressive aims, and that it ushered in a period of profound anti-feudal changes in Afghan society.

Dangers

Yet it was accompanied by an elitist tendency that carried with it serious dangers, and which we have seen present in anti-feudal and anti-imperialist movements in other developing countries.

It is against Marxist principles to argue that work to win over army officers should be the main basis of revolutionary activity, on the incorrect grounds that, with their access to arms, officers will be able to settle the question of political power more swiftly and decisively. These putschist views lead to a neglect of work among the people.

The seizure of power under the leadership of people with such views results, after establishing a new government, in a continuation of the same error. Thus, there develops a tendency to govern by administrative measures from on top and a failure to involve the mass of people in the revolutionary process. Power can be seized by a coup, but a social revolution requires mass participation and the building of political organisation at the grass roots.

Weaknesses in involving the people in political action complicated the second major problem which the Afghan revolution faced--namely that of coping with internal opposition.

First, there has been a conservative tendency, understandably resistant to the land reform and the changes in the position of women. Secondly, there has been an organised counter-revolution which has taken advantage of the backwardness and conservatism of sections of the people.

The counter-revolution has its main base among landlords, rich peasants, and others with vested interests in the old regime. It was also able to exploit the mistakes of the Taraki and Amin governments, especially in the handling of the land reform and the treatment of Moslems. Rumours of land collectivisation and anxieties over religious matters created resistance to the government, even when there may have been less substance to these fears then some reports claim.

Internal opposition and counter-revolution found ready allies across the borders in Iran and Pakistan--and this has constituted the third major problem facing the Afghan people's revolution. The border with Pakistan has created particular difficulties, since the Baluchi and Pushtu people live on both sides of the frontier. Pakistan and Iranian authorities have both given backing to the Afghan counter-revolution, including arming bands of people to cross the border and take up armed struggle against the Afghan Government.

Imperialism

The major external factor, however, has been United States imperialism. Its agents have no doubt been working overtime to encourage the Pakistan Government to use its territory as a training ground and base for armed bands to launch attacks into Afghanistan. The Chinese Government, too, has been assisting with arming and training these bands, according to reports in the press which China has not denied.

Since the tribal and ethnic origins of people on both sides of the Afghan and Pakistani frontiers are similar, and since many have crossed into Pakistan as refugees following the revolution in Afghanistan, foreign invaders and internal counter-revolutionaries are often indistinguishable. But to defeat the counter-revolution and the bandit attacks from across the frontiers required the utmost mobilisation of the Afghan people.

It is in the context of the problems of the Afghan people's revolution which we present here that we have to assess the intervention of armed forces of the Soviet Union.

In principle, an independent government has the right to ask for military assistance from another state if it considers itself in danger from an external threat. In such cases, the state which is asked for aid has a right to respond. In fact, this right is provided for in article 51 of the United Nations Charter. But such a response should only be made when those making the appeal have a clearly established right to do so, and when the external threat is apparent to all and of such a character as to make military assistance necessary.

Whether external military assistance, even when justified, is the best solution, or whether it is not preferable, in the given circumstances, to use the United Nations, to call on the peoples of the world to act to deter aggression, is a matter of judgment. Some comrades argue that to cite the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of another country is to place abstract principles of legalities before the necessities of the world-wide struggle against imperialism.

But to discard principles is what we expect from the capitalist class and from opportunists, not from communists. The principles which guide us are not demagogic trimmings to be tossed aside whenever it suits us.

On the contrary, they are the product of years of struggle by the working class and are enunciated as principles to be followed precisely because long experience has confirmed their validity and the need to adhere to them. It is inconsistent for comrades to argue that theoretically they are for the principle of non-intervention but that, when it comes to practice, they are against it.

Right from the days of the October Revolution Lenin enunciated the idea of peaceful co-existence, based on the non-use of military force to settle differences between states, and adherence to non-intervention by any state in the internal affairs of another state.

Leaders of the Soviet Union have argued over the years for these ideas. Peaceful co-existence, they have stressed, "presupposes an obligation on the part of all states to desist from violating each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty in any form and under any pretext whatsoever."

Co-existence

"The principle of peaceful co-existence signifies a renunciation of interference in the internal affairs of other countries with the object of altering their system of government or mode of life or for any other motives."

The main document adopted by the world communist conference, Moscow, 1969, asserts that: "The defence of peace is inseparably linked with the struggle to compel the imperialists to accept peaceful co-existence of states with different social systems, which demands observance of the principles of sovereignty, equality, territorial inviolability of every state, big and small, and non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries, respect for the rights of every people to freely decide their social, economic and political system, and the settlement of outstanding international issues by political means through negotiation."

The document of the Conference of Communist and Workers' Parties of Europe, Berlin, 1976, develops this same point. It states that the "ever more comprehensive implementation of the principles of peaceful co-existence creates more favourable conditions of struggle for democratic and socialist transformation in the capitalist countries. It creates more favourable conditions for carrying out the programmes for the economic, social and political development of the socialist countries."

It is therefore entirely wrong to argue that those who battle for peaceful co-existence and for the implementation of the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries are somehow abandoning class positions. On the contrary, the struggle of working people everywhere demands that they impose these principles on the imperialists, who have always tried to trample on them and dominate the whole world. The imperialists constantly violate this principle if they can, as they have shown in Vietnam, Angola, Mozambique, Zambia, Lebanon, Guatemala, Dominican Republic, and many other places.

Solidarity

That is why the principle of the non-interference is a weapon of working people everywhere against imperialist intrigue and aggression. It is a principle around which solidarity on the widest and most effective scale can be mobilised.

Any violation of this principle by a socialist country can only play into the hands of the imperialists, of the enemies of national and social liberation, of the enemies of peace and detente.

With the considerations of principle which we examine here in mind, we have to consider the actual events in Afghanistan. In this connection, too, the question as to who invited the Soviet Union to send in its military forces is an important matter.

A broadcast over Kabul radio on Friday, December 28, stated that the Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, "taking into account the continuing and broadening interference and provocations of the external enemies of Afghanistan and the need to defend the gains of the April Revolution" had requested help "including military aid" from the Soviet Union. This request for military aid was made, according to the broadcast, in keeping with the treaty of friendship, good neighbourhood and cooperation signed by Afghanistan and the Soviet Union on December 5, 1978.

It added that such aid had been "previously repeatedly requested from the Government of the Soviet Union." Soviet spokesmen have made the same point. Soviet military aid, they say, was exclusively to prevent outside intervention.

Requests

If there had been repeated previous requests, these must have come from the Amin government, and even possibly from the previous Taraki government--but apparently they were not responded to. No statement by the Soviet authorities or the new government has explained what new external dangers to Afghanistan arose in the week commencing December 24 to make necessary the sending of Soviet military aid which had previously been refused. Further, if Amin repeatedly requested Soviet aid, is it the kind of action one would associate with a man who is now accused by his successor, Babrak Karmal, of heading what Babrak's foreign minister has described as "bloody fascist regime?" (United Nations January 6, 1980).

To argue that Amin's pursuit of a sectarian, dogmatic course, especially toward those of Moslem belief, and his harsh repression of political opponents, had alienated popular support and left his government in a weak and isolated position is one thing. But to charge him with being a U.S. agent is another. It is not credible that a man who is accused of having plotted with the U.S. to betray his country should have "repeatedly requested" Soviet military aid.

Questions are being asked about the timing of the Soviet intervention and its relationship to the coup that toppled Amin. As early as December 22 press reports in the West mentioned the Soviet Union "continuing to reinforce its combat forces inside Afghanistan and on its Afghan border." (TIMES, December 22, 1979).

On Thursday, December 27, the press was reporting a "big airlift" of Soviet troops into Afghanistan as having taken place on December 25 or 26. In fact the U.S. made an official protest about these movements at the time.

Reports

Yet all the reports of the overthrow of Amin make it clear that it took place on December 27, that is after the capitalist press had reported a "big airlift" of Soviet troops. There is no information available to explain how Babrak Karmal, a wanted man accused of high treason, was able to return to Afghanistan, organise his forces, and carry out the coup against Amin. Nor is it known when he returned from exile. There is certainly no indication that the overthrow and execution of Amin involved any mass action by the people.

The harshness of the Amin regime was a problem for the Afghan people to resolve, as were all the accumulated problems of the country. They do not justify Soviet military intervention.

Help to a sovereign government is one thing. Military intervention in the affairs of another state to effect a change of government is another.

We are opposed to such an action because it is against the principle of our movement, it is a blow to national sovereignty and national independence, and it brings new problems in the struggle for detente and disarmament.

But it is sheer hypocrisy for Carter and Thatcher to pose as defenders of national sovereignty and democratic liberties. The imperialists are past masters in intervention. All their sympathies lie with the enemies of the Afghan revolution.

It is hypocritical, too, for China to protest, in view of its brutal aggression against Vietnam, its open backing to fascism in Chile and to the enemies of national liberation in Angola, and, more immediately pertinent, its support to the counter-revolutionary forces in Afghanistan itself.

We fully understand that the Soviet decision to intervene was not taken lightly. Not only was the Soviet Union concerned to support the Afghan people's struggle. Imperialism, with the aid of China, is working to strengthen its global positions.

There has been the NATO decision to place new nuclear missiles in Europe. There have been U.S. threats to Iran, and continuing crisis in the Middle East. There has been a scandalous hostile campaign against Vietnam and Kampuchea. And all this has been accompanied by renewed talk by Western government spokesmen about "negotiating from strength."

In this atmosphere, the Soviet Union has understandably been particularly concerned about her security. Faced with a renewed imperialist policy of threats and arms build up, the Soviet Union is bound to be concerned by events in a neighbouring state such as Afghanistan.

But military intervention in the circumstances we have described cannot be justified and does not assist in the struggle to achieve world peace and aid national liberation. On the contrary, going against the principle of non-interference in other countries plays into the hands of the enemies of detente.

The Western powers have not been slow to take advantage of the situation.

The deliberate decision to put the ratification of SALT II on the shelf, the offer to send arms to Pakistan, the joint military talks between China and the United States, Carrington's tour of countries in the Middle East and western Asia, the U.S. cancellation of grain deliveries to the Soviet Union and other steps being contemplated by the imperialists, expose the hollowness of their pretensions.

The British labour and progressive movement must not allow the enemies of peace and social progress to make hypocritical use of the events in Afghanistan in order to wreck detente and face the world with new war dangers.

There must be a renewed campaign to stop the placing of the new missiles in Western Europe, including Britain; campaigning for the ratification of SALT II; pressing the government for new negotiations with the Soviet Union for mutual arms reductions in Europe; and progress towards world disarmament.

GILMOUR: GOVERNMENT HAS NO 'FINAL VIEW' ON OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

LD161618 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1600 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The British Government has "not yet reached a firm final view" about a possible boycott of this year's Moscow Olympic games following Russia's invasion of Afghanistan, Lord Privy Seal Sir Ian Gilmour told the Commons today. He made his comments during question-time in answer to Leicester West Labour MP Mr Greville Janner, who asked what sanctions were being taken as a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. "In particular," Mr Janner suggested "the possible cancellation or removal of the Olympic games from Moscow."

Sir Ian told him: "The government here has not yet reached a firm final view." But he stressed the International Olympic Committee and the British Olympic Association were, of course, independent bodies. Sir Ian said the Olympic question had been discussed at yesterday's NATO meeting but not at the EEC Council of Ministers meeting he had attended.

Mr Toby Jessel (Conservative, Twickenham) urged the government to make a special effort to have further talks about the question of whether the Olympic games should be held at a venue other than Moscow. He wanted to see if Sir Ian's European counterparts felt the same way, even if this meant postponing the games. "Surely the disappointment which would be felt by a few thousand athletes must be seen as a minor matter compared with the possible effect upon Russian public opinion that withdrawal would have which might help to prevent a third world war," Mr Jessel said.

Sir Ian replied that all possible measures related to Afghanistan would be considered in Rome next week at the EEC Council of Ministers meeting. "I appreciate the advantages of another place being found although you will be aware that there are many difficulties about such a thing as the notice is so very short," he told MPs.

CALLAGHAN ADVISES SOVIET AMBASSADOR ON MOOD OF U.S.

LD161936 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1811 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[By PA political staff]

[Text] James Callaghan tonight acted as a go-between for the United States and the Soviet Union over the worsening relations between the two superpowers and said that the motives of Russia were "no longer trusted" after the Afghanistan invasion. The Labour leader met Soviet envoy in London Mr Nikolay Lunkov for 45 minutes at the Commons today to pass on to him impressions from his visit to the United States. Mr Callaghan returned yesterday.

Mr Callaghan told the ambassador he had three conversations with President Carter during his visit. He said the President and U.S. opinion was "deeply opposed" to the Soviet invasion and it would be wrong of the Russians to think this opposition would quickly die away--only the withdrawal of Soviet troops would allow an improvement in relations between America and Russia.

Mr Callaghan said there was no jingoistic spirit in the U.S., but rather a belief that the balance of power in the area has been disturbed. America, he said, would now try and increase its influence in the area. Part of this would mean strengthening relations with Pakistan, and any violation of the independence of Pakistan would bring "the most serious consequences." President Carter still wants Congress to ratify SALT II, Mr Callaghan told the Soviet ambassador, and to continue talks on arms limitation--but the Americans believed that detente had been damaged.

Mr Callaghan told Mr Lunkov that President Carter was "calm, determined and relaxed" because of the "inner strength and conviction" he felt over the issue. He also said that President Carter was "reluctant to draw the conclusion" that the Afghanistan invasion meant a return to the cold war. On Iran Mr Callaghan said the U.S. was very cool on the crisis, but if any harm came to any of the hostages at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, American public opinion could force the administration "to take steps which could have the most serious consequences." Mr Callaghan told the ambassador that there must be no violation of the independence of Pakistan, or of Yugoslavia, whose aged leader President Tito's health is now causing acute anxiety.

Ambassador Lunkov said that the only concern of the Soviet Union was over incursions from outside into Afghanistan. When this had ended, the Soviet troops would be pulled out. Mr Lunkov said Afghanistan would publish shortly details of these incursions. There had been several earlier requests for help from the Afghanistan Government, the ambassador said. He said Pakistan had "nothing to fear" from the Soviet Union and he also said there was no reason for "speculation" over Yugoslavia--he asked Mr Callaghan why the question of Yugoslavia had come up.

Mr Callaghan replied that "people no longer trust the motives of the USSR." Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Peter Shore who was also at the meeting told Mr Lunkov that the world had "awakened with a sense of shock" to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

DAILY TELEGRAPH CALLS FOR OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

[Editorial: "A Friends' Olympics"]

[Text] The response of Mr Carter to the Soviet putsch in Afghanistan has been altogether better and more formidable than past experience would have lead one to expect. Perhaps Mr Carter, a genuine idealist, is more shocked than are the case-hardened cynics. He is now looking at further detailed steps and the issue of withdrawal from the Moscow Olympics is now being seriously canvassed. The answer should be an emphatic affirmative. The capital of an offending, war-exporting state is a disgraceful venue for a fraternal gathering of all the nations. Withdrawal would have the maximum political effect inside Russia itself. The investment in these games has been a political and emotional investment, aimed at asserting Soviet respectability in the eyes of the Western mugs, and, at the same time, something of a glory ride. Critics and difficult people have been swept administratively out of the capital. Non-existent facilities like restaurants have been conjured into existence. Moscow has been prepared rather as the prison camp in Solzhenitsyn's story. "The Smile of the Buddha" was furnished and equipped for the visit of a foolish American visitor.

The Soviets are far more sensitive to loss of prestige and face, for all their men and missiles, than we realise. Absence would underline very simply the anger of other governments and their taste in company. How would we go about it? First steps should be taken to organise what might be called a friends' Olympics, drawing probably on the facilities and stadia already available in Canada, a civilised country with many friends in the Third World. With luck, if we move fast it should be possible to bring together North America, Moslem, European and many South American countries at least. With a little effort the Soviets could be left with a spartakiad for their own inmates and appendages. We should all like to see Mr Coe run faster than anybody else at his distance. He can as like do that in Montreal as in the city which contains the Lubyanka. Incidentally the symbol of the Moscow games, a toy everywhere on sale, is Mishka the bear. They have bears in Canada, but they were not, like Mishka, manufactured in prison camps.

TFSC SPOKESMAN SCORES ABSTENTION ON UN AFGHAN VOTE

TA161756 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 16 Jan 80 TA

[Text] A spokesman for the Turkish Federated State ofCyprus has said that the abstention by the Greek Cypriot representative on the United Nations resolution calling for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan did not represent the views of the Turkish Cypriot community. The spokesman said that the Greek Cypriot representative at the United Nations was representing only the Greek Cypriot community and not the whole of Cyprus as the Greek Cypriots were claiming. The spokesman recalled that the Greek Cypriots had usurped the Turkish Cypriot rights in the Government of Cyprus by force of arms and Greek Cypriots, in the guise of representative of the legal Government of Cyprus, were voicing only the thoughts of the Greek Cypriots. The spokesman stressed that it was high time that the world, especially the Muslim countries, understood this fact and worked for the granting of the right of speech to the Turkish Cypriot community in such important subjects with the aim of learning the real view of the whole of Cyprus.

ARCHBISHOP KHRISOSTOMOS RETURNS FROM ATHENS VISIT

NC161457 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 16 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Archbishop Khrisostomos, accompanied by Justice Minister Mr Mikhailidhis, returned from Athens this afternoon. In a statement at Larnaca Airport, his beatitude said that in all the contacts he had with the relgious and political leadership of Greece as well as with the Greek people, he found that they all feel the debt of warm support toward Cypriot Hellenism.

His beatitude added: what must be stressed is that Prime Minister Mr Karamanlis as well as the other political leaders have pointed out the need for unity in Cypriot Hellenism and its leadership around the line that we must follow in our struggle. He also stressed that without this unity and rigid adherence to the line, it is impossible to succeed in our efforts. His beatitude was received at Larnaca Airport by the members of the Holy See, the deputy minister of education and other officials.

SPOKESMAN ANSWERS QUESTIONS ON TURKISH CYPRIOT PENSIONS

NC161255 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 16 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Answering a question today, the government spokesman said that Mr Denktas' statement on the measures announced by President Kiprianou for a rapprochement of the two communities is being studied by the government. He added: Particularly with regard to Mr Denktas' statement about a transitional government, no such question exists; the government's views on this are well known.

Answering another question, the government spokesman said that there are 1,650 Turkish Cypriots entitled to a pension from the social insurance fund and that 172 of them are receiving their pension regularly, an annual expenditure of 44,000 pounds. The spokesman said when the remaining 1,478 Turkish Cypriots begin drawing pensions the total expenditure will be 476,000 pounds per year.

In connection with the procedure that must be followed to enable the Turkish Cypriots to draw their pension and to qualify for the social insurance fund, the spokesman said that the Ministry of Labor is preparing a pertinent proposal to be submitted tomorrow to the Council of Ministers for consideration and approval.

The spokesman also said that there are 264 Turkish Cypriot retired civil servants who have been receiving pensions totalling 241,180 pounds per year. He added: In addition, 130 widows of Turkish Cypriot civil servants are drawing pensions totalling 3,159 pounds per year.

TFSC MINISTER 'READY TO DISCUSS' RAPPROCHEMENT MEASURES

TA161124 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 16 Jan 80 TA

[Excerpt] Turkish Cypriot Minister Mustafa Cagatay has said the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus favors every attempt and development that will provide for the peaceful coexistence of the two ethnic communities in Cyrpus. Cagatay was addressing villagers at Balalan [Platanissos] in Magusa [Famagusta] last night.

Commenting on the measures announced by Greek Cypriot administration leader Spiros Kiprianou for rapprochement between the two communities in Cyprus, Cagatay said the Turkish Cypriot side was ready to discuss the announced proposals. Cagatay added that the necessary directives have been given to concerned authorities to make preparations regarding the announced proposals. Cagatay pointed out that it was imperative for the equality of the two ethnic communities in Cyprus to be recognized so that the Turkish Cypriot community could live in peaceful coexistence with the Greek Cypriots.

Referring to the latest price hikes, Cagatay said that in making the move our economic situation had been considered as a whole from the standpoint of the social realities.

LISSARIDHIS SCORES KARAMANLIS' RAPPROCHEMENT MEASURES

NC170835 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 17 Jan 80 pp 1,3 NC

[Excerpts] Speaking at a conference of EDEK cadres in Nicosia, Dr Lissaridhis analyzed the resolutions of the socialist party and recent developments. Among other things Dr Lissaridhis said: The imperialists' growing aggressiveness in our region; their turn toward cold war directions; their even greater assistance to Turkey; and their overt and covert, external and internal pressure for further concessions and adjustment of the facts of occupation create substantive dangers for our national cause.

Although the assumption is that the axis of our international policy is to convince the world that Turkish intransigence destroys every effort for dialog and that measures should be adopted to pressure Turkey, our passive attitude has led us in every case to the opposite position. Thus, we are being pressured for further concessions as if it is our stand that impedes the resumption of a substantive dialog.

It is regrettable that the prime minister of Greece, instead of intensifying his criticism of Turkey and internationally stressing the need for pressuring Turkey to bend its intransigence, suggests new proposals, as if the existing ones are outdated. It is even more regrettable when this is linked with the attempt to gain Greece's return to NATO, because Greece should not have been asked to pay anything for this. Greece must insist on the withdrawal of the Turkish troops, which are equipped with NATO weapons and which are holding Cyprus territory--as a result of which Greece withdrew from NATO's military wing.

Dr Lissaridhis proceeded with a detailed analysis of the resolutions of the third congress and with the need to adopt a clear line that will be based on principles. He also stressed the need for the people's unity based on this line of struggle. He said that EDEK would work for the adoption of a concrete program for our national issue and for a short term program of socioeconomic measures. The people are fully conscious of these conditions, and they are increasingly turning in this direction.

DEMOCRATIC RALLY TO TEMPORARILY STOP GOVERNMENT CRITICISM

NC121827 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1715 GMT 12 Jan 80 NC

[Text] The leader of the opposition Democratic Rally, Mr Kliridhis, has announced that he is to suspend, for the time being, his strong criticism of the government.

Speaking at a party meeting in Xylotymvou, Mr Kliridhis said this was in view of the new crisis around Cyrpus and the dangers created by recent international developments. He said he would wait to see whether the government would prepare a new plan of action and invite party leaders to discuss it.

Mr Kliridhis also said he would be prepared to return to the National Council of the government followed this line and took steps to establish real unity on the home front.

Deadline Set

NC170632 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 17 Jan 80 p 1 NC

[Text] Mr Glavkos Kliridhis, the leader of the opposition [Democratic] Rally Party, has told President Kiprianou that his offer for a "political truce" will come to a halt if by the end of the month the president does not present to the party leaders for their consideration a comprehensive plan for the handling of the Cyprus problem.

The announcement was made by Mr Kliridhis in a comment on the speech of Foreign Minister Nikos Rolandhis, who had welcomed Mr Kliridhis' response to the suggestion he returns to the National Council. "Despite the fact that, according to Mr Kliridhis' claim, there are still obstacles in the way, his decision to follow a policy of detente helps improve the internal political climate", Mr Rolandhis said.

However, Mr Kliridhis took exception to the word "detente" used by Mr Rolandhis saying it could give the wrong impression that the "severe criticism of errors of the government" which he exercises as opposition was responsible for "internal tension". But, Mr Kliridhis goes on, tension is not caused by the criticism exercised within the accepted limitations of a democratic regime on the part of the opposition for the sake of telling people about the mistakes of the government, but is caused by the serious mistakes caused by the government.

The Rally leader proceeded to reveal that during his meeting with President Kiprianou he made it clear that "the waiving of severe criticism against the government on questions of handling of the Cyprus problem" would last only until the end of the current month "to find out if the government will submit a written comprehensive plan on handling of the Cyprus problem to the party leaders for consideration and discussion and (to find out) if the government shall proceed to the required measures to ensure true and catholic unity. "I explained to the president my views about the measures I would expect to be taken by the government", Mr Kliridhis statement concludes.

PRESS CONSIDERS TURKISH ROLE IN IRAN, AFGHAN EVENTS

HURRIYET Urges Noninvolvement

NC140831 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 11 Jan 80 p 3 NC

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "This Time It Is Difficult...."]

[Text] Certain things that could affect the fate of Turkey are happening in Ankara. Prime Minister Demirel suddenly feels the need to meet the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders and have long discussions with them. President Koruturk is having meetings with party leaders, force commanders, National Assembly and Senate leaders day and night. Ecevit considers the situation so critical that he says that "if the Justice Party proposes a coalition, he is prepared to consider it." The United States has shown real haste in having the "Turkish-U.S. defense and economic cooperation agreement"--which it has delayed for so long--signed and enacted. And, finally, Lord Carrington, British foreign secretary, hurriedly includes Turkey in his tour of some Middle East and Asian countries. All this indicates that following events in Iran and Afghanistan, important things are happening which concern Turkey.

Let us first take a look at the world: The detente which was kept alive through prayers and supplications is now in a coma. In fact, if we judge by the currents from Jimmy Carter in Washington and PRAVDA in Moscow, detente stands no chance of ever getting out of bed. The natural outcome of this is a return to the predetente "cold war days." We shall indeed be lucky if we overcome the crisis before it takes the form of a "hot war."

At this stage it would be useful to say that Prime Minister Demirel's frequent statements recently that "our armed forces should be ready for war" cannot have been made in "vain." This means that the prime minister too sees Turkey at the threshold of a probable war.

If we do not intend to deceive ourselves, we should admit that Turkey is indeed facing the muzzle of a gun. The reason is obvious. Turkey is a breakwater which prevents the Soviet Union from coming to the Mediterranean Sea and cutting the oil and other raw material supplies to the Western world. For this reason, from the Soviet Union point of view, Turkey "is one of the countries which should be eliminated as a first priority."

Turkey is equally important to the Western world, particularly to the United States, and for the same reasons--so that Turkey and the routes to the sources which keep the Western world alive should not be disrupted. This is the reason why Lord Carrington had great satisfaction at visiting Ankara." This is also the reason why the U.S. State Department and the FRG Foreign Affairs Ministry officials feel so happy about the signing of the defense and economic cooperation agreement between Turkey and the United States.

What must Turkey do under the circumstances?

It is obvious that, this time, Turkey stands practically no chance of maintaining the "policy of neutrality" which it managed to maintain on the eve of and during World War II. Its only chance is to refrain from getting involved in disputes that do no concern NATO and from provoking anyone. As far as matters involving NATO are concerned, Turkey should do for its allies "as much as its allies are prepared to do for it." Otherwise, if it acts as it did before and during World War I and carries out the wishes of those who praise its "herosim," the outcome is already recorded in history.

TERCUMAN: Learn From Past

NC161122 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 14 Jan 80 p 4 NC

[Editorial by Zafer Atay: "Where Were You Before?"]

[Excerpts] The Western world seems to have sobered after the invasion of Afghanistan. This is becuase it has felt the land sliding under its feet....

No one seems to be strong enough at the moment to exercise price control over the oil-producing countries. But the real danger does not stem from oil prices--imperialist Russia is preparing to cut the throat of the West.

There is only one obstacle in the way of Soviet aggression. This obstacle is Turkey, which is preparing to be integrated with Europe within the Common Market, which has been carrying the burden of responsibility for the southeastern flank of the NATO alliance since 1974 and which has for years withstood efforts to make it a victim of the small intrigues of international politics.

This very Turkey has been struggling for the past 5 years to extricate itself from successive economic crises. Again, as a result of lobby intrigues in the U.S. Congress, this country suffered the effects of an embargo which has lasted 3 1/2 years. Despite all the bloody intrigues of the Karmal-type serfs, both at home and abroad, our country has been struggling to preserve a free, democratic parliamentary regime which respects human rights.

But now the game is over. Turkey has learned many things from these bitter events. The joint defense installations will operate effectively, but the days of the Turkish chief of General Staff being turned back at the entrance by American sergeants will never again return. Turkey will remain in NATO, but it will cease to be a country which gives without receiving. If the West believes Turkey to be extremely valuable for peace, it will have to pay the price.

Turkey will maintain friendly relations with the Islamic world, the Eastern bloc and the Third World countries on the one hand, and, on the other, it will preserve its honorable position within the Western alliance, a position which should enjoy the same conditions as the other members.

GUNAYDIN: Forced 'Concessions'

NC161052 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 14 Jan 80 p 5 NC

[Excerpts] Ankara--We observe that while the Western press organs and politicians frequently stress the importance of Turkey as a citadel of NATO, our allies continue to maintain their old indifferent attitude toward matters concerning aid to Turkey. Moreover, there are certain indications that the Western powers are trying to obtain certain concessions from Turkey by taking advantage of its present hard-pressed condition.

Political circles in Ankara draw attention to the fact that when the shah was overthrown and Khomeyni assumed power at the end of 1978, the West at that time was full of praise for Turkey, but credits from the West were hard to obtain and had many strings attached. The same political circles maintain that the West is again pursuing the same policy. They say they do not see any indications that the West is willing to release the credits so badly needed by Turkey.

Since the IMF has not given the necessary green light, organizations such as the OECD, the World Bank and the bank consortium have even suspended the credits on which agreement had already been reached. Despite frequent statements by Admiral Shear, NATO commander of the southern flank, eulogizing Turkey, we have seen no urgent action being taken by NATO to increase military aid to our country.

Political circles maintain that the behavior of British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, who visited Turkey last week, constitutes a flagrant example of the hypocrisy of the West. Though in his statement to the press, Lord Carrington was full of praise for Turkey, he has reportedly forced Turkey, behind closed doors, to make certain concessions. It was learned that in his talks with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen, Lord Carrington left it to be understood that after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan Turkey needed NATO more. Lord Carrington asked Turkey to pursue a milder policy toward Cyprus and the return of Greece to NATO so that NATO relations could be conducted more smoothly. In other words, Lord Carrington was asking Turkey to make more concessions.

Meanwhile, it has been learned that a competent official of the British Foreign Office, who came to Turkey with Lord Carrington, has held secret talks with his counterparts in our Foreign Ministry. In addition, Lord Carrington is known to have made efforts to bring Turkey and Saudi Arabia closer together.

Political circles argue that these efforts, which at first glance give a positive impression, are in fact intended to create a group of four, comprising Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel and Turkey, against the progressive Arab regimes in the Middle East. Another argument is that Saudi Arabia has stated that it can provide Turkey with oil and credit facilities, but it urged Turkey to pursue a more flexible policy toward the U.S. bases. It is believed that it is due to this factor that the Turkish-American defense and economic cooperation agreement was initialed so hurriedly; the political circles are of the opinion that the West has first scared Turkey with the Afghanistan events and then forced it into a framework of cooperation with the West. It is the firm belief of these circles that from now on the West will compel Turkey to make concessions.

VOTCP REVIEWS MILITARY LETTER, SEES THREAT TO KURDS

TA130931 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 13 Jan 80 TA

[Unattributed commentary from the "Panorama of the Week" program: "Turkey's Stand"]

[Text] Recent incidents in Turkey were largely influenced by world developments. The military's ultimatum, in a bid to curb anarchy and fascist terrorism, had its impact on our political life. But it was obvious from the very first day that [the letter from] the military clique had nothing to do with preventing terrorism. Although martial law has been in force for a year, the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] is still represented in parliament. All the bourgeois political parties are cooperating to (?protect) this source of fascist terrorism. Investigations into the NAP are not being implemented. These forces have not even once stated the fact that the NAP is behind these murders. Is this because of their respect for laws? No, these supporters of martial law are openly attacking TOB-DER [Turkish Teachers Unity and Solidarity Association], Maden-Is [Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union], other mass trade unions and progressive and democratic organizations.

Under these circumstances, what was the aim of the ultimatum? It was to strengthen the positions of U.S. imperialism in Turkey, to oppress the mounting struggle for democracy and to open the road to military dictatorship. In the wake of the ultimatum, negotiations for the signing of bilateral slavery agreements with the United States, for the opening of new bases and the expansion of those already existing were quickly completed. The parliament began passing one oppressive law after another. The ultimatum was also effective in suppressing the opposition against the bases--which was brought up by Life-Senator Suphi Gursoytrak--in keeping the left wing of the RPP quiet, and principally in preventing any reaction by the working class and the patriots among the armed forces who were against the slavery agreement.

A close link exists between the ultimatum of the military clique and the aggressive policy followed by the imperialists in our region. A tangible change has occurred in Turkey's recent stand of pursuing a moderate policy in the region by adopting, to a certain degree, a close relationship with nonalined countries. Turkey's stand toward Iran is one such instance [of this change]. Another instance is the steps being taken toward the formation of military pacts--which were intensified by the visit of British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington. These pacts are being formed to safeguard U.S. interests in the Middle East and to suppress national liberation movements. It is with the aim of covering these imperialist policies that an uproar is taking place in Turkey regarding the Afghan incidents. With the anti-Soviet campaign, the bases for antidemocratic brutal systems are being prepared. Various branches [as heard] of imperialism are cooperating under the protection of the militarist clique's bayonets.

Meanwhile, there is another significant development taking place: the growing uproar regarding secessionism in Turkey. The right wing of the RPP, together with Bulent Ecevit, are fully participating in this outcry. A situation has been created in which a struggle against secession in Turkey has become the focal point on which all the bourgeois political parties have converged. This is the truth lying behind this fact: Is a Kurdish uprising in Turkey probable today? Anyone who is aware of [the situation] in Turkish Kordestan knows that the answer is negative. The Apoists [separatist Kurdish movement sympathizers]--who head the gangs which organize the armed terror incidents, considered as proof of the secessionist provocation and for which the Kurdish revolutionary democratic movement is being blamed--are in fact directly working under the orders of MIT [National Intelligence Organization] and the CIA. The truth is that the reactionary ruling forces are trying to show the existence of a danger in Turkish Kordestan while no such danger in fact exists. Why? Because the interests of U.S. imperialism can only be materialized through a large military massing [askersel yiginak] on Turkey's eastern borders, for all types of military steps against the national liberation movements in the Middle East, Iran and other countries. The purpose of these secessionist stories is to spread war hysteria and to encourage the chauvinistic hostility toward the Kurdish people and to engage in a military massing in eastern Turkey. Every military unit being posted in the east represents a toll of oppression against the Kurdish people as well as a weapon against neighboring countries. The government is pursuing adventurism, and national security is in danger.

WORLD COURT SETS 18 FEB DEADLINE FOR IRAN'S RESPONSE

WA171915 London REUTER in English 1858 GMT 17 Jan 80 WA

[Text] The Hague, Jan 17, REUTER--The World Court said today it had set February 18 as the deadline for Iran to respond to charges brought against it by the United States.

Last month, the court, the principal legal body of the United Nations, granted a U.S. petition for provisional measures in the case by ordering Iranian authorities to release the 50 American hostages who have been held at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran since November 4.

The February 18 hearing will involve the substance of U.S. claims that Iran should be condemned for violations of international law, that it should pay reparations and that it should put on trial the militant students who took over the embassy.

Iran has boycotted the court, saying the hostage affair cannot be dealt with separately from the question of U.S. interference in Iran's internal affairs.

OPEC TO SET UP DEVELOPMENT AGENCY IN VIENNA

AU171212 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 17 Jan 80 p 1 AU

[Text] Vienna (WS)--The OPEC special fund that was established to promote projects in developing countries, will be turned into an OPEC fund to which a newly founded development agency having wide powers will be affiliated. This was decided by the finance ministers of 12 OPEC member countries--the Iranian representative was absent--in Vienna yesterday, Wednesday [16 January]. The new agency will have its headquarters in Vienna.

In addition, the ministers approved the special fund's receipt of $800 million in additional allotments decided last year in Geneva. The decision on further allotments in the amount of $1.6 billion was postponed until 27 May.

QATAR'S AL THANI COMMENTS ON OPEC, GULF STATE POLICY

AU171438 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1122 GMT 17 Jan 80 AU

[Herbert Hutar report on interview with Qatar Minister of Finance and Oil 'Abd al-'Aziz ibn Khalifah al Thani in Vienna--no date given, presumably 16 or 17 January; with recorded excerpts from Al Thani statements, beginning in English, fading into German translation]

[Summary] Asked about the current surplus on the international oil market, the minister says: [Begin Al Thani recording] ""Well, I think that momentarily there will be a surplus supply in the market, but after a certain time the market will absorb this surplus. The main thing is that this surplus was caused by the oil companies because they bought up oil and stockpiled it.

"Another aspect is the large profits made by the oil companies, so that prices on the spot markets went up to $40-50 per barrel. And those prices were certainly not driven up by the OPEC countries." [end recording]

"Al Thani said it was of course desirable to return to a uniform oil price, but at present there is fever in the oil market. He stressed that what mattered was not whether there are 13 or 14 different oil prices, but only the OPEC's strength--for, if OPEC were to break down, this would mean a collapse for the whole world."

He adds: "Clouds are passing over OPEC, but OPEC is strong and it will remain strong."

Asked whether the events in Afghanistan and in Pakistan [as heard] might not endanger the oil supply, Al Thani replies: [Begin Al Thani recording] "Well, we don't have any involvements in Afghanistan and Pakistan. To us, the main thing is to reliably meet the oil demand--both of Europe and of the United States. I believe that the events have no bearing on the Gulf states.

"Europe and the United States can rest assured that we will supply them with oil, provided that they can understand our problem--both the economic and the political problem." [end recording]

The economic problem is of course the constant decline of the purchasing power of the oil proceeds caused by the dwindling dollar exchange rate.

"And as far as the political problem is concerned, Al Thani indicates what has been frequently rumored but hardly ever openly stated--namely that, if the Palestinian problem were solved in accordance with Arab wishes, the result would be a distinct easing of tensions in the oil market."

STATEMENT CENSURES USSR MOVES IN AFGHANISTAN, UN

LD171615 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Jan 80 p 5 LD

[Unattributed report: "Explanations Given by USSR Unacceptable"]

[Text] The nine EC foreign minister published a joint statement in Brussels Tuesday, 15 January, of which the main points are as follows:

"The ministers of the Nine have reaffirmed their deep concern over the crisis caused by the Soviet Union's military intervention in Afghanistan--an intervention which constitutes a serious violation of the principles governing international relations which are embodied in the UN Charter.

"They stressed the unacceptable nature of the explanations given by the Soviet Union to justify its intervention in Afghanistan. In their view this constitutes flagrant interference in the internal affairs of a nonalined country belonging to the Islamic world and a threat to the peace, security and stability of the region, including the Indian subcontinent, the Middle East and the Arab world.

"It is with grave concern that the foreign ministers of the nine EC member states have noted the fact that the Soviet Union, despite almost universal protest against its military intervention, vetoed a resolution on the Afghan crisis proposed by nonalined countries and supported by a large majority of Security Council members.

"They strongly urge the Soviet Union to conform to the resolution on the Afghan crisis approved by an overwhelming majority of the UN General Assembly--a resolution which calls for the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all foreign troops from Afghanistan.

"The nine EC member states have constantly tried to promote detente and remain convinced that this process is in the interests of all members of the international community. Nonetheless, they are convinced that detente is indivisible and must be universally applied. That is why they urge the Soviet Union, in accordance with the norms and principles of the UN Charter, to allow the Afghan people to decide their own future without foreign interference.

"In stating their position on this important question, the EC foreign ministers are also fully aware of the suffering inflicted on the whole Afghan people by this crisis and especially on the Afghans who are forced to leave their country."

[Text] Rome, January 18 (ANSA)--Yugoslavia's relations with the European Economic Community and with Italy, which holds the EEC duty chairmanship, came under study here Thursday during consultations between the visiting Yugoslav minister for EEC relations, Stojan Andov, Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga and Foreign Minister Attilio Ruffini.

Andov also delivered a message to Cossiga from the chairman of the Yugoslav Federal Executive Council, Veselin Djuranovic.

Cossiga and Ruffini, speaking of negotiations underway between the Community and Yugoslavia for the renewal of the economic cooperation accord, confirmed for the Yugoslav minister the Italian Government's desire to speed up these dealings.

During the Thursday meeting of Community foreign ministers, it was agreed that negotiations should be quickly wrapped up so that a new agreement could be submitted to the European Council during the next assembly, scheduled for February 5.

Andov, for his part, expressed his government's appreciation for the efforts being conducted by the Community under the Italian chairmanship.

Cossiga requested information on the state of health of Yugoslav head of state Josip Broz Tito and forwarded his own best wishes and those of the Italian Government to the ailing 87-year-old president through the visiting minister.

JORGENSEN, KREISKY CITED ON AFGHAN EVENTS

LD171515 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 12 Jan 80 p 9 LD

[RITZAUS BUREAU report: "Kreisky: We Must Remain Cool"]

[Text] Vienna--Following their political talks during the Danish state visit to Austria, Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen and Chancellor Bruno Kreisky were agreed that the Soviet move into Afghanistan reflects and adverse trend in developments.

"It could weaken detente and so there is ground for concern," Anker Jorgensen said.

"It is undeniable that even before the move Afghanistan was a Soviet satellite, but it is something quite different for a great power to march into a country with almost 100,000 soldiers," Kreisky said.

The Austrian chancellor is also afraid that there will be nothing to discuss when East and West meet in Madrid to continue the followup to the Helsinki agreement on peace, security and cooperation in Europe.

"We must remain cool and strive to salvage detente as much as possible. We in Europe must attempt to keep detente alive as an idea, but the time has almost come for the other nonalined nations in the world to speak out. The Third World must not step forward," Bruno Kreisky said.

Attack Against Israel

Bruno Kreisky also referred to the Middle East and described the Israeli Government as "chauvinists and blinkered!"

"I fail to understand why the Israelis want to keep 1.5 million Arabs on the West Bank and the Golan Heights if they constitute a deadly danger to the country," Kreisky said.

FRG SEIZURE OF ARMS SHIPMENT REVOKED

AU141310 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 14 Jan 80 p 14 AU

[Summary] Vienna--The recent seizure by FRG customs authorities in Fulda of 10,000 small firearms that had been shipped to the FRG from Austria and were declared as "steel goods for Lebanon" has turned out to be unwarranted, and the shipment has been released. The false customs declaration that had led FRG customs authorities to believe that they had uncovered an arms smuggling transaction was sent off with the consignment only through an error of the Austrian shipping agency. Actually, the whole transaction was fully in line with Austrian laws and regulations. Since no FRG laws were violated, either, the FRG authorities have dismissed all charges.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER ADDRESS BUNDESTAG SESSION 17 JAN

Schmidt Statement

DW171016 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0913 GMT 17 Jan 80 DW

[Government statement by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to the Bundestag in Bonn--live]

[Text] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen. At the beginning of this year, at the beginning of the new decade, we are facing a critical international situation. I shall be speaking foremost of the taking of the hostages in Tehran and of the occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. I shall also speak of the energy and world economy prospects which cannot be viewed separately from the course of the Middle East crisis.

In this situation, today I shall essentially concentrate on the international situation and on its political and economic consequences.

In Tehran and Afghanistan, international law and the rules of peaceful life of the nations together have been seriously violated. The situation thus caused, and its potential consequences, do not concern only the parties directly involved. The occupation of Afghanistan quite directly affects vital interests of the Third World, of the nonalined states. But beyond that, the crises affect all members of the family of nations. This means they inevitably also affect us in Europe and in Germany.

Last Monday, that is at the beginning of this week, 104 member states of the United Nations, that is a two-thirds majority, adopted a resolution, the crucial passages of which I shall recall for the benefit of the Bundestag. I quote: We demand the immediate, unconditional, total withdrawal of the foreign troops from Afghanistan to make it possible for the Afghan people to determine a form a government to their liking, and to choose their economic, political and social system without intervention, subversion or force from outside.

The Federal Republic of Germany is one of these 104 states which adopted that resolution. [applause] We condemn the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and we condemn the violation of international law in Iran. Perhaps I may be allowed to make some more detailed utterances concerning these two hotbeds of crises, to begin with, concerning Iran.

As early as on 4 December 1979, more than a month ago today, the world Security Council unanimously--meaning with the vote of the Soviet Union--urgently asked the Government of Iran, and this is the text of the resolution of that time, to release immediately the members of the U.S. Embassy who are being detained in Tehran, to grant them protection and to allow them to leave the country. The fact that the taking of hostages in Tehran is continuing fills us with grave concern. Our sympathies go out to the hostages, their families at home and to the Americans who are worrying about these peoples. [applause]

We Germans, and we here in the Bundestag, know from our own experience the concern about hostages. This is why we are in solidarity with our American friends and with President Carter. There an entire nation, with increasing embitterment but in patient, admirable discipline, has been waiting for more than 11 weeks for the release of its compatriots in Tehran. We respect the right of the Iranian people to determine their future themselves. Yet, jointly with our friends in the United States, jointly with the governments in the world, jointly with the UN Security Council, we insist that all states of the world abide by international law and that the hostages be released. [applause]

I mentioned earlier that as early as on 4 December last year the world Security Council unanimously demanded that Iran release the hostages immediately. A few days later, on 15 December, the International Court in The Hague declared the taking of hostages at odds with international law. On 31 December the Seucirity Conncil once again, but with the abstention by the Soviet Union and the GDR, demanded of Iran the immediate release of the hostages, this time giving a deadline and announcing that in the event of noncompliance, measures would be taken in keeping with articles 39 and 41 of the UN Charter, meaning that so-called sanctions would be taken against Iran.

When the deadline passed without any result, the Security Council, then once again dealing with this matter, with the required majority of 10 votes, voted for the institution of sanctions against Iran, especially in the field of trade, traffic and banking. This time the Soviet Union and the German Democratic Republic voted against it. By its veto, the Soviet Union prevented these sanctions from being adopted with legally binding effect for all. If the United States, proceeding from the decisions of the Security Council I referred to and of the International Court, now sees itself compelled to take measures along the lines announced, then the Federal Republic of German will stand at the side of the United States of America in this matter. [applause] Our country will stand by the side of America in this matter in order to achieve the release of the hostages.

In order to achieve this, we have a daily exchange of opinion with the United States and our other friends.

Ladies and gentlemen, I must add that we know this will mean that we will also have to make economic sacrifices. I shall discuss the economic consequences later on.

Well, I will say a word about a more definite characterization of the situation in, around and because of Afghanistan. Seen from a world political point of view, these are two simultaneous crises. With the use of massive military means, the Soviet Union occupied the nonalined state of Afghanistan. In doing this, the Soviet Union has come within a range of a few hundred kilometers of the Indian Ocean, the Persian Gulf and the oil resources. It has gained additional political levers vis-a-vis the other states of the region.

Simultaneously, however, the Soviet Union has isolated itself as never before from the rest of the world, particularly the Third World and the nonalined states and developing countries. The outward expression of that self-isolation is the decision of the UN General Assembly I mentioned before, and the outward expression of that self-isolation was the Soviet Union's second use of the veto on 13 January.

In the past months, the Soviet Union has used the veto three times: in connection with the withdrawal of foreign troops from Kampuchea, in connection with the withdrawal of its own troops from Afghanistan, and in connection with economic sanctions against the taking of hostages by Iran.

The occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union mainly involves relations between the East and the South. The occupation, however, also involves in a sensitive way East-West relations, as is the case whenever a political shifting of the balance of power takes place in the world.

Similar to us and our friends in the European Community and the North Atlantic Alliance, most states of the Third World also believe that the Soviet intervention is a flagrant interference in the internal affairs of a nonalined country, in this case a nonalined country of the Islamic world. They believe that this military action threatens the peace, security and stability of the entire geographic region, including the Indian subcontinent, the Middle East and the Arab world.

We have good relations with the states of this region, even friendly relations with most of them. Our cooperation with the states of that region will be even more intensified now. We want to intensify our help for Pakistan, which was already a main point of our development aid, helping it to solve its great economic problems, beyond the humanitarian aid for Afghan refugees which is also necessary. [applause]

India is the most significant recipient of German development aid, and it will remain so in the future. We will strongly continue our help for our allies. I speak of Turkey. As regards Turkey, we are prepared to also take over the initiative for other friends and--similar to 1979--bring about extraordinary aid for Turkey. [applause]

I also call your attention to the European-Arab dialog and the initiative of colleagues aimed at cooperation between the European Community and the states bordering the Gulf. Some of them have been visited recently by colleague Graf Lambsdorff.

The United States has taken a number of measures to point out clearly to the Soviet Union that a violation of the system of international law cannot remain without consequences. The United States has asked its friends to act accordingly. We will do that, particularly in the framework of the European Community and in the framework of COCOM [Coordinating Committee for East-West Trade Policy].

Let me discuss the assessment of the present situation. No doubt bad weather has come with regard to world politics. We must, therefore, calmly examine our German interests and the Western interests as a whole. We must steer our country with a steady hand through the turbulences. We cannot have any nervousness, no shouting about crises and no excited or even agitating speeches. [applause]

We need a careful and considered crisis management. In German there is actually no adequate expression for that English term, a carefully considered crisis management. A calm appearance in this respect is not tantamount to pussyfooting. [applause] If somebody expected us to follow a policy of big words in this situation, he was mistaken about the style of our state and about the interests of our state. A policy of big words must not become the style of our state. [applause] We must rather point out unmistakably and unpretentiously where we stand, and we are doing that.

For that purpose, we must speak with one another, and also with the Soviet Union. Our policy must be clear, particularly in difficult times. We must maintain mutual contacts, particularly established for such situations. [applause]

The Federal Government advocates the view which Federal President Carstens on the occasion of the New Year's reception phrased as follows: Whoever wants peace must resolve conflicts through negotiations and a just balance of interests. It is for this reason that I do not criticize the fact that the Bavarian minister president declared his readiness to visit Moscow even after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Peace is not a natural state; rather, peace must be instituted time and again, as Immanuel Kant has written. Instituting peace costs strength and, at any rate, requires dialog and negotiations. This process has suffered a serious setback through the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

It is a foregone concusion that this will also be felt in Europe. I said in my New Year's speech that the cooperation between East and West in Europe will be all the more successful the stronger the will for detente and cooperation also marks political action in other parts of the world. Conversely, it is true that the less this will for detente exists in other parts of the world, the more difficult will be cooperation in Europe. This is especially so because we will not relax our efforts toward safeguading peace in Europe but will even amplify these efforts. [applause]

This is not palliating.

Our detente policy is not palliating, but one of two main elements of our security policy, which is based on the balance of military forces. For us this means, without any changes, working on three tasks: First to work on the preservation of what has been achieved. This also means the strict observance and full application of the Four-Power Agreement; the treaties with the Soviet Union, Poland and Czechoslovakia; and the Basic Treaty with the GDR. This also means the preservation of what has been achieved between East and West in the CSCE since 1975.

The second task is to work toward the further development of what has been accomplished. This means the further improvement in the life together of the people in the two German states, the continuation of work in arms limitation and arms control, especially with a view to the MBFR. In this context I expressly welcome the renewed statement by President Carter that the SALT II treaty is in the interest of the security of the United States and of the entire world. I proceed from the premise that this treaty will be observed even if it cannot yet be ratified at the moment.

Third: persistent work on the new tasks, which especially include that we and the NATO member states as a whole not take off the table the NATO offer of negotiations on nuclear medium-range missiles of December 1979, but instead seriously continue to pursue it. [applause]

Without any changes our alliance pursues the establishment of the necessary military balance through measures of arms control on a lower level than to date, if possible. Likewise, the decision on modernizing NATO theater nuclear forces made in December is in keeping with the principle of balance.

I quote: "Whichever of the two sides of security policy we view, whether this involves our serious and express attempt at simultaneous and equal arms limitation and arms control, or whether this involves the guarantee of an adequate defense of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Federal Government under both aspects understands its security policy as a policy of balance and as a policy of safeguarding peace. By the same token it understands under both aspects the external security of our state as a mission of the alliance with which we are affiliated and as a part of which we contribute toward the balance between East and West."

This quotation, which continues to be applicable today without any changes, I have taken from the first government statement by the Social-Liberal coalition with which Chancellor Brandt characterized our efforts toward detente in Europe as early as on 28 October 1969. We have always lived up to our commitment to contribute toward the balance of forces between East and West undertaken at the time. This is true for the main element of arms limitation and detente policy, and it likewise applies to the other main element, defense readiness.

We have modernized the Bundeswehr with respect to both training and equipment. With 495,000 well-trained soldiers equipped with modern defensive weapons we are making a weighty and respected contribution toward the common defense capability. From experience, ladies and gentlemen, and especially from the experiences gained by the Berlin crisis in the late fifties and early sixties, we know that we may rely on the United States, that the United States is indispensable to our security. This is why I said, for example at the federal congress of my party in Berlin last month, that our solidarity with the United States is the core of our security and at the same time the core of Berlin's security. [applause]

It is my heartfelt desire to emphasize once again that a surprise situation like that in Afghanistan could not occur in Western Europe because, first, NATO has in Europe an efficient early warning system; second, the United States contributes to the forward defense in Europe jointly with the soldiers of our other alliance partners; third, the United States grants us nuclear protection. Everybody knows this.

What we have achieved in 10 years since the statement I just quoted in matters of defense, defense policy and detente policy we do not want to have degraded or dismantled. [applause] In that period of time hundreds of thousands of people have come to us from Eastern Europe and from the eastern part of Central Europe and they have been given full human rights here. Travel has increased and the exchange of goods has increased. Berlin is not a hotbed of crisis.

Is all that to be considered nothing? [applause]

Who does not remember in Europe and in America the deep concern that was felt during the Berlin crisis, the Cuban crisis and the CSSR crisis? Those who remember them also know how grave European conflicts can become for the entire world, and they also know that conflicts in the outside world can backfire on Europe.

Our direct corresponsibility for peace in Europe demands that particularly in difficult times we must look for fields of common interest. I say this particularly to our compatriots in the GDR. [applause] I add that, as before, I am prepared to meet the chairman of the State Council, Mr Honecker, and to discuss the development of bilateral relations as well as the contribution we Germans must make to peace and security in Europe. [applause]

Beyond Europe we are offering support to those states of the Third World with regard to their independence and to partnership with equal rights in order to help strengthen these states through political cooperation and economic aid. The countries of the Third World know that we support them.

On the basis of our own good experience we encourage regional cooperation as a suitable means for preserving the independence of those countries that are not big powers and that do not belong to an alliance. The Western initiative in Namibia, the successful Rhodesian negotiations, the cooperation of the European Community with ASEAN states, the second Lome agreement, the European-Arab dialog: All this indicates that we do not want to establish a political or even military hegemony in the Third World, but that we have an exchange with sovereign partners, an exchange with equal rights. [applause]

That policy must not be jeopardized by thoughtless speeches about a geographical extension of NATO commitments. [applause] That does not help the states of the Third World. It creates mistrust there, and it harms our alliance.

Our Cabinet decision formulated on 30 May last year is as valid as before: The Federal Government is against the establishment of zones of influence of foreign powers in the Third World. [applause]

One event must be mentioned, however, that is presently and temporarily overshadowed by the crisis in Afghanistan: The peace process that is pursued by President As-Sadat with much courage and insistence will lead in a few days to the return of a great part of Egyptian, that is Arab, areas. I hope and wish that the negotiations of president As-Sadat with Prime Minister Begin--despite all obstacles and all the resistance--will bring closer a just, far-reaching and lasting peace: It must include the solution of the Palestinian problem. [applause]

Mr President, I will summarize this chapter.

First, the security of our country is guaranteed by the self-defense alliance of the North Atlantic alliance and our partnership with the United States. Therefore, we have no need to fear in a crisis.

Second, the most important international task for crisis management is to avoid an extension of the crisis and to take the edge off the crisis. In doing this, we know that the Federal Republic of Germany is not a big power, but within the framework of our possibilities--which are not small either--we participate in the United Nations; the alliance, through intense personal talks I had last week in Madrid, for example, as I had with President Carter, with President Giscard d'Estaing, Prime Minister Thatcher; for example through tomorrow's visit of colleague Genscher, who will see his American counterpart; for example through my forthcoming visit to President Carter.

Naturally, the contact with President Carter is especially close; but I also intend to meet General Secretary Brezhnev in Moscow.

In this connection, in support of what colleague Genscher said here in the Bundestag in the last debate on 14 December last year, namely that NATO's meeting in the fall in Brussels opened a real chance for progress in matters of arms control and detente and that it is now up to the Warsaw Pact states to realize that opportunity and also that necessity. He said literally, and I quote: The situation in the Middle and Near East, developments in some parts of Africa, tensions in Southeast Asia and energy supply problems make us aware of the uncertainties and dangers that oppress mankind on the threshold of the eighties. It is all the more important that Europe, which has led so many wars in the past and from which so many wars have emanated, will do everything to further strengthen peace after 35 years without war in Europe and that it should contribute in such a way also to stability in the world. [applause]

A word concerning the economic dimension of this situation. New international crises have flared up in a period of which our German national economy has just successfully adapted to world economic challenges, to structural changes in the world economy, and to the energy crisis. I cannot but illustrate, however, some of the new facts once again. In 1979 alone oil prices more than doubled. In 1978 we paid a total of DM30 billion for oil imports. This amounted to 2 percent of our gross national product at the time, 2 percent of our gross national product to pay the oil bill. According to forecasts to date, we will have to pay DM65 billion to the oil-extracting countries, which will be tantamount to more than 4 percent of our gross social product in 1980. By the way, we will have to count on oil becoming even scarcer and more expensive in the future.

What we must pay to foreign countries this year for the doubled oil bill at the same time reduces our own national income. This means we cannot distribute these amounts at home all over again. Besides, the prices for other raw materials which we import have increased considerably, and I will not even mention the fraudulent international gold speculation. On the whole, today, on this very day, our imports from the world market are 20 percent more expensive than they were 12 months ago. Anyone in our country having a say in the decision on prices or wages must keep that in mind. Price expectations and wage demands which might have appeared to be realistic in the early fall of last year must be reviewed by everyone in view of the new worldwide developments. In other words, not only the state, not only the Federal Bank, but also enterprise managements and the wage partners must insure that prices and wages do not drive each other up and thus worsen the economic prospects for us all. [applause]

The Federal Bank, at any rate, will not make any additional funds available to the national economy for such processes. The Federal Government and the Federal Bank remain on their anti-inflation course. [applause]

I repeat what I have often said before: Inflation does not create jobs; on the contrary, in the long run it impairs the growth of our economy. [commotion] Our greatest economic policy challenge, however, lies in the energy supply, and this is already discernible for a future that has already drawn closer.

These are our most important tasks:

1. Exploiting all possibilities for saving energy in general and oil in particular. Oil prices, by the way, will largely insure that.

2. Replacing oil with other energy sources wherever this is possible and justifiable in industry, in the electric power supply, in private consumption. In that respect the utilization of our coal must receive priority. [applause]

To this end the Federal Government, in intensive talks with industry in the past few weeks, discussed the latter's proposals concerning the large-scale gasification and liquefaction of coal. As a result, we will be in a position shortly to give the starting signal for the coal refining program which I announced here on 4 July. This is the consistent continuation of the policy of the Federal Government which has promoted pilot and experimental installations in this field with about DM650 million since 1974.

The decision to which I refer will surely not improve our oil and natural gas supply immediately; yet the implementation of this program will increasingly contribute to the alternative energy supply from the mid-eighties on.

3. I repeat that we must on principle resort to all available energy sources. We cannot do without nuclear energy either. What we intend to do is deal with the new version of the principles for the waste disposal for nuclear powerplants with the heads of government of the laender on 29 February 1980. Hopefully this will be final.

4. We will seek the development of a joint European energy policy and intensify cooperation with the other industrial countries in the International Energy Agency in the coming weeks. We continue to deem urgently necessary a constructive dialog with the oil-producing states, with the participation of the developing countries, on world energy policy problems, and we want to intensify the European-Arab dialog.

Ladies and gentlemen, with farsightedness and self-discipline we will succeed in coping with the energy problems of the eighties. In so doing, we must not delude ourselves just because our tanks are full these weeks. Many other countries are not in a position to cope with this problem as we are.

In 1979 alone the developing countries had to spend $40 billion for oil. This was eight times the amount they had to pay for the oil as late as 1973. Eight times as much, mind you. That was twice as much as the entire development aid to the developing countries last year, all told. It amounted to $20 billion. This is why the oil states in their price policy should keep in mind that the development aid which we, the industrial states, are granting should not be totally counteracted ;and that the developing countries should not be driven into constantly greater indebtedness.

No doubt, ladies and gentlemen, the energy supply and overall world economic development constitute hazards for our economic development as well. Yet our national economy has demonstrated great power of resistance and great flexibility, as well as great ability to adapt to the turbulences of the world economy.

In 1979, which has just come to a close, we achieved an economic growth of 4.5 percent. We created 340,000 new jobs last year. In the past 2 years we created a total of half a million new jobs.

We had, therefore, in 1979 the lowest unemployment rate and the highest offer of open jobs since 1973. The order books of our enterprises are full. So we are entering the new year from a good starting position. We are doing this with calmness. We need this calmness not just because of the international crisis; we also need it to perform a number of tasks at home, in our own house, tasks that must be performed by the time this Bundestag legislative period comes to an end this summer.

I recall our promise to relieve citizens with regard to taxes on 1 January 1981 and to strengthen families in that way. In order to achieve this, the bill must be adopted this year.

I recall the important bills in the field of environmental protection that still need to be passed: the Criminal Law Bill in connection with environmental protection, the Chemicals Bill and the Traffic and Noise Bill. I also recall the Amending Bill regarding cartels.

I recall that 1980 will be an important year for decisions that will be decisive regarding the future with regard to new electronic media and the structure of our radio and television networks.

I remind the political parties--each one for itself--that they must clarify this year their further intentions regarding the pension reform of 1984, which will have to be achieved in the next legislative period.

I am satisfied with these few key words, which are intended to make just one thing clear, ladies and gentlemen. They are supposed to make the following clear: Even though preserving peace will be by far the most important task of this year, there are also, as before, other tasks in our country in connection with which we are rightly expected to bring solutions and give guidance. We do not want to disappoint these expectations. [applause]

We all have reason to feel self-confident in this connection. We have the comforting experience that we Germans are capable of maintaining our stability even in difficult situations--political crisis outside our borders as well as extremists or terrorists within our borders. [applause] These experiences give me confidence for the future. We will withstand the challenges. Our friends and partners in the world trust us, and rightly so. They can rely on our solidarity. That pertains today particularly to the United States because of the hostages taken in Tehran. [applause]

I would like to add that I have confidence in the people of our country. They have mastered many difficult times; they have always preserved their courage, their diligence and their enterprising spirit; and they will stand the test in 1980 as well. My cordial thanks. [prolonged applause]

Genscher Speech

DW171355 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1107 GMT 17 Jan 80 DW

[Speech by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher to the Bundestag following the government statement by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt--live]

[Text] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Federal Government the chancellor this morning delivered a government statement which excelled in its sobriety and realistic assessment of the situation. [applause]

If this debate is to achieve what it ought to perform at this hour, colleague Kohl, it would have deserved different treatment on your part. [applause] Where you spoke on the questions now at issue I will take up what you said because I think that we have a responsibility toward our country and toward our allies for searching, in an objective discussion, for those chances which will make it possible for us to preserve freedom and security for our country. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the world has been under the effects of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The Federal Government has condemned the Soviet action in public before the United Nations where it cooperated in the decision of the Security Council just cited, even if it is not a member of that council, it has condemned this action vis-a-vis the Soviet Union and demanded its withdrawal from Afghanistan. The people in our country and everywhere in the world are seeing how a nation has been victimized by a coldly calculated military intervention, an intervention which is only poorly justified with reference to alleged calls for help.

Our citizens feel that this development, which is taking place 7,000 kilometers away, has had effects as far as the center of Europe. It has revived memories of 1956 in Hungary, the construction of the Berlin Wall in 1961, the year of 1968 in Czechoslovakia.

In this situation everybody realizes what it means to not have war here in Europe for 35 years--something that was still taken for granted yesterday. Ladies and gentlemen, all people, whatever their political position may be, are united in the will to do everything to prevent this from being jeopardized, for nothing at all can be done without peace. [applause]

The concern of our citizens and their will for peace do not stop at the division line running through Germany. The letters which currently reach us presage that in the apartments, factories, in the mess halls and in the schools of the GDR the discussions, the worries, the expectations, the hopes are not in any way different from those here in our country. This means preserving peace and safeguarding what has been achieved to date for the cohesion of the nation.

The citizens of our countries do not advance any highhanded demands, nor do they succumb to panic. And everybody coming to us from the outside can see for himself that the Germans want to work in and for peace; they want to live in freedom and for freedom. Yet they want this peace not only for themselves; they want it for all peoples of the world. They want it for the Afghan people. The Germans do not insinuate that the Soviet leadership wants to attack us, that it wants war. Yet they expect a country of the size and the world political responsibility of the Soviet Union to observe the principles of international law, also where the extension of its own sphere of influence seems to be burdened with fewer risks than here in Europe where an alliance capable of action is guaranteeing our security. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the Germans know that they are in agreement with the peoples of the world in expecting the responsible people of the north and south, east and weat to do everything to preserve peace and to discontinue Afghanistan's occupation by Soviet troops. They expect that governments and parliaments will provide information as to how peace and freedom can be secured in the future.

All of us recall that the meeting of the ministers of the North Atlantic pact was held in Brussels on 13 and 14 December 1979. The communique of 14 December says in part, and it is necessary to call this to mind once again because then it will become clear that neither we as partners of the alliance nor the other allies are as unsuspecting as Mr Kohn would have us believe. This communique, ladies and gentlemen, said:

They, meaning the ministers, voiced their concern about direct or indirect actions of the Soviet Union and some of its allies in several areas of unrest, accompanied by a quite considerable qualitative and quantitative enhancement of the military strength of the Warsaw Pact and, especially, the growing Soviet continental nuclear and conventional capabilities. The ministers stated that these developments are cause for justified concern and compatible with either protestations by the Warsaw Pact that they do not aspire to military superiority or their publicly declared intention to promote detente particularly in the military field. The ministers once again explained their view that detente must be worldwide and indivisible. End of quotation.

Ladies and gentlemen, the consistent implementation of the long-term NATO defense program adopted in 1978, the Brussels decision of the alliance on the closure of the arms gap as a reply to the Soviet advance armament in medium-range missiles, and the offers of negotiations on medium-range weapons confidence-building measures and the MBFR underscores the will ofthe alliance to insure the balance in any event and, if we had our way, on a lower level of armaments if possible. [applause]

These alliance decisions continue to be in effect without any changes. Wherever any doubts may have occurred about their necessity, these doubts ought to be overcome now. The United States and its European allies hope that the entire range of the Western negotiating offers of December will remain or become the subject of negotiation. They must remain on the agenda.

Ladies and gentlemen, particularly because of the situation and the developments in Afghanistan, neither the security police dialog nor the political dialog with the East must be disrupted. [applause] The determination to do everything for the preservation of security and the will to have talks on that basis are indispensable, particularly now. If one or the other is not done, we will lose our ability to act.

Colleague Mertes, I do not impute that you do not want that. With applause you can express agreement with me.

Neither through the inability to act nor through the awakening of emotions must we contribute to a vicious circle wherein peace will not just be endangered but lost.

Ladies and gentlemen, the refusal of the Soviet Union to start negotiations now on medium-range arms does not change anything about the necessity for and correctness of our decision to close the arms gap. The purpose of that decision was not to create a negotiating position, but to safeguard the balance that is being endangered by the Soviet arms lead.

Concern for the effects of the intervention in Afghanistan, concern for the energy supply of Europe and the whole Western world, concern for the world political balance and the question of whether there will be a new Afghanistan demonstrate how correct the statements were that were made by the alliance in December.

The NATO Council and the Council of Ministers of the European Community once more on Tuesday of this week stressed that we believe detente to be a worldwide, indivisible matter. The Soviet Union must be reminded just now that this approach to detente was also contained in the joint declaration signed by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and General Secretary Brezhnev on 6 May 1978. It says: Out of respect for the indivisibility of peace and security in all parts of the world, they will use their political and economic opportunities for that aim unilaterally, bilaterally and multilaterally.

Even before that, namely on 22 June 1977, the French state president and the Soviet general secretary stated: The Soviet Union and France consider it necessary that the efforts of all states aimed at international detente be continued and intensified through coordinating their action vis-a-vis other states and all parts of the world, coordinating also with the demands of detente.

In today's government statement the federal chancellor once more very clearly outlined the connection between safeguarding peace in Europe and in other parts of the world. The Federal Government is convinced that only this approach to detente will make it possible to properly define the significance and the effects of as well as the reaction to the Soviet intervention. It is a violation of the principle of detente in other parts of the world, and it will also have an effect on detente policy in Europe.

But, ladies and gentlemen, it cannot mean that a violation of these principles in Afghanistan by the Soviet Union can be answered by our abandonment of these principles in Europe. [applause] We will not pursue a policy of tension in Europe. In other words, we will not call into question the results of detente policy, the treaties with the Soviet Union, with the People's Republic of Poland, with the CSSR, the basic agreement with the GDR, the four-power agreement on Berlin and the final document of Helsinki. They must much rather continue to dominate our policy. [applause] That also applies to the practical results of that polict--for travel possibilities in Germany, for exit permission to the Federal Republic of Germany, for family reunification, for unhindered traffic between Berlin and the Federal Republic and for the Berliners' ability to travel. Ladies and gentlemen, we will not undo anything, not one step we have made on the basis of the concluded treaties. [applause]

Not just peace must be safeguarded, but we must not put at stake the results of the treaty policy and the prerequisites for further progress. We mean this, ladies and gentlemen, when we say that we want to pursue our realistic detente policy. [applause, unintelligible shouts]

Colleague Kohl, we want to lead a dialog here, anticipating this morning that you would say: He says "that" for the first time, namely, realistic detente policy. So I asked an aide to quickly find out how many statements I have made in this respect. [unintelligible shouts] Well, please listen to me also, I listened to you when you were talking. You said that you heard me say that for the first time, so to speak. I have commented on it 23 times. On 23 August 1974 I was asked by GENERAL-ANZEIGER: A process of consideration is taking place in the West, dealing with detente policy and with this term. How far has that developed? I answered: It is necessary to clearly define the term detente policy. [unintelligible shouts] Well, Mr Hupka, we are grateful for every contribution. I said there: Detente policy alone cannot create security; security rests on the existence or our alliance and its ability to act. It is in the interest of the alliance for contradictions to be eliminated and friction decreased. This also includes the development of communications among peoples. Detente policy cannot be a one-way street; it demands mutuality. No alternative exists to detente policy, the alternatives would in fact be realistic or illusory detente policy. We want to have a realistic detente policy. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, I ask you now whether the things I have outlined here as the result of that policy--travel possibilities in Germany, exit possibilities to the Federal Republic of Germany, the four-power agreement--whether this is an illusion or a reality that is being experienced every year by millions of people in Europe. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the agreements included and also the final document of Helsinki are not only for us, but also for all Western partners and allies. It is also a firm, indispensable basis for future policy.

In safeguarding peace, in safeguarding the results of our treaty policy we are aware of our responsibility not only to the citizens in the free part of Germany but also to our fellow citizens in the GDR. This policy can be pursued only on the solid basis of our membership in the European Community and on the solid basis of the Western defense alliance. Because this alliance exists, because this alliance proved in December 1979 that it does function despite all difficulties, and because in this alliance our Bundeswehr fulfills a decisive and responsible task not only for our own security but for the security of all of Western Europe, this policy pursued by us jointly with our allies is free from any illusions. It is what is termed realistic. [applause]

Because of the existence of the alliance and because of the importance of the Bundeswehr for our own security and for the security of our allies, because of the confidence we have in our allies and our Bundeswehr and its efficiency and its defensive ability, we know what was possible in Afghanistan is not possible here. [applause] Ladies and gentlemen, Heinrich Krone was right when he said after the Berlin Wall had been built in 1961: That they do not march through Brandenburger too is due to the existence of the alliance. What was true at the time is also true today, ladies and gentlemen. [applause]

We are fully aware of the fact that what happens in the Middle East also affects our security, both economically and militarily-strategically. We know that it is the full solidarity of the European alliance partners with the United States and Canada that can guarantee our security. The United States is as indispensable for the security of West Berlin as it is for the security of all of Western Europe. The solidarity of the United States has stood the test at difficult moments. To us this solidarity is not a one-way street. Therefore, any attempt to separate Europe from its U.S. allies will remain useless. [applause]

Nothing would be more dangerous than the belief that, in light of the challenges in Afghanistan, the interests of the Americans and the interests of the Europeans would have to be defined differently. No, ladies and gentlemen, we all are sitting in one boat. [unintelligible shouts] And if there is a difference at all--if you agree, let me say at least what you agree to in my speech without interrputing me--if there is a difference at all, then it is the fact that we Germans are sitting closer to the edge of this boat than others.

Because we know the solidarity of the United States with us, our solidarity with the United States also must be unreserved, above all, now that the hostages in Tehran are at stake. We do not interfere in Iran's internal affairs. We unreservedly respect the right of the Iranian people to determine their state and social system. But the holding of hostages in Tehran concerns the whole of the community of states. I appeal to responsible people in Iran, a country with which we have traditional relations of friendship and cooperation, to realize the command of the moment and to listen to the voice of clear reason.

At present, when the American people feel very clearly who is a friend in need and who is not, no doubts must be allowed to emerge about the attitude of the European partners toward the United States. There must be no loftly reserve, no halfheartedness and no tricks. A trusting exchange of opinion--yes, but not [word indistinct] priggery and arrogance. [applause] The federal chancellor and I assured the U.S. deputy secretary of state that America can rely on us, the Federal Republic of Germany. [applause] It can also rely on the European Community. Colleague Kohl talked about the necessity of the solidarity of the European states in light of the economic measures announced or taken by the United States regarding the Soviet Union. The ministers of the European Community agreed on Tuesday that we will not stab the United States in the back; we will not enter into any business that is no longer done by the Americans. [applause]

This applies not only to food supplies. Though it will be difficult to stand up for the consequences in our respective countries, I hope that we will be able to make the necessity of this stance clear to our public.

Ladies and gentlemen, the existence of NATO and its functioning is not only important for its members; it is a factor of stability in the world political balance, especially for Europe. Its existence is also considered by the nonalined European states, which are not members of the Western alliance, to be an element of their own security. By the way, I am convinced that this statement even holds true outside Europe. I am convinced that many a state in the Third World which previously viewed NATO, our membership in NATO, our contribution to NATO skeptically, will today have more understanding for the necessity of our defense efforts, especially after Afghanistan.

Ladies and gentlemen, against the background of the intervention in Afghanistan it is also understandable why we spend 1 mark for development aid and, in comparison, 9 marks for military purposes. We would prefer a situation where the ratio were more advantageous for development aid, but we are not the only ones responsible. However, we should also see that for every ruble spent for development aid, 417 rubles are spent for arms. It is here that a change of stance is necessary. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, how must the reaction of Federal Republic of Germany and its allies be to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan? The occupation of a nonalined country of the Third World shows that the basic character of the conflict is a conflict between the Soviet Union and the principles of sovereignty and nonalinement. The undisputed effect that will have on East-West relations from the aspect of indivisible detente must not hide the basic character of the conflict. The states of the Third World are aware of that fact.

The results of the vote in the UN General Assembly, which has been mentioned by the federal chancellor here, was that 104 member states voted for a withdrawal with only 18 noes, of which eight came from Warsaw Pact countries. This demonstrates the joint approach of the Third World and of the Western democracies to that problem. That is an absolutely new situation in a United Nations vote, a situation whose world-political significance has not yet been realized everywhere. [applause] That vote discards for good the legend that the Soviet Union is considered by the Third World as its natural partner.

The nonalined will realize more and more the value of copperation with those states who want to have cooperation on the basis of equal rights with preservation of and respect for independence and sovereignty of all states of the Third World and their national, cultural and religious identities. I stress what I have repeatedly said to the United Nations: The policy of predominance, the policy aimed at the establishment of zones of power and of influence oppose the wheel of history. They are thoroughly reactionary. Only a partnership policy has a future, a policy of mutual respect. In this development of international relations we are on the side of progress. We do not want to export our state or social systems.

Ladies and gentlemen, maybe the Western world will now more clearly realize the stabilizing effect of the nonalined movement than was sometimes the case in the past because of rash policy judgments by nonalined states. [applause] Being nonalined in the Third World means plurality, independence, originality and the finding of one's own national identity.

The nonalined movement is a great political and historical strength. Our policy must realize and promote the interests of the Third World more clearly than in the past. This is the only way we could do justice to the conflict of the Soviet Union with the Third World states. The West must promote a partnership with equal rights everywhere in the world through a clear strategy of peace and independence. Africa and Asia must not lose the independence they have just acquired to some new predominance. Economic aid and political cooperation must now enable the states in the Mideast region to preserve their internal and external independence.

The aim of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is obvious. It is the expression of a general strategy aimed at developing its sphere of influence in areas where stability is lacking, the stability such as that of Europe, where that seems possible without running greater risks. In specific, in the Middle East area it is an expression of the general strategy to push forward to warm waters while simultaneously bringing influence to bear on the energy and raw materials sources of that region.

Ladies and gentlemen, the strategic aims of the Soviet intervention, the analysis of the basic conflict and the effects this will have on East-West relations produce conclusions for the Western states, be they members of the Western defense alliance or of the European Community, or be there some other cooperation between them and us.

First, the Western alliance's ability to act and defend itself must also be safeguarded in the future without restrictions.

This includes, among other things, the fact that the Bundeswehr must not be considered a cumbersome though necessary evil, but an expression of our democracy's determination to stand its ground. This insight must also give state-political significance to Bundeswehr service. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, all alliance partners must fulfill their commitments with regard to common defense. The decisions of the Federal Republic of Germany, including the December decision of the alliance, stress the fact that we have based our security policy only on realities and not on hopes. Those who gave priority to hopes rather than realities in December must now have the insights to draw the necessary conclusions --without any malicious joy from another side.

The European Community ought to exploit the present situation--I fully agree with you, Colleague Kohl--long overdue problems ought to be solved, results should be achieved and some progress with regard to the structure of the Community should be attempted, namely, a joint European Community energy policy. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen: Second, it is necessary that those states who strive for partnership cooperation with Western democracies [unintelligible shouts]... Well, if you consider a joint energy policy as mere words, it demonstrates to me how far you are from realities in our country. [shouts, applause]

Well, if I have misunderstood the shouts--you know that the federal chancellor fully agrees with me on that subject, so that I could quote his suggestion.

Ladies and gentlemen, I find that the situation is in fact extremely serious. The very factual and constructive suggestions that are being made here must be heard. I am not the last speaker in this debate. [applause] You can point all that out later on. I would be glad if such a session as this today were to bring about, in addition to the exchange of different opinion, a dialog aimed at achieving common results. [applause] Maybe we ought to try that. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, those states who seek cooperation as partners with Western democracies, in this case with the European Community, must not be disappointed. Upon our request, the foreign ministers of the European Community decided on Tuesday to give the order to negotiate this week on a new economic agreement with Yugoslavia; the mission to negotiate has been postponed for months because of second-rate problems. [applause] Ladies and gentlemen, that is more than just preparedness for qualitatively better economic cooperation; that is a political signal for safeguarding political interests in Europe. [applause]

The ASEAN states, which merged 13 years ago in Southeast Asia, are more aware than ever of this decision for maintaining their national independence in view of the acute threat they are facing.

Indonesia and Malaysia, the Philippines, Thailand and Singapore have demonstrated what importance they attach to equal partnership cooperation with us through the conclusion of a cooperation agreement with the European Community. The signing of the agreement planned for Kuala Lumpur with cooperation of all the European Community's foreign ministers deserves increased political significance in view of the events in Afghanistan. The Lome agreements prove that the states of the European Community are convinced that they contribute to the development and thus to the internal stability of these countries through economic cooperation.

The Mediterranean agreements with Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Jordan, Libya, Syria and Israel constitute an inestimable contribution toward the stabilization of this region. Despite all the problems, the European-Arab dialog has discernibly shown stabilizing effects. Following our motion, the foreign ministers of the European Community, on Tuesday of this week as well, have issued instructions on the preparation of a concept for an economic cooperation agreement with the Gulf states, including Iraq, modeled on the EC-ASEAN agreement. Once these agreements have been concluded, we will make a fair offer to these states concerning economic cooperation.

The intention that was decided on Tuesday is in itself a signal. The necessity for assistance toward the development of Pakistan, a new assistance action for Turkey and under our guidance, the accord in the European Community concerning a considerable effort toward mitigating the distress of the refugees in Pakistan, specifically the Afghan refugees, and the efforts toward additional aid to that country--all these activities from elements of a Western strategy aimed at strengthening the independence of states that wish to preserve this independence against new hegemony. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, this is a constructive policy in this situation. Cooperation with India, too, is intended to serve this policy toward independence. The strategic significance of the will for economic and political cooperation must not be underrated. Ladies and gentlemen, the fact that guns and tanks alone do not mean anything about the internal state of a country and about the foreign policy position which is supported by that country's population has been plainly demonstrated by developments in Iran. The West must resist the temptation to transfer, on its part, the East-West controversy to the Third World. Anyone doing that will destabilize the Third World. [applause]

The discussion on NATO's tasks in the present situation and our mission in the alliance must be conducted with great care and in total clarity. It is necessary to ask whether an extension of the [NATO] sphere of responsibility would not be assessed by the Third World states in question as an impairment of their independence by another side rather than as assistance. [applause] Nor do I believe that we should give any cause for an internal burdening of the alliance. What I am saying here is not a rejection of the assumption of commitments by alliance members, in the form of a division of labor, where on the basis of their history and their engagement beyond the bounds of Europe they wish to assume responsibilities.

But as far as the Federal Republic of Germany is concerned, it is our task in particular to see in an overall concept of the alliance the significance of the division of tasks and our role within the framework of this division of tasks.

The central role of the Federal Republic of Germany for security in Europe, for the conventional defense of Central Europe, makes a concentration of our military potentials on this task obvious. Nobody can rule out the possibility, ladies and gentlemen, that our alliance will have even more tasks in that respect in the future. To this end, we must be prepared to meet such a demand. We must desist from doing anything that might deprive us of our chances to do this in the future.

Our participation in political cooperation and economic assistance is indispensable. It is in keeping with our interests, which are identical with those of our partners. Peaceful solutions to conflicts in all parts of the world constitute an important instrument for preventing interventions. This is why we support the peace process in Zimbabwe Rhodesia, and this is why we participate in the initiative of the five Western countries for Namibia. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, I think that anyone concerned about the Middle East cannot bypass developments in the Near East. The challenge of the Islamic world, in addition to the fact that the loss of independence by the Islamic countries would also spell the end of the independence of Israel, make it obvious that all parties involved must now make a considerable effort toward a comprehensive and just peace solution, with the participation of the Palestinian people. This people's right to self-determination must also be realized, and this ought to be the hour of restoration of Arab unity. This should be the hour of settling the Israeli-Arab conflict, a conflict, ladies and gentlemen, whose seriousness and historical background are known to us. We know what distrust exists there. Yet it ought to be permissable to ask whether these problems do not recede in the face of the dangers threatening the independence of the entire region.

Therefore, the intervention in Afghanistan is a provocation against the states of the Third World just as it is a challenge to the Western world. Western and Third World states can jointly find a position in reference to it if they realize that the independence of the Third World is also in keeping with the interests of the Western democracies and that a West capable of action and defense is also an element of the Third World's independence and security.

We must not narrow down our program for action to reactions within the East-West relationship. It is our duty to preserve our own independence and security and to help others in the preservation of their independence and security. We have the duty to create elements of stability in the world which will demonstrate to the Soviet Union that for the Soviet Union, too, the costs of a policy as pursued in Afghanistan are too high. This is what matters now, and this is what is decisive at this point.

Ladies and gentlemen, what we need is new confidence-building. There is no doubt about the fact that the Soviet Union has inflicted severe damage on the confidence that is necessary for worldwide cooperation, detente, and security through what it has been doing in Afghanistan.

Ladies and gentlemen, we need the will of all who are involved in the process of detente if security is to be created. In our own country it is necessary to tell the citizens that matters will not become simpler: The energy supply problems in our country will have economic effects. The federal chancellor has pointed out the necessity that wage negotiation partners act with responsibility.

I stress what Mr Kohl has said about the necessity of mustering the strength to do more in the field of public development aid. We will face new tasks and efforts which we must make for our security. I have no doubts that the citizens of our country are prepared to face that responsibility.

We Germans want to have peace, and not just in our country but everywhere in the world. We want to have stability; we want to export aid, not conflicts or ideologies.

Ladies and gentlemen, we want cooperation, we want understanding; we do not want tension, but detente. As someone whose heart beats for his central German homeland, I cannot imagine that there could be a people who are more concerned about the opportunity given us in Europe to continue working on detente and on making adjustments than this German people who are forced to live in two states. [applause] Therefore, we cannot and may not make any political decision without thinking of Dresden, Weimar, Halle, Magdeburg, Rostock or Greifswald.

Ladies and gentlemen, aware of this responsibility, we want to continue to work for peace, security and detente as much as we are able. [applause]

DIE WELT on Schmidt Shortcomings

DW181032 Bonn DIE WELT in German 18 Jan 80 p 6 DW

[Commentary signed W.H.-E.: "Commonness"]

[Text] The political essence of the parliamentary debate about the severe crisis touched off by Moscow is that Federal Chancellor Schmidt must just grab the opportunity in order to establish at least in Bonn joint responsibility for foreign political action. Chancellor-candidate Strauss offered to him, on behalf of the Bundestag opposition, a joint talk with the explicit addition that the opposition does not want to dodge its responsibility in this situation.

Only against the background of this central statement of the debate can one realize the importance of what has taken place prior to the speech by Strauss, Schmidt appeared in his government statement as the great master of "crisis management." The debate, however, created the impression that the foreign minister was playing a more attractive part in the present crisis management than the chancellor. Schmidt's government statement did not withstand the charges of the next speaker, opposition leader Helmut Kohl. The vice chancellor immediately jumped into the breech. Therefore, a recapitulation of the discussion must be based on the dialog between Kohl and Genscher:

1. The opposition leader and the foreign minister suggested assessing development aid more highly in order to strengthen cooperation in view of the impression created by Moscow's being condemned by the UN General Assembly--cooperation with other states wanting to preserve their independence such as Pakistan, India and Turkey. Genscher attributed "strategic significance" to that aspect. Clear agreement with the chancellor existed on that point.

2. The opposition leader and the foreign minister agreed that the FRG must be prepared within the framework of a division of labor in the Atlantic alliance to make greater sacrifices for Central Europe's ability to defend itself. The chancellor had kept quiet about that.

Schmidt, who ought to be pardoned because of his sickness, indicated in this connection that he considered three things important: spreading optimism, convincing people that what had happened in Afghanistan could not happen in Europe, and pointing out Bonn's efforts--as a significant German contribution to solidarity with America, which he supported with strong words--to keep the talks with Moscow functioning.

Attentive listeners missed any word about whether it could really be Bonn's main task now to act as a moderator between Washington and Moscow, or whether solidarity with American would not be served much better if Bonn contributed something to full agreement between Paris and Washington. But the chancellor did not say a word about that.

So Schmidt created the impression--rightly or not--that because of concern for his party he cared particularly about a meeting with Honecker and Brezhnev. Nothing against such visits, but strangely enough the chancellor will probably have met Honecker already in February and Carter only in March.

Criticism of Schmidt

[Commentary signed RM.: "Illusory Dust"]

[Text] Federal Chancellor Schmidt used firm words in condemning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in his Bundestag speech. He also pointed out what the anschluss of this country to the Moscow imperium would mean for the Western world. But what should the Federal Republic, an important link of the Western world, do according to Schmidt? Little. The federal chancellor assures that his government will support America and its reprisals. But the Federal Government has just signalled to Washington that only a few reprisals would permit German participation. The only thing Schmidt wants to consider more closely is help for the endangered countries in the neighborhood of Afghanistan; a good thing--but too little. Pakistan or the states on the Persian Gulf feel helpless vis-a-vis the Soviet pressure. They need support by an active West; only then will they gain self-confidence. Schmidt seems to believe it could work the other way round. He brushes aside the urgent question of whether the Western alliance could continue to afford to limit its defense mission to Europe. He has something better up his sleeve: a Bonn Cabinet decision of last May where the Federal Government objects to zones of influence of foreign powers in the Third World. But now the unbelievable has happened, namely, that the Soviet Politburo is not adhering to this.

Schmidt distracted attention from the necessities of Western politics. Does he believe Europe can be spared in these dramatic months of the East-West conflict? If one does not stick to his individual words but to their context, then detente seems divisible after all for the chancellor. He wants to see the crisis as being limited, with the edge taken out of it. How does he imagine that could be done? In his speech he recalled the attack on Czechoslovakia in 1968. As one knows, that crisis was limited and the edge was taken out of it by the West: through doing nothing. Is that supposed to be the Bonn recipe for Afghanistan?

Kohl has missed many a great chance in the Bundestag, but not the one on Thursday. With his speech he made a thrust through the dust of illusions that surrounds the policy of the Federal Government. The federal chancellor has often discarded him as a provincial. But Kohl has now charged that the chancellor views this world crisis as a provincial, and the reproach has hit the target.

SCHMIDT ON SOVIET 'CHALLENGE,' OTHER ISSUES IN MADRID NEWS BRIEFING

ID171539 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 10 Jan 80 p 11 ID

[Unattributed report: "I Am Impressed by Spain's Political Progress"]

[Excerpts] Madrid, 9 January--"I am impressed by the political progress achieved by Spain over the last few years. Democracy has been consolidated, and this is an extremely important gain; a realistic economic policy is being pursued; steady progress is being made toward Spain's integration into Europe," FRG Chancellor and head of government Helmut Schmidt stated at a press conference held at the conclusion of his visit to Spain--the fist official visit by a German chancellor.

The FRG chancellor's press conference began with a lengthy introductory statement, in which Schmidt stated that "this visit has been very important for me, and I have prepared for it very carefully. I am very grateful for this relaxed and thorough exchange of views which I have held with his majesty the king, in the presence and with the participation of Prime Minister Suarez. In these talks we dealt principally with four points--the international situation, European affairs, bilateral relations and Spain's entry into the Common Market. I believe that these discussions, taking place at the beginning of a new decade, have been very useful."

European issues: "It is natural that during my talks in Madrid we should have discussed Spain's entry into the EEC. Spain is an integral part of Europe in the cultural, economic and political fields. Europe has owed much to Spain for decades, and its entry into Europe is a logical matter. [paragraph continues]

We are all certain that Spain's entry will be a considerable enrichment for the EC in the cultural, economic and, above all, political fields. I emphasize this point because I believe that it is important that the European countries be united and support each other in the economic and political fields during the next few years, which will not in fact be very happy. We all know that the negotiations on membership and the mutual adjustments that will be necessary will not be easy, either for the existing members or for Spain. We have always seen the difficulties which have arisen when new members have joined the EC. Successes cannot be expected in the short term; hopes must be set in the interim. In the long run, Spain's membership will prove extremely positive for all the members. To this effect, the FRG Government will resolutely continue to support Spain's membership of the EC."

Invasion of Afghanistan: "As far as the international situation is concerned, we held a thorough exchange of views, which included, of course, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the possible conclusions and deductions which should be drawn from this action. In discussing this topic it was a great asset to me to learn from the Spanish side its assessment of this conflict, especially with respect to the Arab-Islamic area, because it is well known that there are very good relations between Spain and the Arab world, and this rendered this aspect of the talks particularly valuable for me. For this reason we agreed by common consent to continue a series of more intensive and thorough talks to discuss this specific topic.

"With respect to the possible efforts of the invasion of Afghanistan for the world, we reached broad agreement between each other's viewpoints. We also agreed with the Spanish Government that this real danger, this challenge which is inherent in the present situation, must be countered by firm solidarity on the part of the Western countries. We cannot and must not face up to this situation nervously or anxiously, but rather with strong discipline and consistency in our thinking and in our conduct. We also agreed that we must take advantage of all the opportunities and contacts within the Western world to strengthen greater coordination with the Third World countries which are particularly affected by this Soviet intervention. But we must also take advantage of all the opportunities for an exchange of views with the Soviet Union, and this, of course, concerns the CSCE conference to be held in Madrid in the fall and in whose preparations we have actively taken part. At difficult times and times of international crisis we must not remain silent but rather talk more with the others in order not to fall unexpectedly into situations into which we do not wish to fall."

Spanish policy: "I have been deeply impressed by the progress in domestic politics and in democratization which Spain has achieved over the last few years. With respect to the economic and financial policy pursued by the Spanish Government--in particular, with respect to the reduction of the budgetary deficits, the struggle against inflation and the efforts which are being made to reduce the money supply--I believe that these are praiseworthy efforts in Spain's progress toward the EEC. I regard the relations between my country and Spain as magnificent. The friendship between our two nations and the cooperation between our two governments are excellent. I leave Madrid with a feeling of deep satisfaction with my visit."

EEC-NATO: [Question] Do you believe that the issue of the enlargement or otherwise of the military alliances should be discussed at the Madrid CSCE conference?

[Answer] Emphatically not.

[Question] How will the FRG counter the Latin countries' increased influence in the EEC when Spain joins it?

[Answer] This question seems to me to be mistaken, because we have no cause to oppose the Latin countries' increasing influence. On the contrary, this influence is a source of satisfaction for us, and we have always viewed it in this manner. We have championed Spain's membership from the outset. Germany has owed much to the Latin countries for centuries; for this reason we deem it necessary for us to integrate this culture into our way of thinking.

[Question] Over the last few days it has been possible to read statements by senior leaders of NATO, of the FRG opposition and by European politicians to the effect that Spain must joint this military bloc. Do you believe that Spain can belong to the Common Market without previously joining NATO?

[Answer] The leaders of NATO or of the FRG opposition do not necessarily express my own opinion. In my opinion it is not necessary for Spain to belong to the European military pacts in order to join the Common Market. I have not discussed this topic with the king, the prime minister or Felipe Gonzalez in any of my talks in Madrid because I do not deem this issue urgent. It is a matter concerning which the Spanish people will decide what they deem opportune in due time.

[Question] Is the FRG not raising as many objections as France to Spain's joining the Common Market because of Spain's desire to achieve a liberalization of manpower policy in these countries?

[Answer] The Spanish prime minister asked me this question, and I explained to him that there are 4 million foreign workers in the FRG. This makes it difficult for the FRG to provide them with decent housing, proper education and adequate vocational training. For this reason we have suspended the hiring of foreign workers, including those from EC countries, for 7 years. Thus in the case of Greece a transitional period until free movement of manpower can be introduced has been sought. Spain's case would be more less similar.

United States--USSR crisis: [Question] Does the FRG support the U.S. measures adopted against the Soviet Union because of its interventions in Afghanistan?

[Answer] I will adopt a clearly defined stance before the FRG parliament next week, and I do not wish to anticipate what I will say in my own country. Of course, the FRG has been deeply disturbed by this intervention, since the Soviet stance threatens the stability of the entire region and, moreover, violates the elementary principles of peaceful coexistence. We feel solidarity with the stance adopted by the United States. As far as the measures adopted by President Carter are concerned, it is not to be expected that the FRG will take part in these measures, since we are not suppliers of grain to the USSR, do not grant the Soviet Union preferential credits and cannot reduce the staff of our embassy in Moscow, either, since we signed an agreement whereby we have the same [number of] staff at our respective embassies. But we express solidarity with the countries condemning this action and are maintaining very close contacts with the United States as a result of this action. Over the last few days, I have held several telephone conversations with President Carter, and there can be no doubt, either now or in the future, about our foreign policy, and I have assured President Carter that we will act concordantly.

[Question] What do you believe to be the reasons which have led the Soviets to take this step?

[Answer] In a provisional analysis, I believe that the reason why the Soviets have invaded Afghanistan is to increase their sphere of influence in the Persian Gulf, with the aim of controlling the exporting of crude in the near future. Moreover, Afghanistan is a country of considerable strategic importance with respect to exercising greater influence in Iran and Pakistan. There is no doubt that the USSR's strategic positions in this area have improved considerably following this invasion.

ARMY GENERAL CRITICAL OF NATO POLICY ASKS TO RETIRE

LD171244 Hamburg DPA in German 1145 GMT 17 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Maj Gen Gert Bastian, commander of the 12th Armored Division of the Bundeswehr, today asked Federal Defense Minister Apel to be retired on half pay. According to the minister the reason given by the general for his request was that he cannot support NATO's decision to modernize medium-range missiles and at the same time to offer arms control negotiations to the USSR.

Minister Apel has rejected the general's request. He explained that the "primacy of politics" applies in full to all soldiers. Recent weeks especially have made it strikingly clear that the Federal Government is steering the right course with its policy, of which NATO's decisions of last December are a part.

Apel added that the general is at liberty to resign from the Bundeswehr if he renounces his public service entitlements. Apel has given orders that Bastian should immediately relinquish his command of the armored division stationed at Veitshoechheim in southern Germany and be transferred to another post.

Last year the general aroused public discussion and violent opposition attacks when he subscribed to the viewpoint put forward by Wehner, the leader of the SPD group in the Bundestag, who said that the Soviet military potential is defensive in character.

EDITORIAL: WE MUST VIEW OWN INTERESTS IN ASSESSING AFGHANISTAN

DW180830 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 18 Jan 80 p 3 DW

[Hans-Herbert Gaebel editorial: "The Second Glove"]

[Text] In both large political camps of the Federal Republic outrage and disappointment over the Soviet power demonstration in Afghanistan becomes discernible: a bit more consonant on one side, as is becoming to those who are governing, and as loud as required by the self-estimates and the election campaign on the part of the others. It is also undisputed that the Soviets must withdraw from Afghanistan. Only, what will happen if, as it looks today, they take very much time in doing so, or do not do it at all?

As far as the opposition is concerned, the case is clear even now. Its number one spokesman, Helmut Kohl, demanded we bid farewell to detente "daddy" Brezhnev, to illusions about Soviet policy which is exclusively guided by power interests. What happens in Afghanistan is but a part of the global strategy. Hence a realistic assessment of the situation is the commandment of the hour. And then follows, inevitably, the passage: Detente is indivisible.

This sounds so nice that even the foreign minister likes to use it in a slightly amended form but, fortunately, does not draw any conclusion from it. The chancellor himself does not participate in this battling over a principle anyway, a principle whose strict observance and full application would really conjure up the danger of war, about which the opposition is talking loudly and the government in a roundabout way.

During the past several years the greatest skeptics about the purpose and chance of detente have used a somewhat idealistic yardstick for the process connected therewith, like atheists who demand everything, veritably everything, of God. Detente, stripped of the exaggerated claim, has always been but an attempt at defusing power interests--and it is not the Soviet Union alone which has such interests--wherever this seems to be inevitable to both sides.

To this day in Germany, Berlin has been such a case. All treaties with the East materialized in a period in which the Vietnam war and the controversies which it sparked between the two great powers developed their full impact, and they materialized despite the fundamentally ideological enmity between East and West which never ceased even for a day. Indivisibility of detente--this means not only renouncing the policy of preventing war but also throwing on the garbage heap even those parts of a very soberly interpreted detente which continue to work, thus veritably provoking the great clash.

For, as Helmut Kohl surely said justly, the threat of the eighties is war. Nobody can bypass this fact. And it is also true that it is being made very plain to the Soviet Union how much it is playing with fire. This also includes the retaliation measures whose effectiveness in detail may be debatable to the experts but which, on principle, are undisputed; it is just that beyond that it remains the duty of all governments not to threat the case as hopeless and thus not to tear down dams in other parts of the world as well, above all in Europe--from our side, dams that may well hold.

The FRG opposition seems to consider this an illusion, to go by what its prominent spokesmen have said. This once again makes German perfectionism evident in a special way. What we need is a principle which, as is customary with principles, works only very imperfectly and not everywhere. So, also cast away the second glove, too, and be sure that both hands will freeze.

The simple answers are so dangerous especially because the world situation has so thoroughly turned for the worse within a few weeks. The thesis about the indivisibility of detente, at any rate, if thought out to the end, makes it compulsory to wage the debate on Afghanistan also along the Berlin Wall. Yet maintaining calm there is not only a Soviet need but also, at least to the same extent, a need of the West.

What obviously is so difficult in these first few days of a decade which is beginning gloomily is seeing and assessing one's own interests; we might easily forget our own interests in the understandable zeal to punish the Soviets for their act of villainy in Afghanistan and to harm their interests. To keep them constantly in mind requires neither a "playing down" of the Soviet invasion nor a nursing of illusions, for if detente is in practice really divisible, confidence probably is not; confidence has something to do with predictability.

To this day nobody in the West knows whether "Afghanistan" did not also herald a fundamental change in Soviet world policies. Some pessimists fear just that. In that case, however, a lot more would have to topple, and the quarrel of the political theologists would be superfluous. Notwithstanding all necessary resistance to the Soviet policy of expansion, the West has no reason to anticipate this development before it has really become unalterable.

It seems that chancellor-candidate Strauss has understood this since he has made the chancellor a rather clear offer of not leaving him all alone in the crisis management.

CORRESPONDENT NOTES DIFFERING OPINIONS ON INDIVISIBILITY OF DETENTE

DW151435 Bonn DIE WELT in German 15 Jan 80 p 2 DW

[Bonn correspondent Bernt Conrad report: "Is Detente Divisible? Bonn Has a Divided Opinion on It"]

[Text] Bonn--Is detente divisible? Differences of opinion exist in this respect between leading politicians of Bonn's coalition parties, the SPD and the FDR Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said clearly this weekend: "Detente policy is indivisible." He had announced that in a statement given to the Federal Cabinet on 2 January in the absence of the federal chancellor, saying that this was the opinion of the Federal Government.

But leading SPD politicians do not agree at all. SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr said in Washington that detente policy has always been divisible. Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, deputy SPD chairman and close aide of the chancellor, termed the indivisibility of detente an idea aim for which one must still work hard. Moments existed in the past "which demonstrated that detente policy was divisible." Saying this is of "decisive importance." Theo Sommer of DIE ZEIT, who is also close to Schmidt, went even further. He demanded, by turning the conclusion around, that "detente must remain divisible."

The discussion of this issue does not have a theoretical character at all. Its outcome determines the problem of whether Europe will be directly affected by the Afghanistan conflict. Social Democratic disarmament expert Algons Pawelczyk therefore demanded determinedly that Europe ought to be kept out of the Afghanistan crisis as much as possible, because this is mainly a conflict between the Soviet Union and the Third World.

Genscher, a follower of "indivisibility," commented that "we are equally involved." The FDP chief experienced almost the same difference with regard to SPD policy in the spring of 1976 when the Moscow-triggered Cuban intervention in Angola took place. At that time Genscher said what he says today: "Detente must be worldwide, and therefore the action of the Soviet Union, its attempt to intervene in Africa and establish new zones of influence, is a handicap for the whole policy of detente."

In saying this the foreign minister contradicted Helmut Schmidt, who had contested on 3 March 1976 that detente policy was being handicapped by the action of Cuba and the Soviet Union. "The mentioning of Angola naturally asks for the mentioning of the fact that so far Africa and, at any rate, Angola have never been the subject of treaties between the West and the East," said Schmidt. "One cannot demand something from treaties serving detente for which they were never intended."

Despite that statement by the chancellor, who also in his government statement of 17 May 1974 aimed detente policy explicitly at Europe, Genscher managed to place the term "worldwide detente" in a 1 July 1976 statement of the Federal Government. But Schmidt's skepticism remained. His thesis "Detente can be expected only where treaties exist" was exactly in line with the Soviet interpretation in the 24th CPSU congress of 1971 that limited the process of detente to Europe. In May 1976 the Soviet news agency TASS comments on this very frankly: "Detente does not mean freezing objective processes of historical development, and it cannot mean that. It is not a protective letter for brittle regimes, nor a charter for suppressing the just struggle of the people for their national liberation."

That justified every Soviet intervention, be it in Africa or Asia. It was all the more suprising that party chief Leonid Brezhnev, on the occasion of his Bonn visit in May 1978, was prepared together with Schmidt to accept in the final declaration a formula about the "indivisibility of peace and security in all parts of the world." The chancellor considered it an indication "that the process of detente, also according to Soviet opinion, cannot be limited to bilateral relations between the two world powers and to Europe, but that it must extend more and more to other areas."

That was an error, as was demonstrated by Moscow's invasion of Afghanistan. This is why SPD chief Willy Brandt said recently half ironically and half resigned about the thesis of worldwide detente: "That would be very nice. I would like that, too." In the Bonn statement on the session of the Federal Security Council after Schmidt's return from Spain, characterized by a surprisingly firm tone, the indivisibility of detente was not mentioned again. What will the chancellor say in this respect to the Bundestag on Thursday.

BARRE: FRANCE HAS NOT ABANDONED NATO

[Text] Replying just now in the Senate to a question by Communist Anicet le Pors, Raymond Barre has emphasized that the French people are vigilant with regard to their freedom and are faithful to their alliances. The French people are convinced of the need to safeguard the policy of detente in the world. However, this attachment must not be unilateral, he concluded.

CGT'S GENSOUS TO LEAD UNION DELEGATION TO AFGHANISTAN

[Unattributed report: "CGT Delegation to Kabul Will Be Led by M Pierre Gensous"]

[Text] The CGT delegation to Afghanistan, to inquire more fully into the situation there and in keeping with its Executive Committee's 8 January decisions, has to that end contacted the Afghan trade unions affiliated with the WFTU (to which belong in particular all the socialist countries, the French CGT and the Italian CGIL, among others), it has been stated at CGT headquarters.

The three-man delegation will be led by M Pierre Gensous, confederation secretary and head of the International Section, who was secretary general of the WFTU from 1965 to 1978, when he did not seek a further term of office. M Gensous is a PCF member.

He will be accompanied by M Jean-Claude Laroze and M Joseph Jacquet.

When the CGT Executive Committee voted on 8 January on the report by M Galland, a confederation secretary, on the Soviet intervention in Kabul, M Jean-Claude Laroze, a bureau member like M Gensous, abstained to show his disagreement with a text which bore no judgement on the Red Army presence. M Laroze is a socialist.

M Jacquet, a railway worker, is CGT secretary for the Rhone-Alpes Regional Council and a member of the Executive Committee. He has no known political ties.

The delegation is to leave "immediately."

STIRN WARNS SUPERPOWERS TO STAY OUT OF SOUTH PACIFIC

OW171231 Hong Kong AFP in English 1005 GMT 17 Jan 80 OW

[Text] Melbourne, Jan 17 (AFP)--Superpowers could upset stability of the South Pacific region if they backed minority grouping in the French territories the French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Mr Olivier Stirn said today.

Mr Stirn told a press conference that France would not tolerate interference from other countries in her decolonisation process in the South Pacific. Mr Stirn, who earlier this week had talks with a strong critic of French policy in the South Pacific, the Papua New Guinea Foreign Minister Mr Ebia Olewale, said he had explained the position to the Papua New Guinea Government.

Mr Stirn said today "any interference could lead to danger because minorities might be created which would be supported by some superpowers and we could lost stability in the South Pacific." Mr Stirn said he had told Mr Olewale that if Papua New Guinea went to the United Nations committee on decolonisation, France would treat it as interference and would not take any notice.

He repeated that France intended to upgrade its diplomatic representation in the South Pacific by appointing ambassadors to Port Moresby, Suva and in the New Hebrides when they became independent later this year.

PCF'S MOREAU CRITICIZES U.S. HYPOCRISY

LD091529 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 7 Jan 80 pp 1, 6 LD

[Yves Moreau editorial: "The United States and the Chouans [royalist insurgents active during and after the French revolution]"]

[Text] The measures taken by President Carter on the pretext of the events in Afghanistan are grave decisions. Indeed they unilaterally break a whole series of agreements reached with the Soviet Union, thereby jeopardizing exchanges which were not only fruitful for the United States and the USSR but which also had a more general dimension since they were in keeping with peaceful relations.

The speeding up of arms supplies to Pakistan, the feverish way in which the naval air presence in the Indian Ocean is being stepped up even more, the haste with which new U.S.-Turkish military agreements are being drawn up, the declared intention to play the Chinese card against the Soviet Union as far as possible and the U.S. defense secretary's statements in this connection on his arrival in Beijing are also bringing about a deterioration in the international climate.

At the same time the postponement of the ratification of SALT II is likely to prompt a mad arms race--a race which the Atlantic Council had already started to revive in December when it adopted the plan for deploying hundreds of new U.S. nuclear missiles in West Europe.

It is important to bear in mind that this Atlantic Council decision was taken before the recent events in Afghanistan. This precedence is obviously food for thought. It proves that the counteroffensive launched by the opponents of detente was premeditated and that its first manifestations in fact have no connection with Afghanistan.

Moreover the hypocrisy of the pretext now being put forward by Mr Carter is obvious. The head of a government which constantly practices intervention, whether armed or not, in the world, really has no grounds for painting itself as the champion of nonintervention.

Furthermore how could we fail to stress how much its attitude contrasts with that of Soviet diplomacy? In recent years Soviet diplomacy has had only too many motives--well founded in its case--to condemn Washington. It refrained from doing so and patiently worked to preserve and consolidate detente. Mr Carter, on the other hand, is trying to plunge us back into the cold war and is doing so in the name of Afghanistan.

I now have two pictures of this country in my mind.

First, the picture of peasants pulling a cart bringing a few bags of grain to the city: Are they going to deliver them to their "khan" (lord)? Have they come to sell them for him or for themselves? This picture, published by L'HUMANITE on Saturday, which shows men used like beasts of burden, is so anachronistic that it seems to portray a medieval scene.

However, it is contemporary Afghan life which is portrayed in this photograph. Moreover the picture is furtive and incomplete. It does not reveal that out of six sacks of rice harvested these peasants owe five to their lord. It says nothing about the debts they have had to contract to survive nor about what they have to pay to settle these debts: lifelong servitude for their wives or children.

This picture and the tragedies it evokes are not things of the past. The reforms passed by the 1978 revolution have only started being applied in a few provinces. Elsewhere they have come up against medieval prejudices, illiteracy and ignorance.

Another meaningful scene: the opening of the Pol-e Charkhi prison gates; a crowd of prisoners rushing to freedom; thousands of men and women awaiting their release; joy and tears....

What smiles but also what tragedy! Many of the people released, we were told, were revolutionaries whom the previous government had imprisoned....

Between the first and second scene the events of recent days took place--the Babrak Karmal government came to power.

Among other things it promised to release political prisoners. It has started to implement its promise, as shown in the televised report which we have seen.

The United States and the Chouans

He also promised to put an end to the medieval existence, give peasants land everywhere, guarantee civil freedoms and individual rights, show respect for religion and protest and develop the gains of the April 1978 revolution.

An Afghan delegate to the 23d PCF Congress summed up these achievements as follows: In the course of 1 year 2 universities and 500 schools were opened, the debts of 11 million landless farmers were canceled, 300,000 hectares were distributed among 140,000 families, steps to eliminate illiteracy were taken and women were granted equal rights.

Should these reforms be reconsidered? Should the prisons again be filled? Should the Afghan Chouans be encouraged? And should international relations be poisoned to achieve this, as Mr Carter is doing?

Or, on the contrary, should one oppose, as the French Communists are doing, any return to the cold war and show solidarity with the struggles being waged in Afghanistan to enable the Afghan people soon to enjoy democracy and progress in complete freedom?

23D PCF PARTY CONGRESS REPORT ISSUED

[Unattributed report: "Deploying vigorous, Offensive Activity on the 23d Congress Line"]

[Excerpts] The PCF federation secretaries met at the Central Committee yesterday, with Gaston Plissonnier presiding. Charles Fiterman presented a report from which we publish large extracts, emphasizing how the international situation and the Giscard government's policy confirm the 23d party congress analyses. On the basis of these analyses the federation secretaries called on all party organizations and all Communists to adopt an attitude of attack.

"For some weeks," Charles Fiterman stated, "We have been witnessing a formidable political and ideological campaign. The forces of capital and of submission to Washington, beginning with Giscard d'Estaing, do not hesitate to overdramatize the international situation; they brandish threats of war and present an apocalyptic vision of the world, starting with the Iranian situation, the OPEC countries' decisions and, more recently, the events in Afghanistan. At the same time, using this international situation as a pretext, they have given themselves over to aggression against our party. The great organs of anticommunism are thundering."

In the first part of his report the Central Committee secretary examined the reasons for and objectives of this campaign.

An International Situation Characterized by Impetus From the Peoples

"What characterizes the international situation above all is the impetus coming from the peoples struggling for independence, freedom, justice, control of their national resources and socialism. Rarely have so many positive results been achieved in so short a period," the speaker pointed out, citing "the elimination of the fascist regimes in Iran and Nicaragua, the banishment of the Kampuchean murderer Pol Pot, the successes gained by the Saharan people, the positive development of the situation in Mauritania and Bolivia, the positive agreement reached in Rhodesia and the recent elections in India. This is the context in which the events in Afghanistan are placed."

In this connection Charles Fiterman recalled the PCP position on this question, determined in accordance with the principles which we uphold and bearing in mind the interests of the Afghan people and of peace.

"We are thus in the presence of a powerful movement of the peoples unwilling to accept inequality, despotism, hunger, poverty and the theft of their wealth. These peoples are right. Their fight is ours, even if it is true that it is developing in many forms corresponding to the diversity of situations and traditions. It is this movement which worries and frightens imperialism. And that is why it is now on the rampage."

All this uproar has three aims, Charles Fiterman pointed out: First, "by painting the situation in dramatic colors, the aim is to secure acceptance of severe austerity and to impose draconian sacrifices on the working people," because "the results so far obtained by big capital in France are insufficient for it to slacken the vice of the crisis to its own profit."

Imperialism's second aim is to "create conditions on the international plane for safeguarding its positions and striving to regain lost ground." The resumption of the arms race is part of this objective, on the political and economic planes.

The third aim, finally, is "to organize the necessary consensus in our country for the implementation of the previous two aims, and thereby to weaken our party." The speaker emphasized that "the rating, frenzied campaign, orchestrated directly from the Elysee and now aimed at our party, testifies by its manner to our party's importance, to its place in the country's life and to the value that it represents for the workers."

The Acuteness of the Struggle Does Not Represent a Strengthening of the Bourgeoisie

Charles Fiterman pointed out that on the international plane everything confirms our analysis of the correlation of forces; it is i this correlation of forces that the guarantee of peace resides.

We approach this question of the struggle for peace as revolutionaries, he emphasized: "We do not see peaceful coexistence and the peoples' struggle as incompatible. The peoples have the right to revolution, and by the same token the success that they achieve contributes to guaranteeing world peace and encouraging the progress of peaceful coexistence."

Faced with this step forward by the peoples, imperialism is redoubling its threats and aggressive initiatives: There are dangers of war.

But the forces of peace "are powerful enough today to eliminate these dangers and guarantee peace," the speaker stressed. The condition for this is that they "show composure and that they act, that they rally and struggle for peace." One of these forces is indisputably the USSR, whose will to work for peaceful coexistence and detente can be doubted by no one of good faith, Charles Fiterman observed.

The Party's Tasks

The reporter speaker went on to detail the specific meaning today of the development of party activity on the political basis defined by the 23d congress.

1--Struggling for peace and affirming our internationalist solidarity. "This concerns the two preoccupations which constitute the foundations of our strategy. The congress documents are clear in this regard," Charles Fiterman emphasized.

"This orientation is the basis of the current development of our international activity and of Georges Marchais' various journeys recently. It is not a matter of copying what is done elsewhere, of alining ourselves on whomever it may be or on masking the divergences which can exist. But the respect of differences and the statement of divergences cannot blur the need to act on all the great common objectives. In this spirit the recent Berlinguer-Marchais meeting was accomplished, as is reflected in the joint communique. Thus our adversaries glossed over it because it did not enter into the caricature of our policy that they are trying to impose. In the same spirit the Moscow meeting is taking place.

"In the forthcoming period our party is resolved to take by itself or to participate in any initiative aiding the progress of the peoples' struggle for peace, for independence and for a new world economic order, and to contribute to the rallying of forces acting in this direction, notably on the deployment of U.S. nuclear missiles in Europe.

"It is appropriate to make our policy widely known on these current issues of the day."

L'HUMANITE REJECTS PETITION FOR EXTRAORDINARY PCP CONGRESS

LD171235 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 12 Jan 80 p 4 LD

[Unattributed commentary: "An Illiminating Petition"]

[Text] A few PCP members and a few noncommunists have published the text of a petition criticizing fundamental aspects of the party's policy and drawing a crude caricature of this policy by demanding "an extraordinary PCP congress which could finally set about stamping out Stalinism in France."

It should first be pointed out that the Communists themselves determine the party's internal rules and its policy.

Nonetheless the test has the merit of explaining the intentions of the party members who signed it and who are used to attacks on the party's policies and leadership. Indeed since the 23d congress they have taken care to quote this congress as their authority. However, demanding a new congress can only mean a desire to destroy the policy and decisions democratically drawn up and adopted less than 1 year ago by the 23d congress.

It goes without saying that the Communists will regard this move as unacceptable in its content and form. They have clearly and democratically expressed a will and taken decisions valid for the whole party and applicable by all members. It is not for a handful of people to assume the excessive right of calling them into question. The fact that they have chosen to exert pressure from outside the party by drawing support from the major media channels at the very time that the discussion forum opened in L'HUMANITE to prepare for the next National Council meeting is expressing the implementation of the new democratic provisions adopted by the 23d congress, merely stresses their real objective.

This is decidedly an illuminating petition.

PCI'S TORTORELLA SPEAKS TO PARLIAMENT ON FOREIGN POLICY

LD171655 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 10 Jan 80 pp 1, 17 LD

["F.Pe." report on PCI Directorate member Aldo Tortorella 9 January lower house speech: "Europe and Crisis of Detente"]

[Excerpts] Rome--The essential requirement is to resume the path of negotiation and detente to smash a spiral which is dramatically threatening peace. Along this path it is also possible to secure the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. This, among other things, is what Comrade Also Tortorella said in his speech to the lower house yesterday during the debate following questions and interpellations addressed to the government by all the parliamentary groups in connection with the Iranian and Afghan events.

In the absence of Prime Minister Cossiga and since Foreign Minister Malfatti is apparently still convalescing, the government was represented by Minister Sarti. Thus a further opportunity--sought by many parties including the PCI--was missed for an open discussion on the dramatic nature of the international situation and the role which Italy, during its turn of duty as EC chairman, could play within the framework of efforts designed to recreate an atmosphere of trust in international relations. The debate failed to reflect in full the present situation in East-West relations and in some of the speeches, and especially [Christian Democratic] Deputy Forlani's, there was a reemergence of worrying tones revealing a tendency to lapse back into the logic of blocs.

In the opinion of Forlani, whose speech was quoted at length by the government's representative, it was a foregone conclusion that international relations would deteriorate and--even more seriously--the "fatuous optimism" that emerged after the Guadaloupe summit was incomprehensible. The polemical reference to Bonn and Paris was obvious, as was the veiled attack on those aiming to develop the policy of detente and dialog. Sarti followed the same pattern in his statement, asserting that Italy's policy must develop independently of "any unrealistic attitudes."

In his reply, Comrade Tortorella announced his dissatisfaction, above all with the absence of an answer to the calls from the PCI and other political forces for an autonomous initiative from Italy and Europe aimed at creating the preconditions for a reversal of the trend in the dangerous regressive spiral which the policy of detente and peace has suffered in recent weeks.

Tortorella also analyzed the events which have led to the aggravation of the international situation, confirming the guilty verdict behind "the PCI's disapproval and censure regarding the Soviet intervention, as a violation of another state's sovereignty."

In this connection Tortorella added: "Precisely because we are firmly attached to socialist ideals and precisely because we have not in any way abandoned our Marxist inspiration, we reasserted at our congress that there can be no justification for violating any state's autonomy and sovereignty, and we are now adopting our present consistent stance: It is from the PCI's cultural and political tradition that we have learned to fight for the peoples' independence, freedom and self-determination."

Tortorella also denounced the "hypocricy" of many statements on the Afghan events, recalling the varying attitudes adopted by the same states on several foreign interventions (he cited the cases of Uganda and Central Africa).

"This is hypocricy," he stressed, "since one cannot establish the principle of the legitimacy of foreign intervention against a regime in some cases and by some people and not in other cases by other people." Furthermore, with reference to the causes which have led to the aggravation of the situation, Tortorella stressed that there was no alarmism in the stance of those who, in connection with the proposal to deploy new missiles in Europe, were asking for a moratorim and other steps along the path of dialog and negotiation from NATO. That alarm, he added, stemmed precisely from the need to reestablish contacts to avoid further aggravating an already very grave atmosphere, to avoid causing any further irremediable damage.

Naturally, he continued, unlike certain other people, we did not and still do not underestimate the gravity of what was happening in Afghanistan under the [Amin] presidency which ended with the previous head of state's [i.e., Amin] death. Nor have we drawn a merciful veil over the terrible events in Kampuchea under Pol Pot's domination. Nevertheless, a problem remains. Though it is true that the Kabul regime emerged from the bloodshed of a conspiracy within the previous coup regime, even though the regime unleashed large-scale repression both inside and outside the governing party itself, thus prompting multifarious reactions, and even though it is possible that the guerrilla fighting which was already going on was receiving aid from other countries, there can be no justification for the Soviet military intervention. Indeed, if such a situation could occur within groups which sought to create a progressive and antifeudal regime, the very difficult--and indeed impossible--aim was to establish a new system of gaining military and political power without the support of the vast majority of the people: The peoples' liberation can only be carried out by the peoples themselves.

Next Tortorella analyzed the hazards of a policy designed to encircle the USSR and expel it from the Middle East, stressing also the major powers' exhausting rivalry and confrontation to avoid losing, or to gain, areas of influence. In this connection he stressed that "in the absence of a development of mutual trust, the unadulterated logic of power has gradually prevailed to an extreme extent." Hence the dangers of an insane rearmament race and the need to reject the policy of retailiations which could lead--as has happened in the past--to the exacerbation of the economic conditions of the USSR and at the same time of Western Europe. Hence the need to continue along the path of dialog and negotiation, as France and the FRG have shown they want to do.

L'UNITA VIEWS HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF AFGHAN EVENTS

LD171605 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 13 Jan 80 pp 1, 16 LD]

[Giuseppe Boffa article: "What Intervention in Kabul Reveals"]

[Text] Having expressed our firm principled condemnation of the Soviet Army's intervention in Afghanistan, it is opportune to reflect at greater length on the origins and implications of such alarming events. In this connection we will have to recall certain more distant precedents.

When in November-December 1955 Khrushchev and Bulganin, who were at the time CPSU first secretary and prime minister, respectively, made their famous visit to Asia--the first ever by such high-level Soviet leaders--Afghanistan was, together with India and Burma, one of the three countries visited. Khrushchev's and Bulganin's visit understandably had wide repercussions. It was the most evident manifestation of the new policy through which the USSR was forging links with the world of emergent states--the "Third World," as it was beginning to be called--which refused to remain imprisoned by the counterposed blocs: a great policy which yielded fruitful results to Soviet diplomacy since it helped very considerably to bring about a crisis in the cold war schemes to which the USSR had fallen victim.

It was no surprise that Afghanistan was one of the stopping points on the two Soviet leaders' tour. While India and Burma were newly independent countries, Afghanistan, which had on the other hand been independent for some time, already had a long history of relations with the USSR--a history which in fact began with events and figures from the distant revolutionary years, which now seem almost legendary, Afghanistan having been the first country to establish diplomatic links with Moscow in the terrible and "unforgettable" year of 1919. Later relations between the governments experienced some difficult moments, but these were surmounted. From 1955 onward cooperation was increasingly intensified, both in economic exchanges and technological aid, and in military supplies and in political consultations. Despite the major differences in the level of development and their internal systems, Afghanistan was therefore--even among the nonalined countries--one of the places where the USSR could assert its presence and authority.

This entire framework has been overthrown by the recent events. As far as we can tell, both local motives and broader international motives lie behind them. We will start with the former. Even now, 18 months later, it is difficult for us to form an assessment of the April 1978 politicomilitary coup (certainly no revolution) which brought to power in Kabul a leftwing political group, which was rather young (it had only been in existence 14 years) and had never previously been known for any particularly political prominence. Even now, among other things, it is not clear--since it was never clarified by those concerned--from which social forces actually present in Afghan society the new regime expected support. Nor has it ever been indicated how it planned to organize support for its democratic and progressive aims, such as agrarian reform, in a country where the conditions for such transformations had no precedent at all.

One point, however, was quite clear. The new Afghan regime was linked both politically and militarily to the USSR much more closely and directly than ever before. Nevertheless, it also became clear very soon that neither the new government nor its Soviet allies were able, despite the many important political instruments at their disposal, to control the new course of events, with regard both to the internal clashes among the authors of the coup and to the nationalist and religious rebellions which this caused. Thus began the "escalation" in the USSR's blatant intervention in Afghan affairs which has now culminated in the dispatch of a massive expeditionary force. In this connection it is worth citing the PCI Directorate's verdict when it spoke of a grave "violation of the principles of national independence and sovereignty."

However, there is also an international aspect to the issue. We will certainly not be the ones to ignore it. We are very well aware--having written so many times in this paper--that the crisis of detente did not begin in Kabul. We have always pointed to and condemned the new thrusts which have for some time been felt toward a return to the cold war--thrusts stemming from various sides, the latest and most serious of which was the Euromissiles campaign in Europe. But can the armed intervention in Afghanistan therefore be considered merely a response? And even if it were so, what kind of response would it be. At this stage, it would not be a bad thing to return to 1955.

At that time the cold war was still a reality. Let us remember: Germany's rearmament had just been decided; U.S. policy was directed by Foster Dulles, who wanted to make communism retreat; the United States was beginning to install itself in Vietnam. If we look at the Middle East region which now seems most inflamed, Iran had just fallen into U.S. hands following Mossadeq's violent ouster. The USSR, it is true, had China on its side, while China is now opposed to it. But it was also vastly weaker than it is now. What then, under those circumstances, was the major Soviet initiative which breathed new life into world politics and which eventually proved successful?

Khrushchev's and Bulganin's visit was, we repeat, merely one episode in this initiative. But it was a very illuminating episode. It was part of a new diplomatic course designed to smash the very logic of cold war, the logic which even Stalinist USSR had accepted until shortly before that time. While previously each of the two world camps had tended to entrench itself and consider any outsider an enemy, there emerged from Moscow at that time a pointer to something new: Peace could be, and had to be, built by different forces, whose contribution would be valuable precisely because of their diversity and orginality. Hence the new assessment of and increased dialog with neutral and nonalined countries. Soon it was said that the same principles applied to socialism, as well as to peace. It was a policy of a great opening up to the world, which owed its success to these very characteristics. Even in more recent years all the Soviet initiatives which have yielded the most important results, up to the Helsinki Conference, were the ones which proved capable of the same approach--a view of coexistence which was not reduced to a dialog between the major powers, which was, nevertheless, considered an essential element, and which neither underestimated nor obscured the independence, initiative and contribution of every people as the necessary foundations for general peace.

This is an approach which we have found lacking in the way in which the USSR and its allies have responded to the recent renewed cold war offensive. Within this framework, the intervention in Afghanistan, with the characteristics highlighted by our party Directorate, seems even more worrying. Even in the forties and fifties cold war actions and measures from one side were countered by cold war actions and measures from the other. This not only led us several times to the brink of outright war, but the socialist bloc itself eventually experienced a grave crisis, from which it emerged only through the detente policy. Nor could it have been otherwise, because that spiral nullified the energies and aspirations of the peoples, of regenerative social forces and democratic movements wanting to make their voice heard.

We must oppose a reemergence of such a logic, with the strength of our past and present experience. But this must not be a motive for reflection and action for ourselves only. This is why we are addressing the other political forces in Italy and Europe, in particular, but not only in Europe.

PSI LEFT CHALLENGES CRAXI IN CENTRAL COMMITTEE ASSEMBLY

[Excerpt] Rome, January 18 (ANSA)--Some sort of settlement is expected today for the battle underway in the ranks of the Socialist Party leadership between Secretary Bettino Craxi and the party's left factions as the Central Committee assembly, scheduled to wind up yesterday, moves into its fourth day.

On one side of the split, Craxi is calling for keeping Premier Francesco Cossiga's minority coalition alive while awaiting the outcome of the Christian Democrat national congress slated for early next month. His party's left, on the other side, is pushing for the immediate formation of an emergency government with direct Communist Party participation.

To head off the need for convening an extraordinary national congress, unwanted by the left as well, the Central Committee agreed yesterday to set up a special policy commission to seek out a compromise and, in the words of the author of the proposal, Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile, "to evaluate the respons the Central Committee can give to what the nation expects from the Socialist Party."

The prevailing opinion at the end of yesterday's meeting was that it should not be too difficult to negotiate an accord for party problems--along the lines of proposals to create a body with executive powers to work with the Secretariat, the restructurization of the Central Committee and the naming of a new managing editor for the party organ L'AVANTI. It appears extremely difficult, however, according to some spokesmen, to work out an understanding on party policy. Heeding the request of the left, they said, would mean the immediate withdrawal of Socialist support (abstention in Parliament) from Cossiga's government and the opening of a government crisis in the near future.

GOVERNMENT TO REASSESS RELATIONS WITH USSR

LD172325 [Editorial Report LD] Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese at 1930 GMT on 17 January carries a live relay from the legislative assembly in which Prime Miniser Sa Carneiro addresses the house at the end of the debate of the government's program. He dismisses opposition references to his government as a "threat" and "a catastrophe looming over the country, likely to call into question democracy, the Constitution and the institutional rapport between the various institutional organs of sovereignty," and also dismisses charges of "subversion of Portuguese democracy." Describing his government as a government of "national majority," Sa Carneiro says that any alleged fears or charges on the part of the opposition are unfounded and that all they have to do therefore is "let the institutions function" as they are the legitimate expression of the people's will.

Regarding the news media, the prime minister says the government feels the role of the media in society is that of an independent power that must be guided by criteria of truth and of service to society, and must be judged in freedom by press professionals."

Describing the present international situation as "worrisome," Sa Carneiro says that "with this government, the country will not collaborate in the creation of a situation similar to the one prevailing before the outbreak of World War II, in which each one sought to bury his head in the sand in order not to see the dangers which were then arising." He adds: "We will not condone the atmosphere of ignorance of the realities, and hegemonism of the Soviet Union, well evidenced in the invasion of Afghanistan."

On the same topic the prime minister says: "The government will not falter before any specific measures capable of clearly showing Portugal's repudiation for the Soviet Union's aggression. The government will revise all its exisiting policy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union so as to make it clear that, although maintaining the principle of relations with all countries, it will not treat as its preferential allies or as its friends those powers which internationally behave like this. There will thus be a reassessment of all our exiting relations with the Soviet Union as well as with other countries of the Warsaw Pact, as the foreign minister here announced earlier. The government adopted this stance in this case--as it will continue to do in the future--without consulting other countries, without placing itself within the framework of any overall policy--it acted on its own, on its own responsibility, particularly on the responsibility of the prime minister and the minister of foreign affairs. The government will study and accept, if it considers it appropriate, the decisions taken by international organizations which, acting in concert, are likely to decide on the adoption of positions of dissociation or condemnation vis-a-vis this grave event. By these organizations, I mean those like NATO and the EEC, although we are not yet members."

Concluding his speech by stating that the opposition's prophecies of doom will not materialize, Sa Carneiro says the government will pursue a policy which will seek not the specific benefit of any of the political forces that comprise the Democratic Alliance but rather the well-being of the entire Portuguese nation.

PCP, PS MOTIONS TO REJECT GOVERNMENT PROGRAM DEFEATED

Communist Motion

LD162354 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 16 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] The Assembly of the Republic continued the debate on the program of the sixth government today. During this afternoon's session, Carlos Brito, parliamentary leader of the Portuguese Communist Party, submitted his party's motion rejecting the government program. The motion is preceeded by five considerations. We will read some of them:

Considering that the government program contains an unconstitutional plan for the liquidation of the great democratic transformation achieved following the 25 April Revolution;

Considering that if the government program is implemented it will lead to worsened and increased exploitation and oppression of the workers, to increased unemployment, to rising prices, to a lowering of real wages and to a worsening of the economic crisis;

Considering that the program will lead to increased foreign dependence and advocates a policy of submission [word indistinct] alinement by Portugal;

The parliamentary group of the Communist Party hereby submits the following rejection motion:

The Assembly of the Republic rejects the program of the government.

This motion, together with the one submitted by the Socialist Party, will be voted on late tomorrow afternoon or early tomorrow evening.

PCE'S AZCARATE VIEWS TENSE WORLD SITUATION

LD161641 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 11 Jan 80 p 7 LD

[PCE Executive Committee member Manuel Azcarate article: "Smashing the Spiral of Tension"]

[Text] The 3 January PCE Executive Committee Standing Committee declaration states quite clearly that the Soviet troops' entry into Afghanistan not only violates the principles of sovereignty and independence, but also "contributes to making international relations more tense, thus creating new threats to world peace."

We are indeed now witnessing a deterioration of the international situation as a whole, not only in the areas close to Afghanistan but also in other areas of the world.

And for this very reason I consider it very important to distinguish between the two lines and two attitudes which have been taking shape in various political circles, within the framework of a very general condemnation of the Soviet Union's military intervention.

First, there is the attitude of the United States, or perhaps more accurately of Carter, since presidential candidate Kennedy is disassociating himself from it on certain important points. This U.S. attitude is clearly designed to take advantage of the present situation to accentuate the military confrontation between the blocs, to go back on a series of positive steps taken on the road to detente and to provoke a kind of relapse into the cold war. It must be remembered that the United States did not await events in Afghanistan to start moves in this direction. In particular, the pressure exerted within NATO on the European countries to force them to accept medium-range nuclear missiles was clearly a step away from detente, a thrust toward the arms race.

Now President Carter decides to stop the ratification of the SALT II accords. It is not easy to fully assess the gravity of a decision of this kind because the SALT II accords, without actually involving nuclear arms reduction, do stipulate their limitation and control and are, at the same time, a step toward further negotiations to put a stop to the frightening accumulation of nuclear weapons which is taking place in the world. The failure to ratify SALT II opens the door to a kind of weapon which can already destroy the whole of mankind 4-5 times over. Other measures adopted by the U.S. administration are in the direction of strengthening U.S. military presence in the Indian Ocean, the Persian Gulf and the Middle East and therefore of extending the military confrontation between the blocs. Obviously, this path will lead us to a spiral of tension whose consequences are unpredictable.

There is talk of a "return to the cold war." But we must take care to note that it would not be merely a return to the already lamentable situation of the fifties. The stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction in various parts of the world are infinitely greater now than they were then. The dangers are much greater. It would not be a return to the past, but an advance toward a threatening future.

Indeed, both in U.S. policy and the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan we see the tendency toward moving away from a more or less detente-oriented bipolarity to a bellicose bipolarity in which military factors are placed in the forefront of international life. The interests of the peoples and the interests of peace and mankind's survival demand that things move in a diametrically opposite direction.

We note that among the many condemnation and criticisms of the Soviet intervention there is a very broad range of stances advocating not a return to tension and an accentuation of rearmament but an attempt, precisely on account of the crisis which we are experiencing, to find paths which will enable us to achieve a more stable, more secure international situation less dependent on the interplay of the superpowers' bipolarity.

In this connection the stances adopted by several countries of the nonalined movement in the UN debates have been very valuable. One factor which could be very important is the new political situation which seems likely in India--one of the most highly populated countries in the world--following Indira Gandhi's election victory. She has clearly stated both her disapproval of the Soviet attitude in Afghanistan and her rejection of President Carter's stance.

Perhaps the most profound difference between the world situation at the start of the eighties and the situation in the fifties lies in the weight and influence of the nonalined movement and the Third World, composed mainly of peoples who were formerly slaves and who are now increasingly determined to be independent and masters of their own destinies and resources.

Within this framework, China could obviously play a very major role if it manages to place itself within this perspective. And it is not superfluous to recall the vision, part of Zhou Enlai's great political talent, which enabled the nascent PRC to become a decisive factor in the upsurge of this broad Third World movement. One must not close one's eyes to news which indicates the Chinese Government's orientation toward military factors and the rapprochement with the United States in this field. We believe that China's possible contribution to a new international order lies in a different direction.

As part of the European workers and revolutionary movement, we cannot restrict ourselves to noting the existence of broad tendencies in the world which want to emerge from the present crisis along new paths and not through a return to a bipolar cold war system.

Western Europe has its own role to play at this crossroads, if it manages to reject the inertia of submission to past schemes. What objectives can realistically be achieved in a situation such as the present, to smash the spiral of tensions which is threatening us?

First, on the basis of the reestablishment of the UN principles and obviously the Soviet troops' withdrawal from Afghanistan, military de-escalation measures which will at least permit the creation of an atmosphere which will make specific negotiations on the most burning issues possible.

One central issue will undoubtedly be a new approach to the European security problem, guaranteeing the military balance between the blocs, though not on the basis of a correlative increase in weapons--especially nuclear weapons--but rather on the basis of a balance centering on the reduction of both nuclear and conventional weapons. At the same time, the problem of normalized relations which will facilitate the development of economic and cultural relations and the return to an atmosphere of detente in all spheres is another essential concern. In this connection, the confrontation in foreign relations among the various systems existing in the world must be decreasingly of a military nature and must be increasingly transferred to other areas of social life.

At certain moments in history the existence of a very grave situation has helped to introduce new possibilities and provide new solutions. In my opinion, this is such a moment. Therefore, Eurocommunism's role, far from diminishing, is growing: Eurocommunist ideas must help West European workers and progressive forces to perform an active, dynamic role of initiative and struggle to smash the spiral of tension and open the way to cooperation, security and peace.

We Spaniards have a special responsibility in this regard. In 11 months' time the CSCE meeting will be taking place in Madrid. This meeting is now more important than ever. And the preparatory measures to insure that it yields positive fruit are not tasks for tomorrow. They must be tackled now.

PSOE'S GUERRA AGAINST NATO MEMBERSHIP, U.S. BASES IN SPAIN

LD171621 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 13 Jan 80 p 13 LD

[Ramon Vilaro dispatch: "United States Should Moderate Its Enthusiasm for Spain's Joining NATO"]

[Text] Washington--"I believe that it is necessary to take advantage of the entire current international political situation to curb U.S. enthusiasm for Spain's entry into NATO," Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Deputy Secretary General Alfonso Guerra has stated during his visit to Washington, where he is heading a delegation of his party, which has been invited by the State Department to hold several contacts with personalities of President Jimmy Carter's administration. Guerra expressed the opinion that the visit which Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez will make to the U.S. capital tomorrow, Monday, will center around the NATO issue, especially following the policy stance of the FRG, which is apparently seeking to distance itself slightly from U.S. military strategy in order to prevent the United States- USSR conflict currently in the area of Central Asia, from spreading toward Europe.

"Another factor which necessitates complete silence on the matter of Spain and NATO is the coming CSCE conference in Madrid in the fall," Mr Guerra added. This means that, despite the Union of the Democratic Center's pro-NATO stance, Spain should make an attempt to "freeze" the issue of its possible entry into NATO until afterward, not forgetting, Guerra stated, that the final solution which will be initiated by the debate in Spain in favor or against joining NATO will depend on the renegotiation of the treaty of friendship and cooperation between Spain and the United States, "talks on which should be started immediately," according to the PSOE deputy secretary general.

Guerra declared himself personally in favor of "the complete cancellation of the agreement and the removal of all U.S. military bases in Spain." He pointed out that in any case the renegotiation of the Spanish-U.S. treaty will be the first to take place with a democratic parliament in Spain. According to Guerra, the problem of the now denuclearized bases "is that they could fill them again in half an hour."

Guerra mentioned the possibility of a change of stance by Washington with respect to the Palestinian problem and pointed out that, despite the support for Morocco, future negotiations concerning the West Sahara conflict are not ruled out.

However, he confirmed that U.S. political circles are unwilling to accept the PSOE's arguments against Spain's entry into NATO. They point out the danger constituted for Spanish and West European security by Spain's absence from the Atlantic alliance in the event of conflict with the Warsaw Pact forces.

Alfonso Guerra stated that he would not like the coincidence of Prime Minister Suarez' lightning visit with the presence of a PSOE delegation "to harm Spanish national interests in a policy of moderation regarding the issue of Spain and NATO."

MINISTERS DENY 'ABNORMAL' ACTIVITY ON USSR BORDER

LD171511 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 12 Jan 80 p 8 LD

[Unattributed report: "Nothing Abnormal Along Our Border With USSR"]

[Text] Both Foreign Minister Knut Erydenlund and Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg stated categorically yesterday that there is absolutely no basis for Soviet allegations of intensified Norwegian activity along the border with the Soviet Union. The foreign minister also said that for its part Norway has noted no alien activity around the country. Frydenlund stressed that there is no cause for anxiety. He also maintained that Norwegian military readiness is generally good.

Against the backdrop of a report Thursday from the official Soviet news agency TASS, which contained strong allegations of unfriendly Norwegian acts vis-a-vis the Soviet Union, the foreign minister yesterday morning summoned a representative of the Soviet Embassy in Oslo to clarify the actual circumstances.

The TASS report, which was based on a UPI interview with an assistant from the armed forces High Command press section, stated erroneously that Norwegian forces were consolidating a position along the border with the Soviet Union. The mistake is said to have occurred in UPI's news editorial office and immediately became the premise for the unusually sharp TASS commentary.

Yesterday Defense Minister Stoltenberg told Norwegian Broadcasting Corporation news that Norwegian military activity is entirely normal. He added that one of the reassuring factors of our time is that there is now the capability and technology to observe quite well what is happening on both sides of the border. Stoltenberg said that he was convinced that the Soviet Union will soon be aware that nothing has been done on the Norwegian side to occasion such a reaction.

Last night Foreign Minister Frydenlund told the "Daily Review" program that Norway has not received any form of official reaction from the Soviet Union on this matter.

Asked about the government's policy on the question of reactions to the Soviet entry into Afghanistan, he said that the government primarily believes that reactions ought to take place in the United Nations and following consultation with NATO. He stressed that the entry can by no means be excused and that there has to be a reaction. But Frydenlund stressed that the reaction must communicate the idea that it does not pay to intervene militarily, but we would prefer to avoid a return to the days of the cold war.

"We urge both the government and the trade union movement in Norway to be cautious in making decisions which might exacerbate the situation and jeopardize peace," the Executive of the Norwegian Laborers Association said in a statement on the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

It states: "The association's Executive wants to stress particularly the importance of Norwegian trade union members' consolidating their international relations in order to work with their fellow trade unionists in all countries for disarmament and so that war may become an obsolete method of resolving international conflicts."

THATCHER WANTS OLYMPICS MOVED FROM MOSCOW

LD172047 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1843 GMT 17 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The government wants the Olympic games moved from Moscow, the prime minister said today. Mrs Thatcher told the Commons that Britain's only chance of achieving this was by a concerted approach with her allies to the International Olympic Committee [IOC]. She added later that the government was already discussing the possibility of switching the Olympic venue with Britain's major international partners.

But a spokesman for the IOC in Switzerland knocked the idea flat, saying: "We cannot even consider moving the games".

Sir Denis Follows, chairman of the British Olympic Association [BOA] also attacked political "interference", and said: "I don't think this suggestion can have been examined in detail".

Mrs Thatcher had told MPs that the Cabinet discussed the matter early today. "We cannot just stand back and see Russia do what they have done in Afghanistan--deplore it, and take no action at all." No country could get the games moved alone, she said, so there had to be a concerted approach to the IOC "in whose lap the decision will lie".

Asked by Labour MP Mr Willie Hamilton if she would refuse Prince Philip permission to go to Moscow if this move failed she said she was not prepared to give undertakings at the moment.

Former Olympic athlete Mr Terence Higgins, Tory MP for Worthing, called on the prime minister to give an assurance that Britain would hold "full consultation" before taking any definite line on whether to boycott the Olympics.

Mrs Thatcher said she was "very much aware" of the view of those who had trained for a number of years so they reached their peak performance at the time of the Olympics. "We have to take that into account. That is why the government believes it would be right to move the venue away from Moscow".

But the response from the sporting world was a definite thumbs down. The IOC spokesman dismissed moving the games and added: "There have also been suggestions that they might be postponed [words indistinct]."

"I'm dealing not with governments, but with national Olympic committees".

Sir Denis Follows said it was too late to move the games. "I agree with Lord Killanin, president of the International Olympic Committee--at this stage it's Moscow or nowhere." the games would "go ahead in Moscow in any event", he said. "Politicians have a habit of interfering in everything whether they really know very much about it or not. As far as I'm aware, no member of her majesty's government has spoken to any official of the British Olympic Association. We've had no formal approaches from anyone."

A BOA official involved in preparations for the games added that the suggestion they should be switched was "totally impractical."

"Between now and the scheduled date of the games I don't think such a move is possible, especially when you consider you are talking about 21 sports. Montreal may well have the stadium, but when you start to think about all the other arrangements--like training facilities and accommodation--it's just not on."

The IOC had a contract with the organising committee in Moscow to stage the games in Russia. To break it would have serious legal and financial implications.

ROYAL NAVAL FORCE TO FILL VACUUM IN MEDITERRANEAN

LD172212 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1957 GMT 17 Jan 80 LD

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Text] A hastily-assembled Royal Navy task force was tonight heading for the Mediterranean in a bold gesture of British support for President Carter's Middle East policies.

Although, officially, the warships--an amphibious warfare ship, three frigates and two support ships--are on training duties, it is understood they will replace the U.S. Navy's Nimitz group now being deployed by Washington to the Gulf region.

The missile frigates HMS Cleopatra, Amazon and Avenger, and supply ships Fort Grange and Grey Rover, left Plymouth on Monday en route for Gibealtar before entering the Mediterranean. It was originally planned to deploy them in the Caribbean, but they were diverted at a late stage, it is understood.

Meanwhile, the assault ship HMS Intrepid was in mid-Atlantic heading back to Plymouth from a training cruise with young officers from the Royal Naval College at Dartmouth on board. But Intrepid, which can carry five Wessex helicopters and four landing craft, was also diverted to the Mediterranean.

Officially, the task group is on training duties and will pay courtesy visits to a number of ports. But it is understood that their presence in the Mediterranean "will maintain the level of Western forces in the area" in the absence of the Americans.

DAILY TELEGRAPH VIEWS TONE OF WEST IN WAKE OF AFGHANISTAN

[R.C.H. Steed article]

[Text] Whether European NATO countries will give President Carter better back-up after the exhortations of his emissary Mr Christopher remains to be seen. So far most of them with the notable exception of Britain have tended to treat his "worse crisis since World War II" warning as rather exaggerated rhetoric. Yet it does not need much arm-chair, saloon bar, biertisch [beer table] or cafe-terrace strategy to show that the Russians seem hell-bent for the Gulf oil and that only an American threat of nuclear war, with all its awful risks of miscalculation could stop them.

Nor does it need much political acumen to see that, if Russia were to succeed she would put Europe back into the stone age, herself on top of the world, and her local equivalents of Mr Karmal, Mr Giereck or Herr Honecker in high office over an increasingly wide area of the globe.

In another direction, too, Mr Carter faced unpleasant facts in admitting that he had been deceived and had been taken for a sucker by the Russians over the previous nearly three years of his presidency. So much for his part in what to less starry-eyed practitioners was obviously a bogus and one-sided "detente" which has now duly landed the West in its present predicament. Yet the Europeans have been involved in it much longer and deeper.

Now Mr Carter, after a rude awakening, is creditably making the most of such military, diplomatic and economic cards as he possess. He is offering real leadership, launching out almost every few days into ever bigger arms programmes and putting "detente" into very cold storage.

Yet Europeans do not on the whole seem over-eager to risk really annoying the Russians by backing up Mr Carter in his efforts for the common good to the extent that he and the American people have a right to expect. Despite a patchy but perhaps just about tolerable show of solidarity by governments, the majority opinion is probably that expressed by Herr Brandt: "Afghanistan shows that we need more detente, not less."

Why this failure to rise to the occasion? To a large extent, no doubt, it is one of the results which the Russians aimed at achieving by launching their attack on Afghanistan during the Christmas holidays. The main shock was absorbed in a festive haze.

Parliaments were on Christmas holiday. This enabled European governments, overwhelmingly either social democrat or mish-mash coalitions with strong pacifist elements, to play it all rather cool.

Germany, the strongest European NATO member and the staunchest among the continentals, lives like the rest of them in continual awareness or the Warsaw Pact's military superiority on her borders. She is in many ways inhibited by her dependence on Russian for "alleviations" for her kinsmen in East Germany.

The October elections in Germany will be of crucial importance. If Herr Schmidt wins, then foreign and defence policy, and especially the increasingly dubious Ostpolitik, will be in growing measure influenced by his Social Democrat Party's left wing.

A Christian Democrat victory under Herr Strauss would avert this danger. The result would be a firmer and more dependable course more in tune with the new and robust line now being followed by Mr Carter.

France is clearly determined to discharge her commitments to the West in her own indivualistic way. So Britain, with her strong Conservative government, stands out as a shining example.

Europe's quiescence may in part be explained by the erosion of the healthy patriotic instinct for survival as a result of the debilitating effects of the consumerist welfare state. This does not mean to say that the apparent decline in national morale could not be reversed under challenge and given strong leadership.

Yet the root cause of trouble is the corroding effect of decades of systematic class warfare. The headquarters for this are of course in Moscow, whence for over 60 years an unceasing campaign of propaganda, subversion and terrorism has been conduct throughout the world.

It cannot be sufficiently emphasised that this arm of Soviet imperialism is in every way as dangerous as the Red Army, with whose plans it is closely synchronised. The groups, parties and "fronts" through which it works everywhere in the political, industrial and other arenas are legion.

So far as the communist parties proper are concerned, that in France, throwing aside the remains of Euro-Communist camouflage, is ostentatiously backing Russia over Afghanistan. The Italian party, with an eye to public opinion, has roundly condemned Moscow's latest aggression. Yet internally, it prevents stable government in Italy, and in a showdown its gut loyalty would lie with the "great home of the October Revolution."

The strike scene in Britain, which is particularly disturbing at the present time of international crisis, is largely a manifestation of class warfare fomented over a long period by communists and associated left-wingers. The IRA's links with Moscow's international terrorist network are well known.

The affinities of Europe's socialist parties and associated trade unions with Russia and communism are real, yet v ied and ambivalent. They usually express strong condemnation of Russia's major crimes--yet often with a balancing side-swipe at American "imperialism."

All this has a crucial bearing on European morale in an East-West confrontation. This is particularly so in view of the traditional claim of all leftist parties to a monopoly of peace and all its works. Even Russia's "peace fronts" continue to achieve a considerable milage. How much more appealing are the efforts of the various types of socialist parties!

Russia's "detente" trap lured Europeans, increasingly frightened yet unwilling to pay for adequate defence, to seek safety in what is euphemistically called "arms control." Under this cover the Russians pile up their own arms while keeping the West stringing hopefully along or even running down. The socialists provide their historic band-wagon for this downhill plunge to disaster and others, eager to win easy popularity, climb aboard.

The stronger the Russians become the more blatantly do they use intimidation against their European "arms control" partners, who react by even more desperately and vainly seeking safety in more of the same at the hands of the predator.

Mr Brezhnev, with help over a wide front from the European left, has already prevented the deployment by NATO of the neutron weapon. He is now threatening dire consequences if NATO proceeds with plans to deploy, in three or four years' time, a modest number of Pershing IIs and cruises in reply to his existing and growing far greater array of much more powerful SS 20s and Backfires.

Mr Carter was able painfully to scrape together a quorum of European acceptance for the future new weapons. But he achieved this only on strict conditions that, in "arms control" negotiations with the Russians, efforts would be made to get reductions on their side that would enable NATO to deploy only a reduced number of weapons or perhaps none at all.

There is no sign at all of Russian reciprocation. This issue will be a crucial test of European morale under increasing Russian threats.

The West, while always prepared to negotiate, must now in all conscience do so in full awareness of Russian aims and methods and with a firm determination to protect its own vital interests. Above all, it must be prepared to act unitedly and to spend whatever is necessary to restore a global defence capability sufficient to meet the greatly increased demands of the present and the foreseeable future.

In addition, the West must take full account of the many built-in weaknesses, especially economic, social and political, which are increasingly afflicting Russia and her recalcitrant satellite empire, and exploit them to the full.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DEBATES RAPPROCHEMENT

NC180829 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 18 Jan 80 p 1 NC

[Text] The government's goodwill measures towards Turkish Cypriots did not go far enough, AKEL deputy leader, Mr A. Fandis, said yesterday in the House of Representatives during the resumed debate on the question of rapprochement with the Turkish Cypriots. But the socialist EDEK party leader, Dr Vasos Lissaridhis, had serious misgivings about the way the offer was made and wanted the offer to bypass the Turkish Cypriot administration.

Mr Fandis in his speech said that whilst the announcement of the measures was welcomed, it was somewhat belated and did not go far enough. The president could have been "more decisive", he said. The president could, for example, propose the operation of the industrial units at Mia Milea industrial estate under UN supervision so that both Greek and Turkish workers could find employment. Operating these units would be of mutual benefit because since these units are kept idle, property worth millions of pounds is being progressively worn out. If this continues the loss would become irreparable, the spokesman said.

Moreover, he urged the government and the president to work out, with the aid of parties and organisations and perhaps special advisers, a comprehensive plan in which all these measures could be integrated. In addition Mr Fandis said that the government should back its financial measures with bold political offers, such as the preparation of a draft constitution that would spell out the Greek Cypriot ideas for a "biregional federation". Such a move not only helps dispel mistrust among the Turkish Cypriots but also helps the U.N. secretary general in his efforts to reconvene the intercommunal talks, he said.

In his speech, Dr Lissaridhis went back to the time when Turkish Cypriot leaders in a planned way resorted to self-segregation for their community and said that the measures to be taken by government should not be administered in a way that would help the separatist regime. Rapprochement measures are necessary but they must be addressed directly to the Turkish Cypriot citizen and be arranged directly with the Turkish Cypriot citizens.

The Cyprus Government must turn to the Turkish Cypriots as citizens of the republic and do whatever possible for rapprochement but on no account should that be at the expense of the state entity. Such a move would be catastrophic for all Cypriots, including the Turkish working people, Dr Lissaridhis said.

The debate will be continued and concluded at next week's session of the House of Representatives.

HOUSE PRESIDENT MEETS WITH FAMAGUSTA COMMITTEE

NC180932 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 18 Jan 80 p 8 NC

[Text] A delegation of the Famagusta Coordinating Committee met yesterday with House President Al. Mikhailidhis and briefed him on the committee's activities, which aim at adopting the government measures and other moves to thwart the threatened colonization of Famagusta. The delegation also expressed the committee's desire for the immediate resumption of the talks.

Mr Mikhailidhis gave the assurance that the House would continue in its steps toward the parliaments of the UN members and in other directions to foil both the operation of the hotels and the colonization of the Greek sector of Famagusta.

At the same time, Mr Mikhailidhis referred to President Kiprianou's proposals for actual rapprochement with the Turkish Cypriots as well as to Mr Denktas' positive response, and stressed that these proposals created a good climate for the intercommunal talks, the immediate resumption of which was imperative.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN: NO TURKISH-OWNED HOTELS IN 'FREE AREA'

NC172046 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1835 GMT 17 Jan 80 NC

[Excerpt] In answer to a question, the government spokesman said today that there are no hotels belonging to Turkish Cypriots in the free area. He added that there is only a guesthouse in Paphos that belongs to a Turkish Cypriot. The spokesman added that this guesthouse has been rented since 1965 to a Greek Cypriot who today pays rent based on the government decisions on Turkish Cypriot property.

OFFICIAL SOURCE REPLIES TO TURKISH CYPRIOT MINISTER

NC171955 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 17 Jan 80 NC

[Text] An official statement referring to Turkish Cypriot Mr Atakol's comment on Foreign Minister Rolandhis' speech the day before yesterday stresses that the Turkish leadership's misrepresentation of the speech does not help the constructive dialog that constitutes the basic way to the solution of the political problem. The statement adds: With Mr Rolandhis' speech the UN resolutions are not abandoned despite the difficulties in implementing them, but clear reference is made to their meaning and the need for their correct implementation.

The statement also says that in Mr Rolandhis' speech no reference is made to the content of the 1975 agreement. Nor does the speech anywhere mention, directly or indirectly, that the two communities will live in different areas. On the contrary, the statement adds, it mentions a solution that would not oppose our principles and also stresses the importance of all Cypriots paying for a solution that would come from an agreement by the two sides.

O AGON WELCOMES DENKTAS' RESPONSE TO MEASURES

NC170848 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 17 Jan 80 p 2 NC

[From "Our Stand" column: "Denktas' Reaction"]

[Text] It is too risky for one to hastily describe Denktas' reaction to the government's measures for rapprochement as positive or negative. He himself describes his reaction as positive. He says that his side is prepared to have talks with the Greek side for a rapprochement of both communities. He says he agrees to the payment of old-age pensions to eligible Turkish Cypriots. He says he is willing to discuss the question of reintegration. All this, in as much as it shows intention for rapprochement--even though in words only--constitutes a positive reaction.

Yet there are still some negative elements. Denktas did not conceal the fact that by accepting the above or by proposing talks his goal is to implement his plan for evolutionary federation. He also does not conceal the fact that he seeks the "coordination" of the laws of the state with the "laws" of his own regime--that is, almost indirect recognition. These are all negative elements.

In any case, Denktas' offer for talks must be explored. Along with the payment of benefits to those eligible for such, the possibility of having further cooperation without sacrificing basic principles should be examined.

TO VIMA REPORTS ON PAPANDREOU-MCCLOSKEY MEETING

[Text] Yesterday, on his own initiative the U.S. ambassador to Athens, Robert McCloskey, visited the leader of the majority opposition party, Andreas Papandreou, at his home at Kastri. The meeting lasted for one and 1/2 hours and, as announced, the discussion centered on latest international developments.

Also, on the day before yesterday the U.S. ambassador visited Foreign Minister Yeoryios Rallis, whom he briefed--according to yesterday's reports--on the U.S. administration's position on the Afghanistan problem and generally on the sum total of problems in this area of the world, as well as on Washington's concern over the situation in the Balkans following Tito's illness.

Yesterday's meeting between the U.S. ambassador and the leader of the majority opposition party is the second meeting between Papandreou and McCloskey. The first was held exactly one year ago, when once again the U.S. ambassador visited Papandreou at Kastri.

After yesterday's meeting PASOK's press office issued the following statement: "U.S. Ambassador McCloskey paid a visit on his own initiative to the chairman of PASOK at Kastri. Recent international developments were the main topic of discussion." According to agency reports Papandreou and McCloskey also discussed the situation created in Yugoslavia after the decline in Tito's health.

I AVYI CONSIDERS NATO BEHIND DAVOS APPOINTMENT

[Editorial: "The Appointment of Davos to a Ministerial Position"]

[Excerpts] Davos stepped from the command of the National Defense General Staff to the position of deputy minister for national defense in a peculiar and somewhat unorthodox way. From his position as a subordinate to the civil administration, like all military personnel, he became a superior in record time. Could this speedy promotion of Davos be due to his surprizing qualifications or due to other facts and useful experience?

Without being unjust to the man, who is an excellent officer, he does not appear to be as exceptionally gifted to the degree that his retirement could be considered a loss to this long-suffering country; neither was his antidictatorial behavior such that his military career is now crowned with ministerial authority. What is the value of all this? It simply sketches the character of the man.

What is of true and important value, however, is why Davos was judged to be so able and irreplaceable so that he was appointed deputy minister of national defense as soon as he handed in his sword. Nothing was stated about this by the government or by the otherwise extremely voluable dauphin, Averof. However, the most sober pro-government newspaper, I KATHIMERINI, did furnish an explanation of Davos' promotion:

"In his capacity as negotiator," it reported, "Davos has a deep knowledge of the substance of the matter as well as excellent negotiating ability. These are considerable attributes which allow the Greek side to continue with the same negotiator, even on a different level, in its consultations with NATO particularly if the government accepted--after an exhaustive study of the issue--the expediency of consultations at the political level. Reportedly, this is a direction in which Brussels wants to transfer these consultations."

Here we have the explanation of Davos' promotion. The government wants to utilize his experience as negotiator with NATO for our country's return to NATO's military wing but at the same time it wants to raise these consultations from the technical to the political level.

In other words there is a culmination of the efforts to have our country return to the wolf pack's den by circumventing the "technical details" and by re-evaluating the political usefulness and expediency of our return. This entire change in the government's policy to date and Karamanlis' declarations that there is no need for haste in consultations with NATO are now abandoned because "at the present stage of developments in Central Asia it is imperative to have a political solution in principle to the entire problem." In other words, the "New Democracy" government has found an opportunity in the Afghan crisis for its own return to NATO's military wing by sweeping aside all obstacles--by satisfying the demands of the NATO imperialists at the expense of the country's territorial integrity, independence and national interests.

The only thing which now remains for the government to openly announce to us is that, for the sake of Afghanistan, it agrees to concede operational control over the Aegean to the Turks in exchange for its return to NATO for the sake of protecting the Greek islands under Demirel's NATO umbrella.

We believe that our national interests are in d'-e danger. A dangerous course is opening up, and the people remain in ignorance. his is being done with a sleight of hand and with cunning. Absolutely nothing has nged in the Greek area which would warrant a return to military NATO with, obviously, calamitous concessions. We remind Karamanlis of his statement that the return to NATO can only take place when the reasons which dictated Greek withdrawal have been eradicated.

These reasons have not been eradicated. The Turkish NATO chauvinists still occupy 40 percent of Cyprus with NATO's approval and, at the same time, they raise claims which threaten the country's integrity. Any concessions on these national issues would be tantamount to national treason.

POLICE INSPECTOR, MAT DEPTY SLAIN BY TERRORISTS

[Text] Police Inspector Sotiris Stamoulis, who was fatally wounded during last night's armed attack at Pangrati [Athens suburb] during which unknown persons killed Deputy Police Inspector Pandelis Petrou, deputy chief of MAT [riot control police], died today. The armed attack occurred on Stilponos Street, 28, at 1830 GMT last night. The police inspector was riding in a police car and was on his way home. The perpetrators, who, as has been proven, had set an ambush, blocked the police car and fired nearly at point blank range at Petrou, who was riding on the passenger side on the front seat. The driver, Constable Stamoulis, was also wounded by the shots. He was taken to the 401 Military Hospital, where he later died.

The perpetrators, who were reportedly three in number and who fired more than 15 shots, escaped in a red or green Peugeot 305 with stolen plates. According to agency reports a proclamation by the "17 November" organization was found on the scene of the crime. As it is known this organization took responsibility for the murders of the American Welsh and police inspectors Mallios and Bambalis. The investigation is being closely followed by Public Order Minister Balkos, the chief of police and other senior police officials.

'17 November' Claims Responsibility

[Excerpts] A new murder attack by the self-styled "17 November" organization occurred last night on Stilponos St. Pangrati [Athens suburb] with the deputy commander of MAT [riot control police] Police Inspector Pandelis Petrou and Police Inspector Sotirios Stamoulis as victims.

The "execution" was carried out with "45 caliber" pistols in exactly the same way as the murders of the American CIA station chief Welsh in December 1976, Police Inspector Malios in December 1977 and Police Inspector Bambalis in January 1979 [alleged junta police torturers]. The method with which the perpetrators moved is exactly the same as in the other three cases.

The identity of the victims, however, sheds a different light on the motives of the murderers with unknown future repercussions since this is an organized attack on law and order. The executioners' target, as they explain in leaflets left at the scene of the crime, were the MAT [riot control police] with Petrou and Stamoulis as the chosen victims.

An excerpt of the "proclamation" left at the scene states: "We have thus decided to execute one of the primary chiefs, the deputy commander of the MAT, togehter with his driver-bodyguard, who is not simply a driver but a filthy dog of the MAT. Among other activities this gentleman personally directed his raving forces both during the demonstration of 9 August, during which, with radio in hand, he issued instructions for the bestial beating of demonstrators, as well as during the demonstration of 25 October, during which he again did the same job, being in continual contact with the commander, who, together with other chiefs, took refuge in the operation control room of police headquarters."

PAHR COMMENTS ON SANCTIONS, INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

AU171829 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 17 Jan 80 pp 1-2 AU

[A. Unterberger report on interview with Foreign Minister Pahr in Vienna on 16 January]

[Summary] In an exclusive interview with DIE PRESSE, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr did not want to exclude the possibility that the foreign ministers of the United States, the USSR, the United Kingdom and France might meet in Vienna on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the Austrian state treaty despite the current crisis. However, although the foreign ministers have accepted Austria's invitation, Pahr now has some misgivings about this meeting. "If the situation continues to develop along the same negative lines as in the past few weeks, I could imagine that this is apt to jeopardize the events and celebrations that are planned for foreign participation," he said. He added that it might well be that the foreign ministers could not find enough time to attend, or that "one or the other might not want to attend a joint event any more." At any rate, Austria could be glad if it could make a contribution toward a rapprochement through such a meeting, he said.

"'For us, there is no alternative to it.' With these words Pahr rather clearly outlined Austria's position toward the policy of detente that has become rather controversial after Afghanistan. While Chancellor Kreisky had made rather pessimistic remarks about the forthcoming Madrid CSCE follow-up meeting in the past few weeks, Pahr now announced that Austria will even try to intensify the preparations for Madrid. But Pahr, too, is not sure what the outcome of Madrid will be: 'If Madrid should become a failure--this danger undoubtedly exists, because the success of such a conference very strongly depends on the climate among the participants--then this would be another setback for detente and perhaps even the end of the spirit of Helsinki.'"

Commenting on developments in Yugoslavia, Pahr shared the optimism earlier expressed by other Cabinet members regarding the stability of Yugoslavia. "At the same time Pahr warns against comparing Yugoslavia with Hungary, the CSSR or Afghanistan. Afghanistan has a treaty with the Soviet Union which almost literally contains the same provisions about the possibility of an intervention as is contained in the Warsaw Pact.

What will Austria's attitude be toward the planned American sanctions against the Soviet Union and Iran? "According to Pahr, Austrian participation in such sanctions could be considered only if they were compatible with all our political and economic interests and with the principles of permanent neutrality. Should comparable states consider sanctions, we will thoroughly study the question," Pahr said, describing as comparable states Switzerland, Sweden--and Yugoslavia. He declared that, in such an event, the Austrian Foreign Policy Council would be consulted.

[Text] The secretary general of the Arab League, Klibi has arrived in Vienna for a 3-day visit. Central to his talks with Federal Chancellor Kreisky and Foreign Minister Pahr are the Middle East situation, recognition of the PLO as the only legitimate representative of the Palestinians and the so-called North-South dialog.

REACTIONS TO CARTER'S PROPOSAL FOR OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

Government Spokesman Gruenewald

LD202216 Hamburg DPA in German 1850 GMT 20 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Washington--Government spokesman Armin Gruenewald said in Bonn tonight that the Federal Government has "great understanding" for the U.S. President's initiative concerning the Moscow Olympics, which it will immediately discuss with its European partners and German sports organizations. Bonn was informed in advance of Carter's decision and asked to take the appropriate initiative with the German National Olympic Committee. The spokesman pointed out that in the Federal Republic, as in the United States, the sports organizations decide on participation in the Olympic Games.

CSU's Edmund Stoiber

[Text] Frankfurt--In the view of CSU Secretary General Edmund Stoiber, NATO should take on more tasks in Europe if the Americans have to become involved to a greater extent in other parts of the world. Speaking on Hesse Radio on Saturday, Stoiber said that the CDU/CSU does not hold the view that the military defense lines of NATO have to be adjusted to the political defense lines. He cannot imagine German soldiers as defenders of the oil fields.

Stoiber also spoke in favor of the Federal Republic's boycotting the Olympic Games, if the United States should also decide to do this. Should the Olympic Games take place without any further ado, events in Afghanistan would be covered up. He does not think this is justified. Sports and politics are indivisibly linked, Stoiber believes. It is precisely the East that has always understood sports as a political vehicle.

NO UNUSUAL SOVIET TROOP MOVEMENT IN EUROPE REPORTED

[Text] Bonn--A spokesman for the Federal Defense Ministry said in Bonn today that there was no indication of any increase in the Warsaw Pact troops in central Europe or any unusual troop movements at present--not even toward Yugoslavia. He thereby rejected press reports (WELT AM SONNTAG) to that effect.

The spokesman added that in view of the present international situation, the Federal Defense Ministry and NATO have paid particular attention during the past 2 weeks to investigating reports that the Soviet Union was moving troops to central Europe. So far, all these reports have been "either unconfirmed, or proved to be false, or could be fitted into the normal behavior pattern and maneuvers of the Warsaw Pact Armed Forces at this time of year."

GOVERNMENT REPORTEDLY CONSIDERS RAISING DEFENSE EXPENDITURES

[Text] Bonn-- A possible increase in defense expenditures above the present level is apparently being considered by the Federal Government in view of the international situation. An intimation to this effect was given by government spokesman Gruenewald at a press conference in Bonn today. As far as he could see, he said, these considerations have not yet reached the NATO level, "But anybody who looks at the international situation with open eyes is bound to think about the future," he added. Gruenewald stressed, however, that expenditures could under no circumstances be greater than revenue from taxes.

The Federal Republic has in the past been repeatedly criticized by the United States for lagging behind the 3-percent increase in defense expenditures in real terms, decided by NATO. According to estimates the real increase is thought to amount to only 1.5 percent. A spokesman for the Defense Ministry said today that the figure now stood at 2 percent.

FURTHER REPORT ON SCHMIDT'S MEDICAL CONDITION

LD181503 Hamburg DPA in German 1430 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Summary] Bonn--Chancellor Schmidt is still under medical treatment for tonsillitis and must rest. He has canceled all outside engagements including his presence at the opening of the SPD's election campaign for the Baden-Wuerttemberg diet at Sindelfingen over the weekend. His work is confined to holding urgent talks at his office and studying official papers.

GENSCHER VIEWS STRAUSS REMARKS ON NATO RESPONSIBILITIES.

[Text] [No dateline received] Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher considers the statements by Franz Josef Strauss, the CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, about Bonn's new tasks within NATO "very interesting." The Bonn Foreign Ministry spokesman reported by telephone from New York today that Genscher was referring to Strauss' statement to FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG (Saturday edition) that the Federal Government should be prepared to relieve its allies in central Europe and to assign to the Bundeswehr tasks so far performed by its allies.

In Genscher's view, the statements made by Strauss in light of the greater worldwide commitments of Bonn's allies, broadly coincide with Genscher's speech in the Bundestag foreign policy debate last Thursday. These statements are surely a basis for constructive talks between the government and the opposition.

Bruno Friedrich, SPD deputy and vice president of the European Parliament, addressing the German-Polish society in Munich, cautioned against making the Soviet entry into Afghanistan the occasion for ending the process of detente in Europe. The Soviet occupation policy has doubtless interrupted this process, probably for a long time, he said.

In an interview with BILD (Monday edition), Strauss renewed his offer of support to the Federal Government for a bipartisan foreign policy. This offer was meant "very seriously," he said, for the chancellor has neither the necessary courage nor the allegiance of his party which he needs to act in the current crisis. Strauss is offering the government his support "because national responsibility is more important now." But the government must say goodby to its illusions on security policy. Peace has not been made more secure by the naive policy of detente of the past 10 years. That is a truth the government must admit to the German nation.

The text of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

STRAUSS TO VISIT ROMANIA 28-30 JANUARY

LD191826 Hamburg DPA in German 1646 GMT 19 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Munich--Franz Josef Strauss, the Bavarian minister-president and CSU chairman, is to visit Romania from 28 to 30 January. This was confirmed in Munich on Saturday. It is certain that Strauss will meet with Nicolae Ceausescu, the state and party leader who is steering a relatively independent course from Moscow inside the East bloc. The invitation for the official visit was extended at the end of last year. Thus Strauss will be visiting a communist country for the second time since his nomination as chancellor-candidate of the union parties. He visited Hungary last summer with the CSU parliamentary group of the Bavarian diet.

PCF'S JUQUIN INTERVIEWED ON AFGHANISTAN, EUROCOMMUNISM

ID182059 Paris Domestic Service in French 1820 GMT 18 Jan 80 ID

[Interview with Pierre Juquin, member of the PCF Politburo, by station political reporters--live]

[Excerpts] [Question] What is the fundamental reason for the PCF's approval of the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan?

[Answer] The basic reason for the stance which we adopted with regard to the USSR's military intervention in Afghanistan was very clearly explained by Georges Marchais on TF-1 [first television network] live from Moscow a few days ago, and the impact of that broadcast has been considerable. The essential reason is this: We naturally do not have to be consulted, nor do we have to approve or explicitly disapprove actions which we do not decide upon. But we have understood why the Soviet Union has acted in this manner in Afghanistan. Why did it act? For a simple reason: The USSR knew, and I have no doubt of this, and Leonid Brezhnev explained to Georges Marchais, who repeated it on television, the fact that they had weighed the pros and cons in the Soviet leadership; they had questioned the matter at length; they had had some hesitations; the Soviet Union leadership knew that there would be repercussions and consequences. But they went ahead. They did so because they could not do otherwise.

We must picture the kind of country that Afghanistan is. It is a vast country, with a population that has been subjected for centuries to a state of backwardness, like the Middle Ages, with powerful feudal masters. I represent it to myself rather like the Vendee was in the era of the French Revolution. But in that region a democratic movement was unleashed, an endeavor to bring some progress, some progress to take some steps forward toward something more human, more just, more modern. And then--the feudalists did not want this to happen. The Americans did not want this to happen. In particular, the Americans caused the neighboring country, Pakistan, to intervene. They urged it on, and camps were set up on its territory. The extent of the intervention was such that the democratic experience in Afghanistan was threatened. The Soviet Union, heeding the call of the revolutionaries and progressives had to intervene to prevent a collapse.

[Question] Pierre Juguin, how do you explain that the PCF is practically alone among the great Western communist parties to voice approval of the Soviet intervention?

[Answer] Each communist party is self-determining. This is something new if we look at what took place before the war, let us say, or even a little afterwards. They make their own decisions freely and independently. Each one follows its own line, makes its own judgments, makes its own decisions in its own manner. We are self-determining with respect to our own orientation, we are self-determining with respect to our own orientation, the orientation we established at our congresses and which we consider to be a revolutionary orientation.

To understand the matter fully perhaps one must take a general view of matters. After World War-II, during the period of the cold war and even a little later, a vast movement for liberation broke out in what was the colonial empire set up by a few great colonialist, imperialist powers--the United States, France, England, Japan--toward the end of the 19th century. This was important. It was a great upheaval for the world.

But today it seems to me that we are entering a new era, one in which there is a new drive by nations, who not only want to have their independence in title but also want to be the masters of their own destinies, to conquer hunger, illiteracy, misery and poverty. What is taking place in Afghanistan has its roots in that great movement. Naturally, countries such as the United States do not see that with good will. They are trying to counterattack, to adopt new positions, to try and block the movement, and the Soviet Union played its role of solidarity by bringing its support to the Afghan popular movement.

[Question] But then how do you explain why, for example, Enrico Berlinguer does not share your way of seeing things? Would this mean that there are some communists who are less good communists than others?

[Answer] I would never make any judgment. I must tell you that if your listeners were scrupulously, meticulously informed then they would know about the joint communique issued after the visit by Georges Marchais to Enrico Berlinguer before the former went to Moscow. In this joint communique the tone and general orientation are Eurocommunist, It makes it clear that we want to continue to cooperate on all essential questions, that we are preparing a number of actions and enterprises together, such as aid for the countries of the Third World to fight against hunger and illiteracy, for better justice. What is called a new world economic order, the struggle against the multinationals in Europe and so on. Consequently what unites us is very strong. We are Eurocommunists just as our Italian comrades are Eurocommunists. But there is a difference of view on the matter. The explanation that can be given is that we have a different appreciation of the application of the principle of noninterference in the domestic matters of another country.

Allow me to say a few words to make this clear: The principle of noninterference in the affairs of another country is an essential, fundamental principle. We are strongly attached to this principle and from the very release of the statement by our Politburo on the Afghan affairs we reaffirmed it. But this principle must be capable of being applied, and it must be applied in the world as it is. It must not signify that some big powers such as the United States can be able--because others will never interfere in the name of principle--to settle matters for small countries that want their freedom, that want to be masters of their riches, their dignity, all of which I spoke earlier. They have been acting like this for decades: I have before me a list of the American interventions in the world, of which there are plenty--Guatemala, and so on and so forth. A few days ago Antenne-2 [second television network] viewers saw a scandalous spectable, a film followed by a debate, a film on Chile. This gave food for thought. If Chile had been able to benefit from international help and support, then maybe President Allende would still be in office.

PCF CRITICIZES MEDIA, URGES MEMBERSHIP DRIVE

[Apparent text of PCF Politiburo statement issued in Paris on 14 January: "On the Attack Against Lies"]

[Text] The information given by Georges Marchais last Friday on French television about the joint CPSU-PCF communique and his reaffirmation of our party's stance on Afghanistan have had considerable repercussions. On the basis of this information bourgeois propaganda has mounted a new, extremely violent operation against the PCF and its secretary general.

Television networks, radio stations, newspapers and politicians are turning news, comment and debate into a vast machine for generating lies. All their attacks are based on systematic deception and distortion of our party's policy and of its leaders' actions and statements.

Just as they concealed the text of the joint PCI-PCF communique from the French people, the media are now concealing from them the text of the joint CPSU-PCF communique.

In adopting this communique our party is following our 22d and 23d congresses and applying their fundamental decisions.

For instance, this communique highlights the great change now taking place in mankind. On the basis of the modification in the balance of forces, it highlights the prospects for the struggles for peace, independence and socialism without disregarding the counteroffensive being waged by imperialism. The communique contains elements which stress the real possibility of making progress toward disarmament and toward insuring Europe's security. It supports the fight for a new, more just international system. It reaffirms the principles of the sovereignty of nations, independence and non-interference in countries' internal affairs. It shows the necessary growing diversity of socialism and the paths to socialism in the various countries. It stresses the importance of the common objectives shared by the two parties without concealing the existence of differences and diverging views.

This communique is an important step in establishing new relations between the two fraternal parties of the Soviet Union and France. It is part of the development of relations within the international communist movement.

The Politburo supports the party delegation's activities in the Soviet Union. It welcomes the results obtained and the statements made by Georges Marchais during the visit.

At its next meeting, 21 through 22 January, the Central Committee will make a detailed examination of the international situation and will define the party's tasks.

Meanwhile, the Politburo wishes to voice an indignant protest against the conduct of the main sections of the media at the Elysee's instigation. It does so with gravity since this wave of hatred and slander, this misinformation and these distortions attack the right of all the workers and citizens to decide for themselves on the basis of the facts and discredit France in the international arena. The Politburo calls on Communists to make the fight for a media worthy of their name an objective of united and democratic struggle.

In more general terms the Politburo calls on Communists to intensify and extend their counteroffensive to the attack against their party.

Indeed the petty political aims of this attack are patently obvious.

The forces of capital are doing everything in their power to weaken the PCF--the party which is waging the democratic and revolutionary struggle in our country. In so doing they hope to create the right conditions for popular consent to excessive austerity, price hikes and unemployment. They want a free hand for their policy of decline, national resignation and alinement with Washington--this imperialist policy which is spreading hunger, illiteracy, torture and death in the world and which intervenes on all continents to thwart peoples fighting for their dignity and for control over their resources and future.

The Socialist Party--as its national convention has just demonstrated--is the spearhead of this enterprise. On questions such as the NATO missiles or Afghanistan it adopts stances identical to those of Giscard d'Estaing, going even further than he and launching provocations. In so doing it confirms the swing to the right which it started by breaking the leftwing union. It is deepening the division. It is making use of forces opposed to change.

The Politburo has taken not of many reports showing that the mass of Communists throughout the country support the party leadership's activities and are going into the attack against lies. The Politburo appeals to their combativeness, their courage and their spirit of initiative in explaining and supporting their party's policy and positions. It calls on all cells to step up contacts, discussions and meetings with as many people as possible. It calls on them to increase the leadership of L'HUMANITE and the whole party press.

Communists everywhere will insure the party's presence in struggles and will themselves take up the fight, together with the workers, against austerity, unemployment and their consequences. They will extend their action for peace and disarmament. They will show active solidarity with the democratic, national and revolutionary forces fighting in the world. They will firmly carry the banner of union in action against the Giscard-Barre policy and fight for immediate demands and for change.

The Politburo urges Communists to make the popular rallies for the distribution of [party membership] cards important events for explanation and conviction and also great successes in winning new members. It has no doubt that the situation provides additional reasons for making the launching of the new L'HUMANITE-DIMANCHE--1 through 3 February--a national event.

GISCARD RECEIVES ASSEMBLY OFFICIALS, SIGNS FINANCE BILL

LD181932 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Valery Giscard d'Estaing today received Roger Chinaud, floor leader of the UDR group in the National Assembly, and Claude Labbe, president of the Rally for the Republic [RPR] group. At the end of the meeting the president of the republic signed the 1980 finance bill, which had earlier created discord between the two majority parties.

In addition, at the end of the meeting the president of the republic, through the intermediary of his spokesman, Pierre Hunt, let it be known that whatever happens there will be not question of dissolving the assembly.

[Begin Hunt recording] I am not envisaging, Giscard d'Estaing has said, the dissolution of the National Assembly except in new political circumstances, and this for three reasons:

It is preferable, for the proper functioning of the institutions, to hold elections at the normal date whenever possible.

International circumstances would make the beginning of a political crisis in France particularly inopportune.

Finally, I have observed that with the deputies belonging to the majority having voted for none of the censure motions submitted by the opposition, and with the budget of France having been formally adopted today, that the majority has not broken the pledge it gave to its electors in March 1978. MITTERRAND ADDRESSES PS NATIONAL CONVENTION

ID210943 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Jan 80 pp 9-10 ID

[Unattributed report on 12 January Socialist Party national convention: "PS National Convention Adopts the 'Socialist Plan'"]

[Excerpt] Mr Francois Mitterrand delivered a speech. He explained that the [Socialist] plan makes it possible to assert that socialism is "viable, desirable and up-to-date." According to him the point which characterizes the "tone" of the present trends is the relevance of socialism: "What is realistic?" he asked. "How can ideals be reconciled with reality? That is the fundamental debate which the Socialists alone are developing." After expressing the fear of seeing the debate "starting again even if the convention adopts the text by an overwhelming majority," the Socialist Party [PS] first secretary defined socialism as "the highest form of democracy and not the ultimate form of bureaucracy." He pointed out that political democracy is now "on the decline in our country" and stressed the need to win more freedom and collective rights. In his view this can only be done by changing production relations, extending the public sector and by planning. Mr Mitterrand ruled out any possibility of there being on the one hand "initiative and competition" and on the other "bureaucracy, state control of communism." He added: "If there was no way of preventing initiative and competition turning into a jungle for the benefit of the strongest, in other words in capitalism, it would be as if socialism did not exist." He explained that, in this debate, the Socialists have heard "different theories, not contradictory but different, and therefore able to form part of a synthesis."

The Socialist leader then stressed another dimension of the plan which is to guarantee "the continued existence of France." He maintained that the country is "threatened in its substance, reality and survival." He added: "I do not want to see our country merge into a culture in which nothing would be distinguishable. That is why the plan, by what could almost be called resistance, reflects our objectives."

Mr Francois Mitterrand recalled that it is necessary to "try and build Europe" without harming French interests. He added: "Without abandoning our alliances, which are the minimum required for security, and without destroying the chances of dialog and peace with the USSR, we must insure France's power, perpetuate its historical role, at times modifying its content, and take part in building international society." With reference to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan Mr Mitterrand put forward three hypotheses: The USSR intervened to "protect its gains," it wanted to "keep its security" since this country has been in its sphere of influence since the fall of the monarchy; it wanted to prevent the Shi'ite revolution from spreading to its own Muslim republics; finally the intervention is "a sign of weakness and hence proof of a mistake by the Soviet Government." He indicated that he does not believe the "Pakistani explanation" for this expedition. He pointed out that the superpowers readily resign themselves to war since it enables them to test their weapons and modify the balance of forces. However, he specified that he does not believe the USSR will undertake new conquests, which would be "madness."

He stressed that this gave the PCF leadership a "unique" opportunity of "finally becoming, once again, the senior daughter" of the (communist) church.

Mr Mitterrand then denounced Mr Marchais' television speech direct from Moscow in the following terms:

"Napoleon Bonaparte once signed the decree setting up the Comedie-Francoise from Moscow.... I do not know what prompted Georges Marchais to point his finger, as you would a missile, from the television screen and hold up the PS and especially certain people among us as targets for universal indignation: The effects were somewhat disporportionate, and I do not think it is a good thing for the left--and, moreover, for the good relations which French people must try to maintain with each other as far as possible, despite their disagreements--to decide to act as judge and executioner in this way when speaking from a foreign capital."

Mr Mitterrand specified: "I regard the PCF secretary general's speech as the final proof--we did not need it but perhaps the public had to know--that for some time, in any case just before the 1977 split and in the months or years which followed and will follow, the PCF, for reasons which have nothing to do with defending the workers in their own way or with their view of France's development, provoked the split on the left and destroyed the organic union behind a joint program for reasons having to do with international facts which concern the French workers only to the extent that these facts are now an instrument of war and disintegration and, when you know what nuclear war means, an instrument of misfortune and death....

"What can be said with regard to the French Government?

"The president of the republic has his eyes fixed not on Kabul and the Pakistan border but on the French electorate's voting papers... (applause)...not only India's borders but on the poll ratings."

Then the PS first secretary addressed a "solemn" warning to the president of the republic. "The right is a major force," he said, "and you do not wait 2 weeks to protest against armed force."

After expressing the view that "the Eurocommunists' dream" is in fact the same as the Socialist's plan and behavior, Mr Mitterrand stressed that is it vital to be "capable of organizing intellectual and spiritual resistance to all the signs of resignation which are now tending to make France and the world bow to the madness of power." He added: "It is impossible to resist without believing in what you are doing."

The PS first secretary expressed the hope that the next national convention might make it possible to extend "as far as is possible" the party leadership's bases but he specified "that cannot be done in a confused way or by abandoning decisions taken."

Finally, with regard to the nomination of the Socialist candidate [for the French presidential election] Mr Mitterrand said that "nobody is in a hurry, which means that consequently everybody has given a kind of mental undertaking not to plan a decision for which nobody is calling." He concluded that "unity is being built each day."

PCI LEADERS CRITICIZE SOVIET AFGHAN INVASION

Berlinguer: 'Sharp Rejection'

AU210845 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 21 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome, January 21 (ANSA)--The international crisis sparked by the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan was the dominent note struck by Italian political party leaders in speeches over the weekend.

Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer, speaking at Terni, reiterated his party's sharp rejection of the Red Army invasion of Afghanistan and recalled that Italian Communists have always roundly condemned any violation of the principles of sovereignty and independence of individual states.

Berlinguer also said that there was no evidence that representative organs of the Afghan people had made any request to Moscow for outside help. The PCI secretary voiced keen concern over the present international situation, and criticized U.S. President Jimmy Carter's decision to suspend ratification of the SALT-II treaty and to halt cereal exports to the USSR. He had words of praise for the stand taken by Pope John Paul II and the West German Social Democratic Party which, while condemning the Soviet intervention, eschewed the path of reprisals.

Berlinguer then went on to delineate a five-point program of joint action that all the forces of peace in Europe should, in his view, undertake:

1) Opposition and condemnation of any action of force and any act inspired by reprisal, no matter what state is involved.

2) Efforts to moderate between the U.S. and the USSR so as to solicit from the two superpowers a willingness to help peacefully solve conflicts and guarantee detente.

3) Political and diplomatic initiatives to halt any new steps in the arms race and to push for their gradual, controlled and balanced reduction.

4) The drafting of a joint stance by the EEC nations to ensure the success of the European Conference for Cooperation and Development, and

5) Initiatives to deal with and overcome the economic causes of current international tensions.

Turning to domestic politics, Berlinguer voiced satisfaction over the decision taken by the Socialist Party's Central Committee and hoped that this new political position would be backed up by action. As to an eventual Communist participation in the government, Berlinguer said that two crucial conditions were necessary: equal dignity for all partners in the coalition, taking into account the respective political and parliamentary clout of each of these parties, and a clear, concrete program having a clear-cut timetable and goals responsive to the citizenry and the working masses.

Republican Party (PRI) Secretary Giovanni Spadolini, speaking in Bologna, said that the international crisis, "from the realities of Afghanistan to the unknowns of Yugoslavia," should be one of the key themes of a review of policy that all the constitutional parties should take part in once the Christian Democratic Party (DC) congress is over.

Spadolini, true to the line of the late Republican leader Ugo la Malfa, gave top priority to the need for a serious government program capable of lifting Italy out of its economic and social problems. Once the program has been fixed, discussion can center on the type of government to be forged within the context of national solidarity, he said.

For Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi, the lowest and most negative point in decades has been reached in the field of international relations. Speaking in Milan, he drew the following dire picture of the state of the world today: negotiations on atomic weapons have been broken off, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has further damaged relations between the superpowers and thrown dark clouds on the world situation, there are hotbeds of dangerous regional conflicts, there is an international economic crisis and the world monetary system is in disarray. In this difficult situation, Italy is firmly aligned with Europe and the West and must not accept a passive and resigned role, Craxi said.

Instead, the country must forge a dynamic foreign policy and push for Europe's active intervention in world affairs on the side of the developing nations, of cooperation in the Mediterranean and greater equilibrium, he said.

Pajetta Condemnation

LD202110 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1805 GMT 20 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Rome, January 20 (TANJUG)--One of the leading Italian Communists, Gian Carlo Pajetta, who is in charge of foreign policy in the largest workers' party in the West, stated in an interview with journalists of the party organ L'UNITA: "We condemn the Soviet intervention and we demand the withdrawal of troops." "We do not ignore the fact that the intervention took place at the time of an aggravation which had its origin far away, nor do we hide the condemnation of those governments and political forces in the West which have embarked on the road of threats and retaliatory measures and which yield to the temptations of encirclement, falling back precisely to the climate of the cold war."

Commenting on the recent vote in the United Nations, Pajetta noted that involved there was no "front" led by the United States, although certain news media wished to present it in that way. The world is not divided into two camps, said Pajetta. The non-aligned countries which abstained from voting did it confident that Havana has reaffirmed the principle of independence which they do not wish to give up. Many of those who voted for the condemnation of the intervention did it in the same spirit.

It suffices to recall that these votes also included that of Yugoslavia. Involved, then, is a positive element which has found expression also in the positions of the communists in among others, Spain, Japan and Great Britain. This is a warning of those forces who wish to be protagonists of the great struggle for peace, who do not consider themselves as being merely onlookers in the clash of interests between the great powers, or who desist from making their own, effective contribution to the anti-imperialist struggle.

Turning to the pre-Kabul period, Pajetta said that the decision to station nuclear missiles in Europe had also contributed to the aggravation of the international situation. In his opinion, some of the retaliatory measures, notably the ban on the wheat exports and the threat to boycott the Olympics, are almost provocative in nature.

For the Italian Communists, concluded Pajetta involved here is a principled question of peace, of a world order in which balance can only be maintained through the independence of each nation and by guaranteeing that the protagonists of progress and of the profound social change will only be the peoples themselves.

IRANIAN-ITALIAN STEEL PROJECT TO PROCEED 'ON SCHEDULE'

AU182018 Rome ANSA in English 1955 GMT 18 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Genoa, January 18 (ANSA)--The Italian firm "Italimpianti", a company in the state-owned "IRI-Finsider" steel manufacturing group, reported here today that the joint-project for the construction of a new steel plant in Iran, in the city of Esfahan, is going ahead on schedule after the contract was confirmed by the Tehran government in November.

The "Italimpianti" communique disclosed that earlier this month eight component parts for the hot rolling of sheet steel were shipped to Iran from the Italian ports of Savona and Venice.

The new Iranian steel plant has been designed to produce three million tons of finished steel per year.

PSI CENTRAL COMMITTEE TAKES STAND ON GOVERNMENT COALITION

AU181623 Rome ANSA in English 1605 GMT 18 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome, January 18, (ANSA)--The Italian Socialist Party (PSI) today committed itself to ending its attitude of truce towards Prime Minister Franceso Cossiga's ruling minority coalition once the Christian Democrat Party (DC) congress scheduled for this month is over.

The pledge was contained in a motion approved at the end of a four-and-a-half-day session of the Socialists' Central Committee, which also named 79-year-old veteran Riccardo Lombardi, a leading light of the party's leftwingers, as party chairman in [word indistinct] to Pietro Nenni.

The session involved [word indistinct] and tense discussions between party Secretary Craxi's supporters, who want [word indistinct] line with respect to the DC, and the left-wingers, who put their money on [word indistinct] government including the [word indistinct].

The present government is a (?coalition of) Cossiga's own Christian Democrats, the Social Democrats and the right-of-center PLI [Liberal Party], but the Socialists' abstention is crucial to its [words indistinct] document calling for a government of emergency and national solidarity "supported by an ample parliamentary and popular base" was approved by an overwhelming majority.

A second document, also approved by a very large majority, authorized the leadership to set up a "collegial body with political and liaison characteristacs", to reform the management of the party and "restructure" its operational departments.

The document reflected charges from Craxi's opponents that, apart from failing to follow a clearly defined line in political terms, the secretary had run the party in an authoritarian fashion without taking account of the views of other members of the leadership.

Craxi's opponents in favor of pushing for Communist participation in the government were led by Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile, Lombardi and two ex-secretaries, Giacomo Mancini and Francesco de Martino.

Craxi was in favor of solution either than the giving the Communists ministerial responsibility [as received]. One was a five-party partnership of the [word indistinct] three government [word indistinct] plus the Socialists and the Republicans.

The two lineups had virtually equal strength within the Central Committee and this made laborious negotiations necessary in order to achieve a compromise.

In its political document, the Central Committee said it was "necessary and urgent" for the parties to identify programs and policies for a "new and genuine solidarity and a loyal and equal cooperation among the democratic forces" another reference to the demand that the Communists should be treated on an equal footing as potential government allies.

The Christian Democrats have systematically rejected all attempts to give the Communists, their major rivals and the biggest opposition party, a direct say in running the country.

The only step in this direction was the Andreotti government which fell at the beginning of last year. The former premier's parliamentary majority included the Communists.

PSDI CONGRESS DISCUSSES JOINT GOVERNMENT POSSIBILITY

LD182308 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Innocenzo Cruciani reports on the Italian Social Democratic Party [PSDI] congress:

During the debates in the hall and in the corridors the comments deal with the conclusion of the Italian Socialist Party [PSI] Central Committee session. The PSDI's disappointment is obvious and it was expressed by Puletti. In a statement he described the decisions of the PSI Central Committee as extremely grave, since they show that the PSI, without holding an extraordinary congress, had changed its political line. The PSDI leaders add forecasts to this clearcut opinion that are anything but cheerful. Should the Cossiga government fall and if an agreement with the Communists, proposed by the PSI, is refused--the Social Democrat points out--nothing will remain but parliamentary elections held ahead of schedule.

The fact that there is talk of a joint government, Puletti said, is perhaps a prelude to an invitation to the parties for negotiations, which in the present international situation would be an advantage for the Communist Party. He also said that PSI ambiguity will result in a choice of grave consequences and concluded by saying: It is now the task of reformist and autonomist Socialists to draw the necessary conclusions before the sense of party unity in them becomes a final rift.

At the PSDI congress this morning the speakers included Luigi Preti and Costantino Belluscio. Preti defended the Cossiga government and requested that the possible resignation of the government take place only after a vote of no confidence in Parliament. Belluscio, who spoke also in his capacity of head of the office for state problems within the Directorate, supplied alarming figures about terrorism. In three years there have been 4,382 attempts against objects and 1,508 acts of violence against persons. The dead number 108 and the injured 141.

The debate at the PSDI congress continues. It will be suspended late tomorrow morning and the various commissions will start their work. Longo will give his reply on Sunday morning.

PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH CLOSES ASSEMBLY SESSION

LD191310 Lisbon in English to Europe 2030 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The 3-day parliamentary debate on the government's program was closed yesterday by a speech delivered by the prime minister. Speaking in a moderate but somewhat ironical tone, Mr Sa Carneiro stressed the legitimacy of the government to carry out the reforms and changes it deems necessary.

He rejected opposition arguments that would tend to limit the action of the new Cabinet on the grounds that it will only be in office until the autumn and of the small nature of its majority in parliament. Those arguments, he said, were no obstacle to a government that was strong thanks to its absolute majority and that could only feel fragile in view of the enormity of the problems thatit has to face.

He stressed that it would be up to parliament to decide on the creation of mechanisms for referenda, as proposed by the government. He added that the Cabinet would abide by the decisions of the bodies charged with supervising the constitutionality of parliamentary laws.

The prime minister made a special reference to foreign policy. Basically he backed up the speech made by the foreign minister which condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Mr Sa Carneiro compared the Olympic games in Moscow with those in Berlin in 1936 on the eve of the Second World War.

The question of the former prime minister, Maria de Lourdes Pintasilgo, raised previously by Mr Mario Soares, the Socialist leaders also merited a comment by Mr Sa Carneiro who stressed that it was up to the president of the republic, on the government's proposal, to fill the post of ambassador to UNESCO which Miss Pintasilgo formerly held.

Mr Sa Carneiro criticized the opposition for intentionally looking at the economic and financial situation through rose-colored glasses. The situation, he said, was really very serious and difficult. This was a direct reference to the speech delivered by President Eanes at the swearing-in of the new government and also to statements made by Socialists.

U.S. CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION VISITS

LD201522 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 20 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The political situation in Portugal has been favorably appraised by a delegation of four U.S. congressmen who are currently visiting Portugal. The U.S. delegation has been received by Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral, Prime Minister Sa Carneiro and the speaker of the Assembly of the Republic.

Through the head of the visiting delegation, the United States has conveyed to the prime minister its wish to increase its aid to the victims of the Azores earthquake. This matter was also the subject of a letter from James Carter to Sa Carneiro.

The Portuguese prime minister was also congratulated by the visiting delegation for the courageous stand adopted by the Portuguese Government on the Afghan issue.

USSR REDUCES OIL SUPPLIES TO PORTUGAL

LD191312 Lisbon in English to Europe 2030 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Soviet Union has reduced petroleum supplies to Portugal to almost half. The information was given by the supplies division of PETROGAL, the Portuguese petroleum company.

A delegation of the Portuguese firm returned from Moscow yesterday where negotiations with the Soviet authorities in the sector were carried out. The possibility of a larger supply has however, been left open, should the Soviet Union be able to acquire from other countries more petroleum than that expected.

Purely technical and commercial reasons were said by the Portuguese representative to be behind the decision.

ANGOLAN EMBASSY SAYS REFUGEES SHOULD RETURN

LD181346 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] A communique from the Angolan Embassy in Portugal has appeared in some newspapers in our country informing the present refugees of that people's republic that they should return without fear to their homeland. In this communique the ambassador adds that he will request from the Portuguese authorities the expulsion of the Angolans in these circumstances.

BASQUE NATIONALIST PARTY WITHDRAWS FROM CORTES

[Text] The Basque Nationalist Party [PNV] tonight issued an official document at a press conference held in Bilbao explaining the PNV's decision to temporarily withdraw from the Cortes pending guarantees that draft organic laws will sufficiently conform to the content of the statute of autonomy of Euskadi.

Since the reestablishment of democracy began in Spain in June 1977, the PNV has repeatedly stated its intention to legally participate in the democratic (?forum), making its aims known via institutional channels and in peaceful ways. Through firm and legal means of dialog and negotiation, the document continues, the PNV worked for the statute agreed upon by referendum in Euskadi on 25 October, considering it to be a valid instrument for the Basque people. The PNV has always said, the official text continues, that it will not tolerate a restrictive interpretation of the statute, whether this occurs by questioning its content through organic laws or through government actions which [words indistinct] its spirit and genuine far-reaching negotiations, which would make it possible. The PNV also said it would not remain impassive in the face of attempts to disrupt the process of the transfer of powers to the Basque General Council, which would signify an unjustifiable delay in the autonomy process.

The PNV wishes to publicize, the document adds, first, the lack of progress in the transfer of powers to the Basque General Council and second, the fact that the organic laws that may be (?invoked) to hinder an adequate interpretation of the statute [words indistinct]. These laws, which the PNV believes could limit the effectiveness of the statute of Euskadi, are as follows: The law of the general council of judiciary power [ley del consejo general del poder judicial]; the law regulating the various modalities of referendum; the workers' statute; the law of the police of the autonomous communities; the law on financing of the autonomous communities; the law of civilian security; and the law of university autonomy.

Third, if the commitment to work in the institutions for peace and the self-government of the country requires us to be loyal to our interlocutors in the government and in the Cortes, it also requires us to demand the same loyalty from them. Above all it requires us to tell our people, from whom we will never hide the reality of the political process with euphemisms [word indistinct] the exact truth. Consequently, the PNV, which on approving the statute had already pointed out the danger that its potential powers could be weakened, in full consciousness of the significance of its position, publicly announces the following:

First, that it considers absurd, from whatever perspective, the government's resistance to the transfer of powers to the Basque General Council.

Second, that in the light of the systematic (?refusal to listen) to the propositions of the Basque members of the Cortes, the PNV will not occupy its seats in the Cortes until it obtains guarantees that the drafts going through the legislative process sufficiently (?conform) to a correct interpretation of the statute of autonomy of Euskadi.

Third, the PNV members who comprise the Basque General Council will abstain from all corporate work of the Council except in exceptional cases and in the case of obligations to the departments for which they are responsible.

Finally, the document says the PNV puts its faith in dialog and negotiations to reestablish as soon as possible the hopeful expectations of the autonomous future.

PNV's Garaicoechea Enumerates Complaints

LD190215 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The temporary abandonment of the congress and the senate by the Basque Nationalist Party [PNV] was explained this evening in an extensive communique issued by the Bizkai Buru Batzar, the principle body of the PNV during the course of a press conference, held today in Bilbao chaired by Carlos Garaicoechea. Garaicoechea himself summarized for us this extensive communique:

[Begin recording] The PNV has expressed, and continues to express permanently its desire to play cleanly in the democratic game and to participate loyally in the institutions, but it wishes to obtain a reciprocity, also unequivocal, to this attitude. In this sense the PNV negotiated firmly, and I insist with complete loyalty, a statute of autonomy, and recommended it enthusiastically to its people, considering it to be a valid instrument and of interest for the present political course of the Basque Country and the whole state.

Now we have said--and we said that at the time--that later the legal application of the statute could be obscured or its nature changed [desnaturalizado] by other conditions, organic laws and so forth. And we [word indistinct] have to note, with concern, although with the hope that this situation [word indistinct] will normalize itself, that indeed, these organic laws, which I explain as an example, present some worrysome aspects, at times contradictory, or highly ambiguous, (?with respect to the) statute. We want the draft laws to go to the legislative assembly without contradictions, with a basic principle which we have just approved. We do not want the systematic isolation of the amendments of our legislators when these are justified, I insist, completely coinciding with the statute.

There is another essential reason [words indistinct] and this is that we consider it inexplicable that the Basque General Council has been deprived, also systematically, of the minimum transfer of powers that have been constantly claimed, to the point that the last transfer of powers was that agreed upon in February 1979, although it was the object of a decree in October and it is (?not hidden) from anyone that it was nothing more than a political action of the country, given the necessity to (give priority) to--and we say this clearly--the political and peaceful paths, the inexplicable nature of this resistance to transfer powers to the preautonomy body is hidden from no one, (?and this shows) scorn for autonomy. [end recording]

[Studio announcer] After saying the government could now imagine that the PNV could adopt or take a decision of this kind, Garaicoechea added for us:

[Begin recording] I understand that our problems are not the only ones that exist at the moment for the state, but we also have the impression that the government is perhaps giving its attention to problems based on hierarchy of urgency. And our problems at the moment are very urgent. They are very serious political (?questions) and we cannot expose the autonomous institutions of the Basque Country to discredit. [end recording]

Other Party Spokesmen Comment

LD190943 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] Our newsroom has tried to collect the opinions of other Spanish political parties on the Basque Nationalist Party [PNV] document on withdrawing from the Crotes. Thus authorized spokesmen for the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the main opposition party, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] have replied to questions from our colleague [name indistinct].

[Begin recording] [Reporter] First we hear from Modesto Fraile, first deputy president of the Congress and UCD deputy for Segovia. What do you think of the decision adopted by the PNV?

[Fraile] Institutionally, it is very important that a parliamentary group with the significance of the PNV should abandon the parliament. And [word indistinct] I respect the decision of my Basque colleagues, but I believe that it is a decision which should have been given much thought, because it is precisely in the Congress that the problems which they find in some draft bills which have still to be approved can be resolved. Therefore, it is by discussing the bills, and by dialog and mutual conviction that a problem can be solved, and not of course by withdrawing from the parliament.

[Reporter] The opinion of the principal party of the opposition, the PSOE, comes from Gomez Virgilio Zapatero.

[Zapatero] From the perspective of parliamentary democracy the decision by the PNV seems to us absolutely incorrect. Utilizing the parliament as a weapon [word indistinct] with continual temporary withdrawals [word indistinct] seems serious to us for the consolidation of our democracy. Scrupulous respect for the functioning of our institutions is a prior condition for the maintenance of (?stability). In this sense, we consider that the PNV's attitude is irresponsible and demagogic. This is not the first time that the PNV has publicly told the UCD to fulfill its commitments, without the citizens' knowing exactly what is being referred to. We believe that this decision by the PNV makes it necessary for the UCD to clarify if there have been such agreements, and if so, what they consist of because only on this basis can we evaluate the degree of responsibility or irresponsibility which the UCD bears in the decision of the PNV.

[Reporter] The president of the Senate, to which eight members of the PNV belong, UCD member Cecilio Valverde, said that the best thing would be for the PNV to wait for the imminent formation of the constitutional tribunal in order to lodge the proper appeals, if it accuses certain legal texts approved after the statute of Euskadi of unconstitutionality.

Jorge Vestrynge, the secretary general of the rightwing party, Popular Alliance, said that this attitude may be interpreted as an intent to bring extra-parliamentary pressure to bear at a particularly delicate time for the autonomy subject.

The deputy of the extreme Basque coalition, Juan Maria Bandres, said that not long ago he had to take a similar position for this reason. He added: I understand the PNV's position better, perhaps, than anyone.

Miguel Castells, senator of the Basque independent coalition, Herri Batasuna, said for his part that in the present political situation, we Basques cannot be in the Cortes; Herri Batasuna has been saying this constantly.

The spokesman of the Catalonian Socialist members of parliament, Eduardo Martin Toval, said that this decision by the majority party in the Basque Country can be interpreted as one more element of conflict between the various nationalities of the Spanish state.

Finally, the secretary general of the Socialist Party of Andalusia, Alejandro Rojas Marcos, said that the Basque parliamentary group which today withdrew from parliament represents for the people more than it has obtained politically and economically from the majority centrist parties, the UCD and the PSOE.

For his part the secretary general of PSOE, Felipe Gonzalez, said that the decision by the governing party is in clear and flagrant contradiction with the commitments made by UCD with respect to Andalusia, with all of the political forces possessing parliamentary representation.

Felipe Gonzalez, after stressing his intention and that of the Socialist Party to defend the autonomy initiative agreed upon by the representatives of the Andalusian people, called upon the members of PSOE, and those who sympathize with Andalusia, to make the maximum effort to win a big "yes" majority in the referendum which will allow the Andalusian people to enjoy self-government at the maximum constitutional level.

TWA, OTHER AIRLINE OFFICES BOMBED IN MADRID

PA200128 Paris AFP in English 0109 GMT 20 Jan 80 PA

Several people were reported injured in the attacks carried out against the U.S. airline TWA, British Airways, Swissair, and the Belgian airline Sabena.

A man identifying himself as a member of the commando phoned AGENCE FRANCE PRESS here to say the bombings were a protest "against the policy of world imperialism and fascism," adding that "important operations will take place in the near future." He later phoned back to express regret that innocent victims had been hurt in the blasts.

The same Armenian group has already claimed responsibility for a number of attacks carried out late last year in Madrid, Rome and Paris.

Armenian Group Denies Bombing

[Text] Beirut, Jan 20 (AFP)--An anonymous man today denied here that the "Commando for Justice for the Genocide of Armenians" was responsible for a bomb attack last night on the U.S. airline TWA's Madrid offices.

In a call to AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE here, the man said in English that the group had nothing to do with the attack and in fact condemned it. However, he made no mention of the other attacks last night on British Airways, Swissair and the Belgian Sabena offices, which an earlier anonymous call to AFP in Madrid claimed for the Armenian group.

OLESEN REJECTS TASS REMARKS ON NATO STRATEGY

NC202103 Paris AFP in English 2052 GMT 20 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Copenhagen, Jan. 20 (AFP)--Danish Foreign Minister Kueld Olesen today categorically rejected yesterday's comment by the Soviet news agency TASS that NATO's European strategy threatened the stability of Northern Europe.

Speaking in a Danish radio broadcast, Mr Olesen lashed out at the TASS report which charged that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was seeking to attain military superiority in Europe.

Mr Olesen criticized the report's conclusion that the Soviet Union and its allies should do something to re-establish a balance, stressing that the U.S.S.R. had not only deployed its own SS-20 nuclear missiles, but also maintained distinct superiority in conventional weapons.

"Unfortunately, I must interpret the TASS report as part of a concerted Soviet propaganda campaign", Mr Olesen said, adding: "The Soviet press is not free, and TASS only writes what has been accepted politically."

Soviet activity in the northern region near Norway is being followed with considerable concern, Mr Olesen said.

He told listeners that in response to Soviet "propaganda," Denmark should both take a firm stance and give detente a chance.

FINLAND

'ANXIETY' FOLLOWS SOVIET INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN

ID181205 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 16 Jan 80 p 8 LD

[AFTENPOSTEN correspondent dispatch: "Finnish Anxiety Following Incursion"]

[Text] Helsinki, 15 January--The Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan immediately caused noticeable anxiety in Finland and among the country's political leadership. Because of its geopolitical situation, Finland is extremely vulnerable to any change in the Soviet Union's relations with its neighbors and other great powers. Today, however, it is considered that the Afghan crisis will have hardly any consequences for Finland.

In the UN General Assembly Finland chose to abstain from voting following the debate on the Soviet incursion into Afghanistan. Yet there was a statement that clearly laid down that "it is important that normal conditions in Afghanistan be resotred as soon as possible and that the foreign troops be withdrawn in accordance with the statements that have been made."

This implies a certain heightening of the official Finnish stance, which at first was very carefully worded. The official reason for Finland's abstention is that the country's traditional policy of neutrality does not permit the adoption of a stance in conflicts between the great powers.

It is hardly any exaggeration to say that the news of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan caused great anxiety and consternation among the Finns. Immediately there were some spontaneous demands for condemnation in newspapers' correspondence columns, and some of the minor opposition parties took this step. The major parties maintained a cautious, wait-and-see attitude and contented themselves with deploring the fact that the crisis was intensifying after what had happened.

The first official Finnish reaction then came on New Year's Eve, in the form of a brief Foreign Ministry announcement citing the Soviet explanation that the troops are to be withdrawn from Afghanistan as soon as the situation allows. "Thus the situation in Afghanistan may be restored to normal as soon as possible--something which the Finnish Government deems in line with the aims of the sides and of the international community," it stated.

The wording could thus be interpreted as a cautious expression of the desire for Soviet withdrawal. The text, according to well informed sources, was written by senior officials in the Foreign Ministry without Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen's knowledge. However, President Urho Kekkonen, who was informed of the Soviet view on Afghanistan by Ambassador Sobolev, had approved the statement before it was published.

Directly revealing was a subsequent interview with influential Foreign Under Secretary Keijo Korhonen published in HUFVUDSTADSBLADET. Korhonen declared that there is nevertheless no risk of armed conflict between the great powers, and he also stressed the importance of the fact that Finland in this sensitive situation remains outside great-power conflicts in accordance with its traditional policy. This includes the practice of not condemning other countries.

In this regard, it was clear from the start that Finland would abstain from voting in the United Nations on the demand for the withdrawal of Soviet forces. Yet the Finnish Government believed that in the explanation of its action there were grounds for stressing the importance of national self-determination and the rightfulness of the foreign troops being withdrawn.

In the internal Finnish debate on the events in Afghanistan anxieties have often been expressed over the fact that Finland, like Afghanistan, has a treaty of friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance with the Soviet Union. "Can we be sure that this treaty will not be exploited in the same way as in Afghanistan?" has been asked. The replies to this question have generally been reassuring. Political observers and experts have pointed to the great differences between conditions in Finland and Afghanistan, while also referring to the differences in the content of the two treaties.

Among those who have expressed themselves on this point is former Finnish UN Ambassador Max Jacobsen: "Finland's status as an independent neutral state constitutes part of the stable system in Europe, whose preservation has been the guideline for the Soviet Union's policy since World War II. There is no indication that the Soviet policy has thus been changed or is about to be changed.

'NO AGREEMENT' IN SOVIET-FINNISH OIL TALKS

LD181653 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The Finnish state oil company Neste Osakoyhtioe and the Soviet All-Union Association for the Export and Import of Petroleum and Petroleum Products [soyuznefteeksport] are to continue talks in February on the prices of crude oil to be imported to Finland this year. No agreement was reached between the two sides on the price of oil in the talks conducted in Helsinki yesterday and today. According to a statement issued by Neste the reaching of agreement on prices is hindered by the still very confused situation in the international crude oil market. For this reason both sides need to make additional studies on the question of prices. But the two sides did reach agreement in the talks on several other matters connected with oil deliveries. Neste and Soyuznefteeksport agreed among other things on the timetable for this year's oil deliveries. Neste will import about 7 million tons of crude oil from the Soviet Union this year.

NORWAY

SOVIET VISITS CANCELED, NATO SANCTIONS SUPPORTED

LD181217 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 15 Jan 80 p 9 LD

[Nils Morten Udgaard report: "Norway's Punitive Measures Against Soviet Union"]

[Excerpts] The cancellation or postponement of some official Soviet visits and support for joint punitive economic measures within NATO--these will be Norway's reaction to the Soviet Union's entry into Afghanistan in Christmas week. The measures will be discussed in the NATO Council in Brussels today, authoritative Norwegian sources said.

AFTENPOSTEN has reason to assume that Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Igor Zemskov has himself recently canceled the visit to Oslo planned for January-February. Normally, he has talks every year with the foreign under secretary, alternately in Oslo and Moscow. As part of a similar exchange of visits, Soviet Deputy Defense Minister I.G. Pavolovskiy was to have paid a visit to Norway 5-10 May. This visit will also be canceled or postponed indefinitely. In addition, Rear Adm C.H. Herlofsen, inspector general of the navy, was planning a visit to the Soviet Union in March, which will also be canceled. Finally, the Norwegian side will take no initiative to implement an anticipated reciprocal Norwegian-Soviet naval visit this year.

In the culture sector, there are few official projects in progress at the moment, and these will not be affected. Nor does Norway intend to recall Dagfinn Stenseth, its ambassador in Moscow, prominent Norwegian sources are saying.

Here the Norwegian side has established four conditions for our reaction: First, the reaction must bear most directly on the situation in Afghanistan--it ought to be conveyed especially by the countries in the area and the nonalined countries. Second, the reactions should not directly involve the East-West talks on arms control. Third, Norway does not want the reaction to involve bilateral Norwegian-Soviet relations in the north--either the unresolved border issues or the fishing issues. It is also in NATO's interest to preserve a low level of tension in the north, leading figures in the Foreign Ministry stress. Finally, Norway will advocate giving support to refugees from the Afghan invasion.

Norway's principled stance, as also expressed at the United Nations, is that the Afghanistan incursion cannot be excused, that it is clear interference in the country's internal affairs and a threat to peace and security, and that the Soviet troops must be immediately withdrawn.

SOVIET TROOP MOVEMENTS NEAR BORDER 'UNPRECEDENTED'

PA211327 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1038 GMT 21 Jan 80 PA

[Text] Oslo, 21 Jan (EFE)--The Norwegian townsfolk in Kirkenes, near the Soviet Union, have been noticing movements of motorized Soviet troops near the border between the two countries in the past few days.

Compared with past activities, the present maneuvers are unprecedented.

The situation has given rise to such nervousness in the border area in Finmark that rumors circulated to the effect that the Soviet troops had violated the Norwegian border.

The Soviet military activity across the border has been confirmed by the commanding office of the Norwegian military garrison in the area, which said "this does not necessarily mean anything abnormal is occurring."

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and charges by the TASS news agency that Norway is endangering peace in the Finmark region have extremely sensitized the population and the garrison in that area.

The sky has been clear in the past few days, and the high visibility has made it easier to focus attention on activities on the Soviet side.

The nervousness reached a climax when Soviet reconnaissance planes were sighted while landing maneuvers were being carried out on the other side of the border.

All of these operations began the first week of January prior to TASS reports violently denouncing allegedly provocative activities on the Norwegian territory.

According to reliable reports, Norway has at no time stepped up routine military activities in the area bordering on the Soviet Union. Military leave to soldiers in the garrison has been granted routinely.

Norway keeps an infantry battalion in the military region of Varanger-South has been trols the entire area along the Soviet border. It is composed of 500 men and a company in charge of patrolling the border area.

It differs from a normal battalion only in that the garrison at Varanger-South has been equipped all these years with antitank artillery of the Carl Gustav and Tow types, with a high firing capability.

According to INTERNATIONAL DEFENSE REVIEW, the Norwegian battalion's defense capability in case of an attack might prove to be a token capability.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON MILITARY, ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF SECURITY

LD210909 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 8 Jan 80 p 6 LD

[Unattributed report: "Norway Will Follow Up Negotiation Offer"]

[Text] The Norwegian Government considers it an important responsibility to contribute to the follow up to the negotiation offer formulated when the NATO Council of Ministers discussed the modernization of its nuclear weapons in December, Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg stressed in a lecture to the Oslo Military Society last night.

The defense minister said he believes that without this negotiation offer we would have been almost empty handed at the beginning of the eighties as regards achieving control of the development of nuclear weapons in both East and West.

Stoltenberg drew attention to the great commitment in Norway and the West to the question of nuclear rearmament. He said he believes that the debate was conducted objectively. There was no disagreement with regard to opposition to such weapons but the discussion concerned the way to proceed in order to control the arms race.

It is disturbing that a similar commitment is not apparent among public opinion in the Soviet Union, the defense minister said.

Stoltenberg also stressed that the question of security and peace depends far more on a greater effort to reduce the poverty gap in the world.

Without a contribution to such a development, our security policy will be shortsighted. The industrial countries' economy must be adapted to the reality of the eighties in order to offer greater security to all. In the Western industrial countries we must be careful about being so concerned about the East-West balance that we do not see the development which in this sphere will be central for us all at the end of this century, Stoltenberg said.

The defense minister also indicated that the Norwegian Armed Forces will face great tasks in the years to come. Among the tasks which will be given priority when we have finished paying for the F-16 aircraft in the mid-eighties, Stoltenberg mentioned specifically the air defenses of our airfields and army units, field vehicles for the army, improvement of the coast guard, procurement of new submarines and a number of measures in the construction sector. The planning of this work occupies us greatly today, Stoltenberg said.

The defense minister opined that in the eighties there will be greater interest and openness in the discussion of security and defense policy issues. Regarding the armed forces' situation in the eighties, he said that he believes that more importance will be attached to that section of security policy which affects North-South problems, the relationship between the rich established part of the world and the part which is outside the international decisionmaking process--where the majority live in poverty. We have to regard it as security policy to give priority to the work for a new world economic order in addition to military defense. They are both factors in our country's contribution to peace in the world, Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg stressed.

GOVERNMENT TO PREPARE DRAFT CONSTITUTION FOR FEDERAL SOLUTION

NC190740 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 19 Jan 80 p 1 NC

[Text] The Cyprus Government will prepare a draft constitution that will spell out the Greek Cypriot views about a federal solution and has invited constitutional experts from abroad to assist. This was revealed by House President Alekos Mikhailidhis yesterday during his television interview when he was asked about the AKEL proposal for presentation of a draft constitution at the next round of intercommunal talks.

Mr Mikhailidhis explained that the constitution will be prepared in order to lay down the Greek Cypriot views but will not be presented at talks, though it might be presented at some stage.

The House president said that the president invited two constitutional experts from abroad--he did not say their nationality--who will cooperate with a "working group" headed by the president himself. Other members of the working group include House President Mikhailidhis, Foreign Minister Mr Rolandhis, the Greek Cypriot negotiator to the intercommunal talks Mr Yeoryios Ioannidhis and his two advisers--Supreme Court President Mr M. Triandafillidhis and Mrs Stella Soulioti, herself a lawyer and former minister of justice.

The draft constitution will be guided by the agreements of the Makarios-Denktas and the Kiprianou-Denktas [talks] and other basic principles already agreed, he said.

Mr Mikhailidhis denied that preparations of such a draft constitution implied a concession. It was a necessary tool for the negotiating team and was another proof of the seriousness with which the talks are being approached, he said.

In answer to other questions, Mr Mikhailidhis said that personally he was in favour of giving consideration to the American plan for discussion. The plan, submitted to the two sides in November 1978, included a provision for the placing of Famagusta under the UN and return of the inhabitants to their homes, but this was rejected by the Turkish and the Greek Cypriot sides.

He also said that the seat for opposition [Democratic] Rally leader Mr Glavkos Kliridhis in the National Council was waiting for him.

TURKISH CYPRIOT LABOR UNIONS SUPPORT INDEPENDENCE

TA201500 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1300 GMT 20 Jan 80 TA

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot Federation of Labor Unions [Turk-Sen] and the Turkish Railways Labor Unions Federation have expressed the view that if the Greek Cypriots continue their efforts to avoid the talks, to threaten the Turkish Cypriot community at international forums and to economically destroy it, an independent Turkish Cypriot state should be declared with the support of the motherland. In a joint press release issued after their meeting yesterday, the two federations expressed support for the resumption of the intercommunal talks which is the only way to reach a just and peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem. They also expressed the belief that unilateral decisions taken or to be taken at international forums where the Turkish Cypriots' side is not represented cannot bring a just and realistic solution to the Cyprus problem. The two federations also expressed their support for a bizonal federal Cyprus republic based on a geographic foundation with a Turkish guarantee. The federations also stated that they will support efforts by the Turkish Cypriot community aimed at speeding up unity with the motherland in all spheres.

RIZOSPASTIS REPORTS ARRIVAL OF U.S. SPECIAL FORCES

['Exclusive' report: "U.S. 'Immediate Intervention' Units Are in Our Country"]

[Text] Units of U.S. "immediate intervention" forces, earmarked for operations in the areas of the Persian Gulf and the Near East, recently arrived and are stationed at the bases of Nea Makri and Ellinikon. Their numerical strength is several hundred men. It is not known whether their presence on the U.S. bases in Attica, in other words in the capital's environs, received the official approval of the government. Appropriate authorities, in any case, maintain absolute silence. It is quite likely that the presence of these "special" forces is in their full knowledge.

Stationing of "immediate intervention" units in Greece falls within a more general plan for their advance toward the Near East and is combined with other extortionist military measures decided upon and now being implemented by the U.S. Pentagon (presence of aircraft in the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean, activization of U.S bases in the area, etc.)

Greek territory and particularly Crete are considered of exceptional strategic importance by the U.S.-NATO staff officers within the framework of the new "defense systems" that are being prepared for the east Mediterranean and the Middle East. In reference to this we mention plans for establishing an extremely broad "electronic circuit" with the bases on Crete, Cyprus and Egypt as the main links, as recently revealed by RIZOSPASTIS.

Certain indications reveal that the preparatory work for this plan is already in progress with the increase of electronic equipment on these bases. It is even reported that very modern electronic equipment has already been delivered to Crete directly from the United States. This equipment has already been installed at locations as yet not known.

This U.S. military activity, which is now spreading to Greece, strengthens well founded concern over the danger of our country's involvement in possible activities in our area. The government has a duty to fully inform the Greek people on these probable developments into which Greece is being irrevocably drawn. Most important, the government must publicly and clearly declare that Greek territories will not be used in the development of dangerous U.S. plans. In this way it will determinedly prevent U.S. cold war activities in our country.

U.S. RESPONSIBILITY OVER AEGEAN OPERATIONAL CONTROL NOTED

[Article by Yiannis Kartalis: "U.S. Military Aircraft on Crete Will Undertake Aegean Operational Control According to NATO's Latest Plans"]

[Text] U.S. military aircraft to be based on Crete will take over operational control over the Aegean on behalf of NATO. This is the "new element" in General Rogers' "new plan" for Greece's return to the alliance's military wing. This "new plan" was inserted by the "U.S. factor" between the Greek and Turkish zones of responsibility and it is believed to be a "discovery" which will soon be submitted to the Athens and Ankara governments for consideration.

According to TO VIMA exclusive information from NATO's headquarters, which was also confirmed by Western diplomatic sources in Athens, the Rogers plan will provide for control over NATO's operational responsibility area in the Aegean by a U.S. Air Force contingent to be headquartered at the U.S. base at Souda, Crete.

This "arrangement" according to the same sources, first guarantees a stronger presence of the U.S. Air Force in the Middle East area, which is taking on added importance after developments in Afghanistan and the possible threat in the Balkans; second, it provides a "technical" solution to the "political" problem of Greek-Turkish differences in the Aegean.

Those who inspired the plan present the solution of the U.S. military aircraft as an "active and effective guarantee" that Turkey will not now be able to undertake an aggressive act against Greece in the area of the Aegean.

It must be noted that as yet the Greek Government has no official knowledge of the new Rogers plan or of the various arrangements it provides and that it does not deny that "unofficially" it was informed of the existence of "three zones" as revealed by TO VIMA last Sunday.

As already reported the first zone will cover Greek territorial waters and the air-space over the eastern shores of continental Greece and it will be under the control of the Greek Armed Forces. The second zone will be under the control of the Turkish Armed Forces and will cover Turkish territorial waters and the Turkish airspace over the eastern shores of Asia Minor.

The third zone over which, as it is now revealed, there will be full U.S. control from the viewpoint of NATO operational responsibility, will cover the entire area of the Aegean from the line of the "Greek zone" to the equivalent line of the "Turkish zone."

It must be explained here that division of these zones will have to do strictly with operational control related to the alliance and it will not be a precedent for settling Greek-Turkish differences in the Aegean.

As officially announced yesterday these differences will be examined in Ankara on 18 and 19 February by the secretaries general of the Greek and Turkish foreign ministries.

GOVERNMENT OPPOSES ANY INTERVENTION IN YUGOSLAVIA

AT191450 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 19 Jan 80 p AT

[Text] According to an authoritative government spokesman, the Greek Government opposes any intervention by third countries in Yugoslav internal affairs. The same spokesman added that it has been a firm policy of the Karamanlis government during the past 6 years to preserve a climate of detente and cooperation between all Balkan countries. At the same time the government believes that ideological clashes and foreign influences should be kept out of the area.

According to the views of this spokesman the Soviet Union does not intend to take any initiative in Yugoslavia during the first phase because of the international furor created by its military invasion in Afghanistan in addition to other reasons.

[Text] Turkey has lifted economic sanctions against Zimbabwe-Rhodesia, which were being imposed in accordance with UN resolutions. The Council of Ministers decision on the subject was published in the official gazette today.

The United Nations had decided to impose economic sanctions against Rhodesia following the unilateral declaration of independence from Britain by the minority government in 1965. Some time ago the United Nations cancelled the decision to impose economic sanctions against Zimbabwe Rhodesia when a temporary government took over last year and it was announced that general elections would be held.

VOTCP WARNS AGAINST CANCELLATION OF PACT WITH USSR

[Unattributed commentary]

[Excerpts] Demirel, the head of the pro-American, pro-NATO and pro-martial law government, held a 3-hour meeting with the chief of the General Staff and the force commanders last week. At the end of the meeting, he made a statement about who is responsible to whom in preparing for war. While talking about anarchy and divisionism, Demirel clearly talked about a preparation for war. This came after a 3-hour meeting with the generals, who issued an ultimatum recently. Preparation for war--why, against whom? This was the question in the mind of every citizen. However, Demirel's vague statements did not supply any answers.

Yet the answer was in all the bourgeois papers such as Demirel's child, HAVADIS, the TERCUMAN of the Ilicak monopoly, which is an agency for the American ITT, the fascist Nationalist Action Party's HERGUN and the Maoist Perincek's AYDINLIK. These newspapers are full of the lies and speculations concocted by imperialist propaganda and by the enemies of peace and detente about the eevelopments in Afghanistan.

The entire bourgeois press, from the extreme reactionary to the moderate, carries the lies and speculations of U.S. imperialism interwoven with insolent anti-Sovietism and anticommunism. This press is carrying out an incredible slander campaign against our great neighbor, the Soviet Union, which is known to our people as our friend in need. It is also openly making war provocations. The bourgeois press portrays the Soviet economic, political, diplomatic and military aid to the Afghan people--extended upon the request of its legal government and in accordance with existing agreements and with legal UN principles--as an interference in Afghanistan's internal affairs and an occupation. It then says: "Yesterday it was Afghanistan. Will it be Iran and Turkey tomorrow?"--a shameless provocation.

What are the conditions under which all these things are being done? A few days before Demirel talked about preparation for war, a new secret slavery agreement was signed between Turkey and the United States in Ankara. Under this new agreement the United States will establish new military bases and nuclear arsenals on Turkish soil and it will also enlarge and equip the existing U.S. and NATO bases with new weapons. The official FRG news agency revealed this.

At about the same time, the Turkish representative at the United Nations, Organ Eralp, said that Turkey would review the political document that was signed with the Soviet Union that envisages the development of friendly relations between the two neighboring countries. It is obviously not a coincidence that this irresponsible statement was made after Carter unilaterally cancelled a series of agreements between the Soviet Union and the United States.

There is a principle that constitutes the foundations of good relations between the two neighboring countries and peoples in the Turkish-Soviet political document. That principle says: The two countries will not allow their lands, territorial waters and air space to be used in attacks against each other. Now, to say that Turkey will change the document that includes this principle means that Turkey will allow its territory to be used in an attack agaisnt the Soviet Union.

There is no connection between the Turkish Government's attitude toward the political document and the developments in Afghanistan. The negotiations over the agreement that was recently signed with the United States, which further opens our lands to the imperialists for an attack against the Soviet Union, have been going on for years. Eralp's remarks are nothing but a revelation of the Turkish collaborationist circles' deeds.

If, after the U.S. administration's actions [in cancelling agreements] the Turkish Government reviews the agreements signed with the Soviet Union, Turkey will become an unreliable party in international relations. It will negatively affect Turkish-Soviet relations, and above all, it will greatly damage the mutual cooperation which is to the benefit of both countries and peoples.

At the beginning of this article we said that Demirel had talked about who is responsible to whom in preparing for war. The prime minister had said that the commanders are responsible to him in preparing for war. Who is, in fact, responsible to whom? Every person who resorts to war should know that he will be responsible to our people and to the world's peace forces. Those who commit crimes against peace will not be left unpunished by the peoples.

DEMIREL OPTIMISTIC GOVERNMENT WILL OVERCOME PROBLEMS

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has noted that the government is relentlessly dealing with the country's problems and asked those who criticize the government to be reasonable. President Fahri Koruturk received at the Cankaya Mansion at 1700 today. On his way out of the Cankaya Mansion at the end of the meeting, which lasted more than 1 hour, Demirel replied to questions by journalists. Reiterating that Turkey's major problem is the struggle agaisnt anatchy, terror, destructiveness and secessionism, Demirel said that the government is working with all its power to secure law and order. Demirel noted that all state institutions as well as the citizens should exert efforts to acheive the same goals. He continues:

[Begin Demirel recording] The second biggest problem of the country is economic difficulties. Neither anarchy nor economic difficulties were created within the past few months. We did not create this critical situation. We inherited this critical situation and we are attempting to improve it. Do not ask me when the situation will improve. We are trying. We are dealing with the problems with all our power. We are exerting all efforts in the face of strong winter weather. We will succeed in this as well. It is our government which is trying to save Turkey from shortages, control inflation and reactivate the paralyzed -- for many months -- Turkish economy. I am aware that our citizens are suffering from a cold winter. I noted on numerous occasions that we are at the beginning of a severe winter and that we are unprepared for it. I noted this while describing Turkey as of November 1979. I am not complaining. I am merely saying that we are seeking solutions to great problems. [end recording]

Demirel stated that his government is not evading problems. However these problems cannot tolerate demagogy. Pointing out that those who criticize the government should view matters in a reasonable manner, Demirel recalled that it takes 45 days for crude oil to arrive from the Persian Gulf. He noted: We will not be crushed by these conditions. We will overcome these problems.

In reply to a journalist's question on when the economic measures package will be announced, Demirel said that these reports [about the economic measures package] do not originate from the government.

Another journalist asked Demirel his view on the fact that the National Salvation Party voted together with the RPP during debates on draft bills despite their promise to support the government when it was formed. Demirel replied:

[Begin Demirel recording] The conditions in which the support was given are clear. We did not claim the support, however, they can extend support if they wish. This government was formed on the basis of [words indistinct]. The government was formed on the condition that approval will be given for the following: vote of confidence, anarchy bills, martial law, support for the government against insubstantive interpellation proposals, certain economic measures and the bill on the state radio and television. Our government is not based on a parliamentary majority. It is a government of duty. We are relentlessly engaged in attempts to save our country from chaos without any ulterior motives for power. Our goal is to serve [our country]. This is the way you should view us and I do not want to argue any further. A major part of the anarchy bills have been approved by parliament. I believe the amendments will also be approved by parliament within the next week without changing the essence of the laws and within the framework of a large program [words indistinct]. [end recording]

In reply to another question, Demirel said that he views with understanding the differences of opinion within the RPP and noted: I believe that common sense will help Turkey find the right path. We do not veer from our goal. Our goal is the well-being of Turkey and we will continue to seek this well-being. We will cooperate with whomever wishes to be on our side. It is up to us to seek unity. We will not be hurt or offended if it is for the sake of Turkey.

RPP SECRETARY GENERAL SCORES GOVERNMENT POLICIES

TA181608 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1550 GMT 18 Jan TA

[Text] Ankara 18 Jan (AA)--Republican People's Party Secretary General Mustafa Ustundag claimed Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel was insisting on perpetuating erroneous policies he had followed in the past.

Speaking at a party gathering in Nigde, Ustandag claimed many qualified civil servants and workers were being dismissed by the new administration, several government departments "occupied" by certain groups of militants, homes, shops and party buildings bombed. Yet, he complained, the prime minister still refrained from condemning the group of terrorists at one extreme.

He deplored the tendency of such policies to push Turkish society toward division into hostile camps instead of unity, and the economy into stagnation.

EUROPEAN FOREIGN MINISTERS CONDEMN USSR INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN

AU182010 Rome ANSA in English 1950 GMT 18 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Strasbourg, January 18, (ANSA)--The foreign ministers from the twenty-one member nations of the Council of Europe, meeting in extraordinary session here, today approved a statement condemning the December 27 Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and terming it "a flagrant violation of international law".

According to the document passed by the advisory body, the Soviet move raises serious questions on Moscow's real intentions as regards the detente process.

The foreign ministers, considering that "peace is indivisible" also called for the total and unconditional withdrawal of all foreign troops from Afghanistan and place emphasis on the right of the Afghan people to determine their own future without foreign interference.

CARRINGTON COMMENTS ON TOUR OF ISLAMIC COUNTRIES

LD181720 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1645 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington returned to London today after his tour of countries concerned over the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Lord Carrington told reporters at Heathrow airport that "without exception" all the countries were worried about what had happened.

"I suppose the country most worried was Pakistan," he said. "They now feel they have the Soviet Union on their Western borders and are very much at risk."

Lord Carrington said he found the trip useful. After briefing his British colleagues, he would be consulting Britain's allies. He said it was predictable that the Western countries would condemn the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. But what was not predictable was the way the non-aligned countries had also expressed their anxiety.

The Soviet action has also outraged the Muslim world.

Lord Carrington said he had not discussed in any of the countries a possible boycott of the Moscow Olympic games or even a change of venue for them.

He had nothing to say about the British naval vessel which had been switched to the Mediterranean at short notice, having originally been due to sail to the Caribbean.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES SECOND STATEMENT ON AFGHANISTAN

LD211125 Brussels LE SOIR in French 16 Ja 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "NATO and the EEC Examine Russian Intervention in Afghanistan"]

[Excerpts] Brussels, this Tuesday, is the focus of EEC and NATO attention to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The Nine's foreign ministers on the one hand and the NATO Council on the other are meeting, in effect, to try to achieve harmony.

For its part, the Belgian Government published a statement on Monday on Afghanistan basically condemning the Soviet intervention which is "worsening international relations," and affirming that detente cannot survive in an atmosphere of threats and violent coups.

This is the second Belgian Government statement on Afghanistan. The government considered it useful to restate its position on the eve of the two Brussels international meetings, not because it reveals any divergence with Belgium's partners but because the first, on 31 December, passed practically unnoticed in the political turmoil here at the time and perhaps because it was New Year's Eve.... So, on Monday the Belgian Government "condemned the Soviet armed intervention in Afghanistan as constituting a violation of the fundamental principles of international law and the UN Charter.

"Belgium has never spared its efforts for detente, which is the only way of insuring peace on a lasting basis in an interdependent world. Detente is indivisible. It must be based on the fundamental respect of national independence and presupposes a general move toward moderation and dialog. It cannot survive in an atmosphere of threats and violent coups.

"Thus," the statement continues, "the Belgian Government considers that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan should be met by an equal reaction among the countries supporting peace."

Recalling the UN Security Council and General Assembly meetings and Belgium's part in the NATO and EEC meetings, the statement concludes:

"Remaining deeply committed to detente, which must be pursued because it is mutually beneficial and has no alternative but return to cold war, the Belgian Government states that the foreign military intervention in Afghanistan will lead to a serious and predictable deterioration in the climate of international relations. This problem does not only concern East-West relations. It concerns the peoples of the whole world."

LE MONDE WEIGHS LATEST GOVERNMENT CRISIS

[Editorial: "The Permanent Crisis"]

[Text] By dismissing three ministers, Belgian leader M Wilfried Martens has managed to save his government. But once again the cost is borne by the French-speakers in general, the people of Brussels in particular and by one of the small linguistic groups that the large traditional parties are always ready to squash.

Three years ago it was the Walloon Rally whose representatives were driven from power. Now the mainly Brussels-based French-Speaking Front [FDF] is isolated, deprived of all linguistic and political solidarity because it wanted the agreement on Brussels as the third region to be respected. Replacing its ministers by two Socialists and a Social Christian [French wing] will deal with the immediate general problems, but nothing is resolved on regionalization. M Martens no longer has the two-thirds majority to win the vote.

Equally, will this "state reform," which will break up a united Belgium, have to yield to economic and social demands? The campaign against unemployment has hitherto been ineffective; Belgium has the second-highest unemployment in Europe with more than 300,000 or 7.5 percent of the working population unemployed. The 1979 social security deficit reached the equivalent of [presumably French]Fr3.5 billion and will double in 1980. The 28-day old doctors strike is hardening and negotiations are at a standstill. Similarly, talks on reducing the working day await government intervention. In defense of the currency, in 1979 the national bank had to draw on its reserves to the equivalent of FR13 billion.

There is not only a parallel but a direct interaction between partition into two or three regions and reforming or cleaning up the economy, insofar as the Flemings accuse the Walloons of sponging off them. The economic program bill was blocked because the community bill was at a standstill. This does not mean that an eventual vote on the first text will make it easier to apply the second.

For pragmatism dominates Flemish strategy, constantly putting in doubt the Egmont Pacts of the last 4 years or their amendment. The French-speaking parties, trapped between their great party aspirations, feel threatened by groups which defend primarily the ethnic and linguistic reality. The charge is leveled at the FDF that it has only 11 out of 212 seats with which justifiably to arbitrate in difficult debates and influence the large parties but also properly to defend, at all political and administrative levels of an extraordinarily complicated regional structure, a Brussels community trapped between Flanders and Wallonia both of which tend to deny its very existence.

This predominance of regional if not ethnic strategy weakens political programs and ideological objectives. Socialists or Social Christians tend to oppose minority groups expressing the will of the communities to survive. Reduced in status by the proliferation of assemblies, the parliamentary system constantly imposes its law to preserve the very balance which impedes government, hence the permanent Belgian crisis.

FOREIGN MINISTER GENSCHER COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH VANCE

[Excerpts] Washington--According to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Europeans should not cherish the illusion that they can keep out of the Afghanistan conflict. Following his consultations with U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance in Washington, Genscher called again on Monday evening for the formulation of an overall concept with which the West should oppose further Soviet expansionist moves.

In a talk with German journalists, Genscher said that the Americans accept the idea of a division of labor among the allies, adding that details ought to be formulated in the relevant bodies of the Western alliance. Genscher sees the German role here as being mainly in Europe and the Third World. He said that one active contribution by Bonn would be an increase of aid to Turkey under German leadership to buttress this cornerstone of the Western alliance politically and economically.

Genscher is also thinking in terms of closer cooperation with the Arab states along the lines of the agreements between the European Community and the ASEAN states, which intend to sign a cooperation treaty soon. Genscher considers it particularly important that the West draw closer to the Third World. He said that the developing countries are just as affected by the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan as Europe and America. This closer cooperation ought to be set in motion without preconditions.

According to Genscher, these ideas fell on fruitful soil in Washington. Carter's administration largely shared these views. But Genscher made no bones about the fact that the United States expects real efforts from its allies. It is also important to make it clear to Moscow that Europe and America consider their interests equally affected. "We are in the same boat," Genscher said. Soviet efforts to undermine Western solidarity must be opposed resolutely.

Following the talk with Vance, Genscher called for a continuation of the policy of detente in Europe; the West's relevant proposals are still on the table. Genscher does not obviously consider further sanctions against Iran a topical issue since Iran's territorial integrity is now threatened by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Regarding the hostages, he said there are certain developments that have to be awaited. He also gained the impression in his talks with Vance that the United States would welcome fresh movement in the Middle East dialog. The differences between Egypt and the moderate Arab states have to be overcome. Genscher described the atmosphere in his talks with Vance as "very friendly." The United States understood that Bonn views the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan as a challenge to Europe and the United States equally.

SCHMIDT CONFERS WITH COSSIGA, THATCHER ON AFGHANISTAN

LD221024 Hamburg DPA in German 0950 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--A government spokesman announced in Bonn today that in the past few days Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has conferred by telephone with Italian Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher about events in Afghanistan. The spokesman said that the two telephone calls consisted of an exchange of views on the crisis that has arisen in the wake of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the effect of this situation on East-West and North-South relations.

OLYMPIC BOYCOTT ISSUE EVOKES REACTION

SPD Opposes Boycott

LD220040 Hamburg DPA in German 1525 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--SPD Manager Egon Bahr has emphasized his party's opposition to a boycott of the Olympics. He told Europawelle Saar in an interview today that such a measure could not induce the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan within the period of 1 month demanded by President Jimmy Carter. Bahr said that, in terms of what Carter intended, the SPD has no reason to change its attitude toward an Olympic boycott. He does not believe the Soviet Union will leave Afghanistan within 4 weeks.

Asked whether the Federal Government could give its National Olympic Committee a recommendation differing from that of the United States, the leading Western power, Bahr said that is a matter for the Federal Government. The situation is becoming more difficult, but the Federal Republic could not beat about the bush because of its solidarity with the United States if it believed that some measure or other is not beneficial or might not even serve Western interests.

CDU Support

LD211304 Hamburg DPA in German 1222 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--The CDU supports American President Jimmy Carter's boycott ultimatum against staging the Olympic games in Moscow. At a meeting in Bonn today the CDU Presidium drew up a resolution stating that, following the entry of Soviet troops into Afghanistan, which was a threat to peace in the world, participation in the games in Moscow would run counter to the Olympic ideal. "The CDU therefore supports the stand taken by the American president and asks the appropriate German sporting bodies to forego participation in the Olympics in Moscow should the Soviet Union not withdraw its troops from Afghanistan."

Olympic Official Opposed

[Text] Munich--Following the threat of an American boycott by U.S. President Carter, Willi Daume, president of the National Olympic Committee (NOC) for Germany, is against boycotting the Olympic games in Moscow. Daume said today in Munich: "My personal conviction is and remains that boycotts in sports are not a suitable means of solving political problems." The NOC president flies to Bonn this afternoon to discuss the new situation with Federal Government representatives.

Daume announced that an NOC general meeting will be convened if a decision has to be taken on whether a team from the Federal Republic is to go to Moscow. The NOC president, who is also a member of the International Olympic Committee, again called for "calm and level-headedness." A further inflammation of the situation has to be avoided.

Daume is considering inviting the West European Olympic committees to a meeting to discuss the situation following Carter's boycott threat.

SPD's Wischnewski Interviewed

DW220924 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0618 GMT 21 Jan 80 DW

[Correspondent Lenz interview with SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski in Bonn--apparently live by telephone]

[Text] [Question] Last night U.S. President Carter made it clear that U.S. athletes will not participate in the Olympic games in Moscow unless the Soviet Union withdraws its troops from Afghanistan within a month. He has asked the states of the world at large, and the allies in NATO specifically, for solidarity in this action. Can this solidarity be turned down?

[Answer] To begin with, I must say that the President of the United States can address such a request only to his National Olympic Committee and ask them not to participate in the games. The situation in the United States in that respect is the same as in the Federal Republic.

[Question] I might add that Carter also said that in the event the National Olympic Committee declines to cooperate there will not be any passports for the athletes.

[Answer] Really? I did not catch that passage. In any event, what I wanted to say was that just as in the Federal Republic, sports in the United States will decide this matter. I have great understanding for the position of the U S. President in this situation. This is why I feel it is absolutely appropriate for the Federal Republic to say that we first want to talk with the sports organizations of the Federal Republic.

[Question] You mean exert influence on them to join the boycott?

[Answer] To tell them what they think over there, what they intend to do over there. It is, I believe, a foregone conclusion that we in the European Community should try to form an opinion since it is important to achieve a consensus. So far I have the impression that there are different views on the issue in the world at large just as in the Federal Republic.

[Question] Thus, a boycott on the part of the Federal republic only if it is decided unanimously in the European Community and within NATO?

[Answer] No, I do not want to talk about unanimity here. This is a topic which I take so seriously that I think it demands coordination within the European Community. This is an important process. Just as we deal with other important political affairs jointly in European cooperation, it will be necessary to handle this issue the same way. I say all this in full understanding for the position of the U.S. President in this matter. Yet--and this is not the first time I have said this--in any measure taken it is important to ponder every single move, to insure that one does not inflict harm on oneself by that decision.

[Question] But what you are saying conveys the impression that it may well be, tragically, that the Federal Republic must show solidarity even if it believes that not all moves have been properly considered.

[Answer] If we believe that no all moves have been properly considered, we are obligated to talk this over with our friends in the United States.

[Question] Does this still stand a chance?

[Answer] In this particular question I personally do not have this impression. It is my impression that the decision of the U.S. President is absolutely clear for the United States as far as this issue is concerned. It is in general terms that I am saying that each step must be carefully considered to the last move.

[Question] Well, this includes the fact that there is no sympathy for a boycott of the Olympic games in Africa, where many states voted against the Soviet Union in the United Nations when Afghanistan was the issue. Is a boycott of the games not bound to jeopardize the fresh, worldwide solidarity against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan?

[Answer] I can well imagine that the vote in the United Nations--the one we had is even plainer than is reflected by the figures since the Soviet Union in its dissent had three votes to cast, something which only few people can understand--that the picture in the Third World would definitely be different on an issue such as participating in the Olympic games [sentence as heard]

[Question] Moreover, and this is a question pertaining to us primarily, a Western boycott of the Moscow games would, as sports president Weyer said, result in the fact that the small bud of inter-German sports relations would be trampled to death. That is a steep price.

[Answer] The effects may well be very, very extensive, and I cannot rule out the possibility that such a decision naturally would exert influence on this [inter-German sports]. I believe that actually all political forces in the Federal Republic are aware of it, and I think this is good. We must be interested in preserving, under all circumstances, what we have attained in our relations with the other German state during the past several years under conditions that surely were not so simple.

[Question] The United States expects solidarity from the allies, and not only with respect to the Olympic games. The Federal Republic, however, is in a different situation than the United States in many respects. Economically it is much more dependent on trade with its neighbors. It is more dependent on Iranian oil. It is dependent because of Berlin and because of the inter-German sports relations. For the United States solidarity means all should take the same step; for the Federal Republic it means taking an incomparably greater risk. Is my impression wrong?

[Answer] No, it is not. There are special problems confronting the Federal Republic, to be sure. The Federal Republic is a country for which something special always ensues, especially with respect to West Berlin and all problems thus resulting for the relations with the other German state. This cannot induce us to say we are always entitled to special arrangements in general. It goes without saying that the question concerning solidarity with the United States in this difficult situation is of absolutely decisive significance. But we, for our part, must always keep these other questions in mind and take them into account in our decision-making.

[Question] You mean this might result in differences among the allies?

[Answer] In certain issues I do not see any such differences at all. Taking a highly decisive issue, namely the effort to continue the policy which has benefited Europe in the past few years, detente policy, specifically in the fields of arms limitation and arms control, then I have the impression that the United States has adopted exactly the same attitude in this matter. This likewise holds true for France and other European neighbors. It may not apply to that extent to questions concerning the economic boycott.

[Question] Some partners in NATO, especially the United States and perhaps Great Britain, are especially challenged by the present world crisis. They want to, or must, assume extra burdens, say for the protection of the oil and raw material routes. There is some thought being made to facilitate these additional tasks in that other NATO partners could take over additional tasks. Bonn is obviously pondering this matter. Is it conceivable that, to cite but one example, NATO listening posts in Turkey will be staffed by the Bundeswehr in the future, instead of by U.S. Army personnel?

[Answer] Let me say a very important thing on this matter from the very outset: The opposition, too, is pondering some ideas, for instance, the thesis that the alliance must now be extended far, and essentially, beyond hitherto applicable spheres, in particular toward the south. I feel such thinking is adventurous and dangerous. I am even worried that harm might be inflicted on the alliance so that it might become very difficult to live up to its task, namely, guaranteeing our security. But as far as I am concerned it is a foregone conclusion that certain tasks must be given more importance and that we must be prepared to assume burdens in that respect. Since you refer to Turkey, I may remind you that the Federal Republic in the past several years made an especially great effort to help Turkey. If more is required in the security sector, then the Federal Republic must not, of course, stay aloof but must be prepared to contribute its share.

[Question] Your fellow party member Mattick, the chairman of the Inter-German Affairs Committee of the Bundestag, advocates the view that the Federal Government is in no hurry to have the Schmidt-Honecker meeting. Is this a hint that the spring schedule will be postponed?

[Answer] As far as I know, and you are aware that I am not a member of the government any longer, there are no considerations of any postponement of the deadline. Nor do I see any call for doing so, since I believe that especially in such a situation the chancellor ought to be interested for our benefit in talking with the chairman of the GDR Council of State. I see no call for postponing the deadline; I think this dialog should take place. It is necessary to get away from the wrong supposition that whenever the situation becomes difficult talks should cease. Actually politicians and politics ought to insure, conversely, that contacts are not severed by any interuption of talks, for the important thing is to contain rather than extend conflicts.

BRIEFS

DELEGATION TO RHODESIA--Bonn--A Bonn delegation, comprising government officials and three Bundestag members, will go to Zimbabwe-Rhodesia in February to supervise the elections there. Hans-Dietrich Genscher, federal foreign minister, said today that this would be in line with a suggestion made by the British Government. In the Bundestag debate on Africa, Genscher expressed explicit approval of the results of the London conference on Rhodesia. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 1701 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD]

AID TO AFGHAN REFUGEES--Bonn--The German Red Cross [DRK] has sent the first plane load of woolen blankets and lined jackets valued at DM350,000 to Pakistan for Afghan refugees. This was announced in Bonn today by the organization. DRK workers have already arrived in the Pakistan-Afghan border area where they are distributing aid goods together with colleagues from the Pakistan Red Crescent Society. L'HUMANITE REPORTS MARCHAIS 11 JAN MOSCOW NEWS CONFERENCE

[Apparent text of interview given by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to French television Channel 1 direct from Moscow 11 January: "A Fraternal Discussion Between Two Major Parties"]

[Text] [Question] Were all subjects raised during the talks between the PCF and CPSU delegations?

[Answer] Meetings between PCF and CPSU delegations had prepared for these talks for several months.

First we exchanged information--and I merely say: information--on the situations in our respective countries.

Then we discussed the development of the international situation in all its aspects. We discussed our objectives: both those which are common to both parties and those which are peculiar to each of our parties, in view of the fact that the CPSU is in power and we are not as yet.

Finally, we discussed the problems of cooperation between our parties. This obviously led us to a detailed discussion of such important questions as the building of a socialist society, the development of socialist democracy, the problems of Eurocommunist paths leading to socialism and so forth.

It was after this discussion that we agreed on the joint communique which was published by L'HUMANITE and--in full--by PRAVDA.

[Question] Were you also in Moscow as a representative of Eurocommunism?

Our Attachment to Eurocommunism

[Answer] No, you are becoming confused. Eurocommunism, in short, is simply the fact that a number of communist and workers' parties advocate a democratic path toward socialism and, also, have similar views of socialism--views of a socialism which is itself democratic and based on national traditions and characteristics. It is this which has been termed Eurocommunism. The word does not worry me, as I have already said, and my party has adopted it even though it is an inaccurate term since there are parties moving in this direction not only in Europe but also in Asia and Latin America.

These parties follow the policy of independence and noninterference in their respective internal affairs. Consequently they do not need a spokesman. Each party speaks for itself. In other words, here in Moscow, I am representing the PCF.

In my statement here, therefore, I spoke of Eurocommunism. We spoke of it at our 23rd congress in exactly the same terms as I have used here. I have explained to our Soviet comrades the precise and deep meaning of Eurocommunism and our attachment to Eurocommunism. I also told our friends that Eurocommunism is in a good state--a fact of which the French people are ignorant since television has not said a single word about the joint communique which I adopted with my friend Enrico Berlinguer in Rome, a joint communique which, in fact, notes our cooperation and the numerous initiatives now being taken about which more will be said soon. [answer ends]

Afghanistan Question Should Not Be Separated From International Situation

The journalist then mentioned a telegram sent by Pierre Joxe to Georges Marchais asking him to have the "courage" to tell the truth about events in Afghanistan on the television.

[Answer] Let us forget about Joxe. This is simply a petty political maneuver which will do him no good. Pierre Joxe is an insolent man. I have never practiced insolence toward any politicians at all. This lout can teach me nothing about courage: he is just Francois Mitterrand's little valet.

[Question] It was surprising to see that the joint communique made no mention of Afghanistan....

[Answer] In effect the communique does not mention Afghanistan. Nor does it mention Nicaragua, Cambodia or Vietnam. In other words we have published a communique giving broad information on the positions we share in the international sphere.

Nonetheless we discussed this Afghanistan question at length. We asked our Soviet comrades questions which they answered. I must add that meanwhile we have received precise and detailed information on the events which have taken place from the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan [PDPA].

How can this question be viewed?

First, we French Communists think that the Afghanistan question cannot be separated from the international situation. The characteristic aspect of the international situation, as we say in our joint communique with the CPSU, is an evolution in the world balance of forces in favor of social progress, democracy, peace, independence and socialism. This is true of the socialist countries, the working class in the capitalist countries and the national liberation movement.

In recent years imperialism has suffered resounding defeats in Latin America, Asia and Europe. The most resounding defeat for imperialism was the Vietnamese people's great historic victory.

In these circumstances it is easy to understand that imperialism, in an attempt to prevent the forces of independence and democracy from progressing, is trying to launch a counteroffensive. It is doing so in all spheres: in the economic and military sphere, with NATO's decision to deploy missiles in Europe and imperialism's interventions in Afghanistan.

It is important to realize that this is a country subjected to feudalism in which a handful of extremely rich people live side by side with a poor, illiterate and underdeveloped people. The droit du seigneur exists in Afghanistan. In 1978, at the PDPA's instigation, this country decided to put an end to feudalism, and to move forward on the path of democracy and progress.

Everybody's Right To Conclude Defense Alliances

It was then that imperialism intervened. It did so mainly through Pakistan--its representative in the region. Moreover, the American CBS Television Network has shown a film which proves the existence of 30 military bases in Pakistan for the purpose of intervening in Afghanistan's internal affairs.

Afghanistan concluded a treaty of friendship with the Soviet Union as early as 1921--a treaty which was renewed in 1931 and again in 1978. This 1978 treaty contains a clause stating that at the request of either side the other can supply military aid to guarantee its independence and defend its territory.

This is precisely what the Afghan Government did, not only with the current prime minister Karmal but also under Amin. The Soviets told us that they had resisted this request for months precisely out of concern not to heighten tension in this region of the world. However, the foreign military intervention had recently become so strong that, if the Soviet Government had not responded to the request submitted to it, it would have meant that it was not honoring the treaty signed by the two governments.

Those are the facts of the matter. It is on the basis of that that this formidable international operation is being mounted to try to incite peoples against the Soviet Union.

I would like to ask: Why should Afghanistan and the Soviet Union not be entitled to conclude defensive alliances? I would like to point out, as [PCF Politburo member] Charles Fiterman did in another television program, that the Atlantic alliance means that among member countries--including France--any government can call on another government to guarantee its security if it feels that security is threatened.

I must add that, in the joint program signed in 1972, we included, at Francois Mitterrand's request, the idea that the government reserves the right to conclude defensive alliances if it feels it is necessary.

So, what grounds are there for this tendency by those who are trying to teach us about human rights to consider that there are peoples and governments which are major and others which are minor?

Noninterference and International Solidarity

Indeed--and we reaffirm this with our Soviet comrades in the joint declaration--we are in favor of respecting the principle of the sovereignty of nations, independence and noninterference in the affairs of peoples. We want these principles to become reality. However, if that is to happen we must fight imperialism. We are opposed to the export of revolution but we are also against importing counterrevolution.

If the democratic forces struggling for their independence, for progress and for socialism were, by misfortune, to be deprived of the possibility of appealing for solidarity against imperialism while imperialism is intervening to maintain poverty, underdevelopment and illiteracy when tens of millions of men and women are dying throughout the world, if these people who are waging a battle for the right to eat and live like men, not animals, were by misfortune to be deprived of the chance of setting international solidarity in motion, they would be forced to suffer their present fate forever.

This is the fundamental question which Afghanistan raises. In essence the rest merely constitutes another political maneuver which shows that imperialism is on the defensive and that it is prepared to try anything to prevent the forces of progress from advancing.

I would like to ask you journalists a question: When the nonalined conference was taking place in Havana in October you waged a formidable campaign for 2 weeks on the alleged presence of new Soviet troops in Cuba. You no longer mention this. Why? Because you know, as Carter does, that they never existed.

I was in Cuba last week. I saw Cuba. There is not one soldier more than there was in 1962 when the agreements between Khruschev and Kennedy were signed. Therefore, you bear the terrible responsibility to mankind of having waged a campaign of lies. You mount campaigns which cause tension and encourage preparations for war at a time when the buildup of mass-destruction forces could destroy our planet.

Optimistic Communique

[Question] What about the stances taken by the PCI and PCE, which condemn the intervention in Afghanistan....

[Answer] Each communist party decided its policy in full independence. It is true that some parties have taken the stance you have just mentioned. This is true of the PCI and, as far as I know, of the PCE. They are absolutely entitled to do so. Comrade Berlinguer told me of his stance, and I told him of mine. Nonetheless we are still very good friends and have taken steps to extend our cooperation.

For instance, we are now preparing an international initiative against the effects of the capitalist crisis. That is also relevant. You are more eager to talk about Afghanistan than a 13.1-percent inflation rate or the 1.9 million unemployed in France: In your view it is better to talk about Kabul and the Afghans than the French people suffering the effects of the crisis; however, these problems are connected.

If you study the joint communique closely you will see that this communique confirms in all respects to our 23d Congress decisions and I am prepared to debate this question on television.

It is an optimistic communique. First, I repeat, because the balance of forces is still developing in favor of progress, democracy, independence and socialism. Second, because the current tensions in connection with Afghanistan, the deployment of missiles in Europe and other events are a direct result of this balance of forces.

It is because imperialism is at bay that it is trying to curb the peoples' progress and advance. One of the reasons which have brought imperialism to this position is the crisis affecting its own regime, its inability to stem inflation and to prevent the growth of unemployment.

[Question] You have just justified intervention....

[Answer] I have just given an explanation. I have already said: It is not for me to justify it or not to justify it....

[Question] But you are in complete agreement with the Soviets over the Afghanistan problem?

[Answer] I think that the Afghan people and their government had a perfect right to conclude a treaty.

I regret that the situation has developed in this way. I hope for and am struggling for, as are the Soviets--it is written in black and white in our communique--the real independence of nations, and to insure that each people can really choose the social system which suits it best in full freedom and independence. We want this because this is the guarantee that we will make more rapid progress if imperialism does not interfere in the peoples' internal affairs. We have confidence in the struggle of the working class and people. We are in favor of a diversity of paths toward socialism. [paragraph continues]

As we have reaffirmed with our Soviet comrades, it is our conviction that: the more we progress the greater will be the diversity in both the paths toward socialism and ways of building socialism. Therefore, we have everything to gain if noninterference becomes a real principle in life and in practice.

However, there is an important reason why this is not so: the intervention of imperialism. The interventions launched by French imperialism itself are proof of this. Not much is said about these either. However, I never banqueted at the table of Bokassa--the man who ate human flesh....

We Strongly Condemn the Intervention in Czechoslovakia and the Prague Trials

[Question] In 1968 you condemned the Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia. How is that different from the intervention in Afghanistan?

[Answer] There is a fundamental difference:

We condemned the intervention in Czechoslovakia and continue to condemn it. I said this to our Soviet comrades in the talks which I had with them. We have not budged an inch on this question. Not only do we condemn more strongly than ever the intervention which took place in 1968 but we condemn the trials and arrests which have taken place in Prague recently. I did not hide from my interlocutors that such actions bear no relation to socialism.

What was the issue in Czechoslovakia? It was the will of the vast majority--if not almost all--of a party and a people to give a new direction to the process of building a socialist society. We were convinced, and still are that the CPCZ and the Czechoslovak people themselves had the necessary forces to carry out this task even if it is true that they made some mistakes--but who does not make mistakes?

There was no valid reason for an intervention. That is why we condemned it in 1968 and are still condemning it in the same way today.

Afghanistan is an entirely different question. As the American CBS Network film which I mentioned before shows, the foreign intervention in that country is patent, clear and obvious. In these circumstances it is understandable that the Soviet Government was forced to abide by the treaty it had signed with the Afghan Government.

Two Important Details From CPSU

[Question] Who in Afghanistan appealed to the Soviets?

[Answer] I put this question to my interlocutors. They gave me a very clear answer. They have raised this question many times in PRAVDA and we have confirmation in the documents which the PDPA has just sent us: Amin himself asked the Soviet Government to intervene.

The Soviet Government did not do so at that time. It did all it could to prevent tension being heightened in this region of the world. It was when all else failed that it was forced to intervene.

Comrade Brezhnev told me that clearly and plainly. He told me that the Soviet troops had been instructed not to intervene in the internal fighting taking place. They must be present on the borders to prevent infiltrations from outside.

I would like to add that Comrade Brezhnev gave me two details which are of interest to French men and women:

First, as soon as conditions allow, the Soviet Union will withdraw its troops from Afghanistan, and it hopes to be able to do so as soon as possible.

Second--and this detail appears in our communique--"the annulment of NATO's decision on the production and deployment in Europe of new American missiles, or the effective suspension of its implementation, would make it possible to start effective negotiations on the question of medium-range missiles."

[Question] Was Mr Brezhnev in good shape?

[Answer] Leonid Brezhnev spoke for 70 minutes. He was in good shape.

We Will Never Renounce Union of the Left

[Question] You can read in the Socialist Party's [PS] official weekly magazine that "the PCF is the eldest daughter of the Soviet church." And you have been accused of having "dug the grave of the Union of the Left" by stating your views on Afghanistan....

[Answer] You know, it was Francois Mitterrand who dug the grave of the Union of the Left in 1977.

In any case, there has been a very recent example of this attitude. Our party wrote a letter to the PS asking it to call meetings of municipal councils to register opposition to decisions concerning fuel price increases that will have serious consequences for the heating of homes, schools and so forth.

I learned on the telephone this morning--for even though I have no problems, even though I can leave my country for 8 days, even though my party's leadership operates collectively and even though there is no contest and no struggle among any trends within the party, I nonetheless remain in close contact with Paris--that Beregovoy's reply was "no." "Since Georges Marchais has abandoned Eurocommunism, no action will be taken."

This indeed confirms that it was the PS which broke the Union of the Left. It is the PS that has alined itself with the position of the Socialist Internationals, and in particular the SPD which--it should be remembered--has demanded that missiles be deployed on German territory in order to gain possession of nuclear arms.

And there has been another example of this attitude.

In 1975--that is, not long ago--a PS delegation led by Francois Mitterrand came to the Soviet Union. It signed a joint communique with the CPSU.

In this joint communique Francois Mitterrand acknowledged the progress achieved by the Soviet Union on its path toward socialism.

And today, or rather tomorrow, the PS will adopt a document in which it states: "Socialism does not exist in the Soviet Union. It exists nowhere. Blum was right in 1920...."

Do you think that we are dealing with a responsible leader? Is it responsible to speak in this way, to say one thing in 1975 and another in 1979, in 1980? I ask the PS: What in fact could have occurred between 1975 and 1979 which has induced it to abandon its previously held views on the socialist nature of the system established in the Soviet Union?

In short, the French Socialist Party is now drawing the logical conclusions from its attitude in 1977.

However, we Communists, we union men, are present. We are present. We are not giving in. We are not abandoning the union. We will never renounce the Union of the Left.

And with this end in mind we have defined a new path. We say: The rank and file must get involved. It is necessary to develop the union at grassroots level against the catastrophic policy pursued by the Giscard government which is the most reactionary, the most antisocial, the most antidemocratic and the most antinational government which France has had for a long time.

A Major Objective--Defense of Peace and Struggle for Disarmament

[Question] And what about the Soviets, do they agree with your analysis?

[Answer] But I do not have to ask the Soviets for their agreement. I told you at the beginning of our interview that as far as domestic affairs are concerned, we merely exchanged information. We did not discuss our views, nor did we have to. The CPSU is a mature party which determines its policy completely independently; the PCF is a mature party which determines its policy completely independently.

What is true is that the fact that we have agreed with the Soviets on a certain number of issues does not prevent not only some differences but even some divergences remaining between us--divergences which I mentioned in my report to the 23d Congress. We have discussed them in depth. Both parties have stuck to their views. This is why we have acknowledged the existence of these divergences in our communique.

However, we decided on two things. First, we will continue to discuss these divergences. And, second, we decided that they will not prevent us from waging a joint struggle in support of objectives on which we agree. One of these objectives is of major importance--defense of peace and struggle for disarmament. An end must be put to this monstrous situation whereby mass destruction weapons are being stockpiled on the planet even though there is so much to be done with respect to people's living conditions, food, housing, education, health and culture. This is what we have agreed on in particular, and in support of which we have decided to take joint action.

Therefore, there is no question of any "alinement." There are two mature parties. Two independent parties. Two parties which discuss things firmly and fraternally and which wage a struggle in support of objectives on which they agree. You will find the alined people where they are--among the government. You will find them among those who speak the same, single language--that of the "Voice of America" and the multinationals. It is the language of profit and exploitation of workers and people by a tiny minority which enjoys indecent luxury while other people find life so hard.

OLYMPIC OFFICIALS DISCUSS CARTER'S PROPOSALS

IOC Official's Rebuttal

LD211504 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Didier Ades telephoned interview with Monique Berlioux, director of the International Olympic Committee [IOC] General Secretariat--presumably live]

[Excerpts] [Question] The ultimatum has been launched officially and solemnly: Jimmy Carter gives the Soviets 1 month to evacuate Afghanistan, or else the United States will boycott the Moscow Olympic games and will do everything in its power to make other countries follow the same course.

What will happen if in a month's time the United States decided to boycott them? In other words, Mr Carter will have to make his own decisions, but others will very probably follow his example.

[Answer] Listen, I have not seen, read or heard President Carter's statement. I believe, however, from what I see in the press that he is now no longer talking of a boycott of the games--this is a nuance which nevertheless is of importance--but he is saying that he would ask the U.S. Olympic Committee to support his decision of not attending the games. Very well.

[Question] Do you think this means that it is conceivable that the IOC may decide to move the Moscow games to another venue?

[Answer] The IOC cannot move the Moscow games. I believe that this (?goes beyond the IOC's powers) on the one hand, and on the other the IOC has signed a contract with this city, and there is no reason to terminate this contract at present.

[Question] So then Mr Carter's proposal is, allow me to use the expression....

[Answer] ...Not realistic.

[Question] Is not realistic. But it has the value of a boycott.

[Answer] If you want to call this a boycott that's your business, but I believe that it is no more realistic to want to arrange to hold the Olympic games elsewhere. It would no longer be the Olympic games, it would be something else.

[Question] Would there still be Olympic games if the American athletes do not...

[Answer] It would be necessary for the international federation to accept the respective sports federations which want to take part in the Olympic games. And we also know that there are very many, the overwhelming majority of national Olympic committees, which want only one thing, to go to Moscow. (?And this is understandable.)

[Question] What would be the value of the Olympic games, or at least what would be the image of the Olympic games, if the American athletes were absent?

[Answer] It is, of course, true that the American athletes are extremely important. They are a very important part, but they are not all the athletes in the world.

[Question] But after all, this would be a very hard blow to the image of the Olympic games.

[Answer] Well, this would be deplorable, and in the event this might boomerang on the Los Angeles games.

National President's Proposal

LD211338 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] France, as you know, has already stated that it will go to Moscow, long before Jimmy Carter--whose personal stance is also known--took his official decision.

As far as the French Olympic Committee is concerned, it is extremely worried, not only regarding the future of the Moscow games but the future of the Olympic games in general. Here is Claude Collard, president of the French Olympic Committee in a telephone conversation with (Lesly le Tac):

[Begin Collard recording] I think that this is grist to our mill because we have advocated for several years now that the games be held every 4 years at the same place--we produced a dossier on this which was presented several years ago--a single site which would enjoy the right to extraterritoriality so that--at least, to a certain extent--political interference might be avoided. When we proposed this idea, everybody thought that this was nothing but utopian, but it appears to me that it has become very realistic.

If there should be a boycott by the United States directed against Moscow, in 4 years' time the same thing would happen in reverse for Los Angeles, for example. And all this leads to the conclusion that the Olympic games in their present form are dead. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT REACTION TO CHRISTOPHER'S VISIT VIEWED

LD211221 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Jan 80 pp 1, 5 LD

[Maurice Delarue report: "Carter in Favor of a Moscow Olympics Boycott"]

[Text] "Firmness" on Afghanistan, "solidarity with the Americans without alinement," regarding the Tehran hostages. That is the French position on the dual crisis in Asia following the 16 January talks between U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet.

The French attitude is not perceptibly different, Paris believes, from the FRG attitude or that of other European governments.

Mr Christopher, who arrived from Bonn (and was at the Brussels NATO Council on Tuesday), had an impromptu meeting with Chancellor Schmidt. On leaving Bonn, he stated that he had established a "great" U.S.-German "solidarity".

Leaving Paris for Washington on Wednesday evening, he professed himself "happy" that France and the United States assessed Afghanistan in the same way and that the two governments "shared their concern" on the hostages. "I believe," he added, "that France shares with us the opinion that the Soviet veto on economic sanctions against Iran does not hinder our efforts or weaken our resolve to free the hostages as soon as possible."

Although the accent was on Afghanistan, especially in public, Mr Christopher's European tour, including the NATO discussions, was equally about the Tehran hostages, a topic on which U.S. opinion is especially sensitive. Since only the Soviet veto prevented the UN Security Council from announcing sanctions, the Americans want to impose unilaterally the embargo approved by a majority on the council forbidding the supply of all but food and medicine to Iran.

Mr Christopher wanted to find out whether America's allies were ready to conform. It is not out of the question for Washington to set up naval surveillance. In both cases--Afghanistan and Iran--the French Government considers that the measures should be tangible and not just symbolic, but for its part does not want to take control of them; it also wants to leave room for dialog and detente.

On Afghanistan, the NATO Council established the principle that retaliatory measures should be "parallel", thereby relieving countries of individual responsibility. For the moment, the French Government seems resolved to abide by the terms announced by the Nine (LE MONDE 17 January). On Iran, Paris, while refusing an alinement pure and simple with Washington, emphasizes that a certain coordination between exporting countries is indispensable if the embargo is to be effective. "Solidarity" with the United States on Iran seems to go further than "firmness" on Afghanistan. As related principles, Paris seems to consider the violation of international law in Tehran more flagrant than in Afghanistan and to be punished without question.

GISCARD TO VISIT JORDAN IN MARCH

ALGERIAN FOREIGN MINISTER HAS FIRST OFFICIAL VISIT TO PARIS

Arrival Reported

LD181344 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] Algerian Foreign Minister Mohamed Ben Yahia arrived late this morning in Paris on his first official visit to France. Mr Ben Yahia will meet the president of the republic, Prime Minister Mr Barre and Foreign Minister Mr Francois-Poncet.

Meets With Giscard

LD181952 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Arriving in Paris today, Algerian Foreign Minister Mohamed Ben Yahia indicated straightaway that he is in favor of a healthy and durable cooperation--to quote his words--between France and Algeria. This is in any case what emerged from the 1 and 1/2 hour meeting he had today at the Elysee with Valery Giscard d'Estaing--a meeting which was judged as very positive on the French side and as very encouraging on the Algerian side. Here is our reporter Pierre Grant:

Welcomed this morning at Orly by Jean-Francois Poncet, Algerian Foreign Minister Mohamed Ben Yahia will meet during the day with President Giscard d'Estaing and Raymond Barre, in addition to his French counterpart.

The first meeting this afternoon was with Giscard d'Estaing. It lasted 1 and 3/4 hours, or three quarters of an hour longer than scheduled. The meeting was judged as very positive on the French side, and as an example of the desired new relations between France and Algeria.

We must find the means to clear up the past situation and to settle all bilateral problems, said the Algerian foreign minister for his part.

The agenda for these conversations therefore included the situation of Algerian emigrants in France and the study of a plan that would permit them to return home in the best conditions, as well as the conflict in the Western Sahara; a conflict which in the past few years has poisoned Franco-Algerian relations. The French and Algerian sides sought together the means of arriving at a peaceful solution for this conflict, explained Ben Yahia at the entrance of the Elysee.

He is at this moment continuing his conversations with Raymond Barre before meeting Jean-Francois Poncet once again this evening.

Convention Ratified

LD191320 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 19 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpts] Algerian Foreign Minister Ben Yahia went again this morning to the Quai d'Orsay to meet with meet with Jean Francois-Poncet.

Ben Yahia's visit ended with the ratification of a consular convention between France and Algeria. In the view of the Algerian foreign minister this stage is more than a mere symbol in the resumption of a dialog. The text of the convention includes a package of means regarding the protection of the interests of the French in Algeria and of Algerians in France.

French foreign minister Jean Francois-Poncet described the climate of the talks as friendly and warm. He added that they were extremely positive and were marked also by President Chadli's wish to develop and consolidate relations between our two countries. Six working groups will examine all matters still pending. An economic commission was also set up. In this particular case it is not an example of mere diplomatic relations concluded Jean Francois-Poncet, because the history and strong human contact existing between France and Algeria compells us to make progress in our relations.

[Unattributed report on French television 14 January interview with Socialist Party First Secretary Mitterrand: "M Mitterrand Launches an Appeal to the Communists"]

[Text] Francois Mitterrand began by resuming the analysis that he made the night before at the Socialist Party [PS] national convention of the causes of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the resulting condemnation of the USSR, the PCF and the government. The PS first secretary indicated that he equally "does not believe" in using the food weapon or boycotting the Moscow Olympics in retaliation. "I believe more in provisions of a technological nature," he specified.

M Mitterrand next affirmed that the 1977 split in the Union of the Left stemmed from a "privileged relationship" between the USSR and the PCF, the latter being, in his view, "with the Portuguese Communist Party, the one which has remained most closely bound up with and perhaps dependent on the decisions taken at the level of the CPSU."

Recalling the PCF Politburo statement condemning the PS attitude, M. Mitterrand emphasized that the communists of Spain, Italy, Romania and Yugoslavia have branded the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan without being accused by the French Communists of transmitting "bourgeois propaganda" as a result. He affirmed: "This type of accusation from Georges Marchais, from the Central Committee and the PCF against the PS raises an unbelievable sectarianism or even a huge contempt for the men and women of France, for we, in our way, have only said what other communist parties have said."

Recalling the setback in 1978, "willed by the PCF leadership," M Mitterrand addressed French Communists in these terms: "Will they accept moreover that the leadership of their party is diverting and corrupting, on this point, the sincere and honest hopes and involvement of the membership and of all Communist voters? I, a Socialist, say to them: I have devoted years of work, faith and hope to this. I do not doubt, especially today, the truth of the cause that I serve.

"A day came, long ago now, when I realized that if one did not politically unite all the social forces oppressed and exploited by a policy of injustice and inequality for the benefit of the most powerful and the capitalist and multinational companies, then the majority of the French people would remain for many more years under the heel of the interests of a few. So I tried to give a political interpretation to this social reality. What a force, what power! You remember our rallies, our meetings, those songs which united us. You remember all that. It is still possible. We are still in the majority in the country."

The first secretary considered that the PCF leadership could prevent the victory of the left and that the PS needs "to grow in such a way as to make this kind of maneuver impossible." He emphasized that "the party which prevents this victory (of the left) by clearly insupportable international and domestic stances (...) is conspiring with the right." He summoned the testimony of Charles Tillon to affirm that "it is not the destiny of the PCF to shatter the hopes of the left."

"The PS," he explained, " expresses the voice of the left" and must lead it to victory. He added: "Georges Marchais practices the Union of the Left as the Soviet Union practices detente, with cannon fire."

M Mitterrand also reaffirmed that "no political agreement is possible between the PS and the parties of the right" and that it is "in the continuity of its action" that the PS hopes "to have its view understood." Finally, on the question of whether the Soviet Union could accept in 1981 "what it would not accept in 1977," M Mitterrand pointed out: "This is a serious question which I often ask myself. I believe that the Soviet Union did not want the destabilization of Western Europe in 1977; the United States--Kissinger often expressed his view on this--was making threats about communists entering the government in Italy or France. In a certain way the Soviet Union preferred not to raise this problem so as not to annoy the United States in the West, not wanting the United States to annoy the USSR in Central and East Europe." He also considered that the PCF leadership "would have to reexamine this situation."

The Possibility of a Presidential Candidacy

Asked about his possible candidacy for the presidency of the republic, M Mitterrand replied: "I have asked my Socialist friends not to fall into the trap, into which they were being hurried, of nominating a candidate prematurely. With 16-18 months to go to the election, why do you want to choose a presidential candidate? If the issue is to lead the PS in the present period, the PS is organized, it has a first secretary--myself; it has 16 national secretaries; it has a Directorate, an Executive and everything else.

"My duty, candidate or not, as first secretary of the PS is to say each day, with many ulterior electoral considerations for the PS (because I would like to win the elections), what we believe. We do not need a candidate to lead the PS. We need a candidate to win. And we shall choose this candidate in due course, (probably) by the end of the year. (...) It may be appropriate to nominate him in October. It may be appropriate to nominate him in December. We must wait for those months to decide. At that moment you will say to me: Are you going to be a candidate? I have not decided. (...) What will influence my decision? The ability to rally the Socialists, to preserve and to increase their unity; and to guarantee the permanence of the fundamental choices, at the same time modern and historic, of socialism in France. And then, since we are running for election, the ability to govern the affairs of France.

"If I am convinced that I am able to achieve these aims, I shall be a candidate. If I feel that I am not up to the task and others are--and there are a few--I shall be what I have been from the outset; the one who put the unity of the Socialists before everything. For this is the chief weapon by which the left will win.

"Some want me to be a candiate. I say: Wait a while. Others could not like that; so I say that it is my affair and the affair of the majority of the PS."

M Mitterrand also indicated that the PS is in a position "according to the circumstances, to put forward the men needed." Calling to mind other possible candidates, he stated: "There are Roncard, Mauroy and a few others; for me it would certainly be a setback if there were only one, two or three."

APPEALS MADE BY INTELLECTUALS 'ANGERED' BY ANTI-PCF CAMPAIGN

LD181549 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Jan 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "Appeal by Intellectuals"]

[Excerpt] The following appeal was made by intellectuals yesterday:

"An exceptionally violent anticommunist campaign is sweeping France. It is not spontaneous in the least. The pretext for this campaign is the situation in Afghanistan which the press and other channels of the media are painting in a totally distorted light conditioned by the strategic interests of U.S. imperialism.

"This campaign angers us.

"We refuse to be taken in by or to condone the picture being painted of the situation in Afghanistan because it disregards the gravity of the issues and of what is at stake, and because it conceals the destabilizing role played by the United States and international reactions, especially in the Middle East and west Asia.

"We have made our choice between feudal reaction backed by imperialism and a people who, despite great difficulties, are seeking their path for development and independence: We support the revolutionaries, the oppressed who are struggling for their people's progress against privilege, obscurantism and poverty.

"We do not accept the wave of slander and distortions with which the PCF's stance is being misrepresented in order to weaken the transforming scope of the lines laid down by its 23d Congress.

"The media which serve the government bear a burden of responsibility in the operation to misinform and mislead the French people. We condemn the shameless use of the media to this end. We call on our friends and on all democrats to join this protect."

MRG'S SCHWARTZENBERG: PCF'S STANCE 'POSES PROBLEMS'

LD181103 Paris Domestic Service in French 0650 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Joseph Paletou interview with Roger-Gerard Schwartzenberg, vice president of the Left Radical Movement [MRG] and member of the European Assembly, in the program "Let's Talk Straight"--live]

[Excerpt] [Question] After the Kabul coup there seemed to you to be an ostentatious and flamboyant alinement by the French Communist Party with Soviet views, according to what you said in the latest issue of LES NOUVELLES D'ALSACE, and questions have been asked by the left. The Socialist Party was already replied that nothing is changed in its strategy. Will the Left Radical Movement's leadership adopt an identical or similar position tomorrow?

[Answer] The stubborn approval of Soviet theses by Georges Marchais obviously poses problems to the Communist Party's partners. It is true that this, fortunately, by no means rules out second-round election alliances based on everything that unites the left in the fact of the right--that is, the struggle against social injustice--but it makes illusory the prospect of a new joint program for government, because that, should it come about, would also be based on a common foreign policy. Evidently, we are a long way from that.

This means that strategically, rather than thinking in terms of a government of a Union of the Left in which we would govern together, we should think in terms of a solution like that put into practice by Leon Blum and Pierre Mendes France--that is, a government of the left and center--left supported by the Communist Party but implementing the hypothesis described as "that of support without participation."

FRENCH DEFENSE MINISTER MEETS WITH SARTI IN PISA

LD211902 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The French minister of defense, Yvon Bourges, arrived in Pisa this morning. He was received by his Italian counterpart, Adolfo Sarti. The principal matters discussed by them were the international crisis, the situation in the Middle East and the situation in the Mediterranean. Sarti confirmed Italy's full and active support for the French proposal to call a conference on disarmament in Europe. The two ministers then traveled to La Spezia to visit the Italian Navy arsenal and the Muggiano Shipyards.

There is so far no information as to whether Yuriy Vladimirovich Stefanov, aged 32, who has a wife in Moscow, has disappeared with the intention of asking for political asylum. After reporting his disappearance, the Moscow Academic Ballet left for Bari. The party consists of the orchestra and another 81 people.

PSDI CONGRESS ENDS, FIVE-PARTY GOVERNMENT FAVORED

LD211906 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0700 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The congress of the Social Democratic Party [PSDI] has ended. A new Central Committee has been elected: 86.61 percent of the votes (122 votes) went in favor of the list headed by Secretary Longo. Romita's list got 13.39 percent with 19 votes. A further 47 substitute members were also appointed for the first time. There are 15 women in the Central Committee. The first meeting is scheduled for mid-week in order to elect the party secretary and Directorate. It is practically certain that Pietro Longo will be confirmed in office. Giuseppe Saragat was acclaimed as president. The Social Democrats have reiterated their rejection of a government that would include the Communists or a single-party Christian Democratic Government. The PSDI has once again proposed a five-party government ranging from the Socialists to the Liberals with a lay figure as prime minister.

DEBATE CONTINUES OVER PCI GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION

[Text] Rome, January 22 (ANSA)--The big question marks hanging over the Italian political scene--whether or not the Communists should enter the government, whether or not the country must face another round of early general elections--must now wait on February for some form of clarification.

Early February will in fact see the start of the Christian Democrat Party's (DC) National Congress, where the major topic on the agenda will be the "Communist question". The largest party in the Rome Parliament will be debating the situation in the light of last week's laborious session of the Italian Socialist Party's (PSI) Central Committee. The committee came out strongly in favor of a "government of solidarity" including the Communists (PCI), who are the DC Congress is over. [sentence as received] Cossiga's Cabinet is a three-way coalition of his own DC, the Social Democrats (PSOI) and the right-of-center Liberals (PLI), but it survives thanks to the crucial abstention of the PSI.

The Central Committee's final motion on the political situation--a second one was voted on reorganizing the party--represented a weakening of the position of Secretary Bettino Craxi, even though he maintained his post. According to political observers, the motion effectively requires Craxi to demand only a government with the PCI, ruling out other hyptheses--for example, a five-way coalition of the three current government partners plus the PSI and the Republicans (PRI)--ventilated by Craxi in the past. The same motion rejected the idea of general elections and also made it clear that the Socialists' attitude of truce towards Cossiga's Cabinet would end with the end of the DC Congress. The PSI's decisions have been greeted with reservations among the Christian Democrats. Leading members of the party described the compromise leaving Craxi as secretary and veteran leftwinger Riccardo Lombardi as chairman in succession to Pietro Nenni as "ambiguous".

Apart from the PCI and the small Proletarian Unity Party (PDUP), a similar reaction could be identified in the other parties. The PSDI, for example, which concluded a National Congress on Sunday, re-stated its opposition to Communist entry into the government. Other small parties like the PLI and the PRI justified their objections to Communist entry in terms of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the PCI's international line, even though the Communists have soundly condemned the Soviet move.

In a speech in Naples on Sunday, a member of the PRI leadership Francesco Compagna said that the Communists should realise they will "certainly" not be let into the government, though they might find a place in a parliamentary majority. According to Compagna, "the facts, and still more the unknowns, of the international situation are arousing new apprehensions for our national security". "In any case, they are of such a nature as to place the parties with a more certain Atlantic and European vocation before the absolute impossibility of adding risk to risk. One cannot even give the impression of wanting to lower one's guard in the present moment".

One of the DC's deputy secretaries, Carlo Donat-Cattin, leader of the party's "new forces" faction, did not rule out that his party will check out the possibility of a government with the PCI. But, in an interview with a Roman weekly, he made it clear that, in his view, "now as in the past, there are not the political conditions for cooperation with the PCI in the national government or in local administrations". He added that, in its National Congress, the DC must leave itself open to "several prospects". "If the line of national solidarity as it was advanced by (late party Chairman Aldo) Moro is contested, we must try other paths, above all a deepening of relations that I think are indispensable with the lay parties and the PSI," he said.

SOARES ANNOUNCES NEWLY ELECTED PS NATIONAL SECRETARIAT

LD210345 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0001 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] The question of the composition of the National Secretariat of the Socialist Party [PS] has been the weekend's main political topic. Here is a report from our Oporto newsroom:

[Begin recording] [Announcer] A news conference held by the PS to announce the results of the weekend meeting of its National Committee here in Oporto ended a short while ago. The announced reshuffle of the PS National Secretariat has in fact taken place.

[Mario Soares] The composition of the newly elected 14-man National Secretariat is as follows: Salgado Zenha, Vitor Constancio, Antonio Guterres, Herculano Pires, Jorge Sampaio, Sousa Gomes, Maldonado Gonehla, Antonio Reis, Alberto Arons de Carvalho, Rui Mateus, Gomes Fernandes, Carlos Laje, Antonio Esteves and Luis Filipe Madeira.

[Oporto announcer] That was Mario Soares announcing the new composition of the National Secretariat that does not include any member of the "historical" faction.

The National Committee meeting also approved a document on the strategy to be pursued by the PS in the 1980's. Basically, it refers to the relations between the PS and the Democratic Alliance, on the one hand, and between the PS and the Communist Party on the other.

[Mario Soares] On one side we have the Democratic Alliance in relation to whom our stand is of total, firm--as the document says--and uncompromising opposition, and, on the other side, of course, we have the Communist Party and its satellites--and in relation to them too, our disassociation is complete. [end recording]

Reshuffle Assessed

[Excerpts] The day's main political development has been the reshuffle in the Socialist Party National Secretariat. We have asked our political commentator Carneiro Jacinto to consider its significance:

[Begin Jacinto recording] Information is still somewhat scarce on the conclusions of the meeting of the PS National Committee. I was not there but a short while ago I heard televised statements by two members of the new secretariat and also heard the final communique [not broadcast on radio]. On the basis of the information available it seems to me that Mario Soares has played a decisive mediating role.

I say this because, when all is said and done, and apart from the departure of Tito de Morais, Manuel Alegre and Jaime Gama from the National Secretariat, the conclusions already known and the very composition of the new secretariat show that Soares has not totally given in to the demands--or proposals--raised by the group of "technocrats," namely, for the reduction of the secretariat and for the departure of other members--such as Maldonado Gonelha for example--as well as those who have indeed left.

The new members--Carlos Laje, Antonio Esteves and Luis Filipe Madeira--come as somewhat of a surprise. Here too, one can detect Soares' role as a moderator. That is to say that not only has there been no apparent strengthening of the faction of the "technocrats;" neither indeed has the faction of the former GIS members [Socialist Intervention Group] members been strengthened.

Politically, therefore, the situation stands as follows: The "historical" faction--or at least Tito, Alegre and Gama--who did not agree with the line laid down by the secretariat, has left the secretariat. But the reshuffle has gone no further.

The new development--which in fact confirms previous speculation--is the Socialist Party's openness towards establishing dialog to its right and to its left. This is liekly to mean dialog with ASDI [Independent Socialist Democratic Association, former leftwing members of Social Democratic Party] on the right, and possibly, with the UEDS [Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy, former leftwing members of the PS] on the left. But this should be clarified in the next few hours.

In short--and so shortly after the event--my opinion is that Mario Soares has managed to defuse a state of great tension that existed in the party. It will be interesting to see what the members who have left the secretariat will now do. Whether they will do something similar, for example, to the group led by Jean-Pierre Chevenement in the French Socialist Party, or--as Soares would wish--whether they will remain members of the party's Executive Committee.

LISBON COMMENTS ON EFFORTS TO SECURE OIL SUPPLY

LD202318 Lisbon in English to Europe 2030 GMT 20 Jan 80 LD

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] To begin with, let us talk about black gold, oil. Although the Soviet Union has decided to cut its crude oil sales to Portugal by one half in 1980, PETROGAL, the government-owned Portuguese petroleum company, has announced that two-thirds of this year's crude oil supplies have already been assured. The company estimates that Portuguese refineries will consume 9 million tons of crude this year, and contracts have already been signed for over 6 million tons. In other words, Portugal only needs to worry about the other third, or less than 3 million tons.

The reserves in this country are considered none [as heard] and PETROGAL has been making every effort to obtain new contracts to complement the existing ones so that energy supplies can be guaranteed for as long a time as possible. Some days ago the vice chairman of the board of directors was in Iraq, the main Portuguese supplier in the Middle East, while another member of the board went to Moscow with the aim of making sure that the Soviets would not reduce the supplies by more than one-half, a mission in which he was successful.

At the same time recognition of the fact that the battle for oil contracts increasingly involved diplomatic activity was reflected in the nomination by the new Portuguese Government of Mr Pires Miranda to be a roving ambassador for petroleum questions. PETROGAL seems pleased with this move and hopes that the new ambassador will help it to get more contracts.

At the same time Nasir al-Manqur, the Saudi Arabian ambassador to Madrid, has stated that his country will do everything possible to help Portugal and her new government in the difficulties they may have due to the rise in the price of oil. Saudi Arabia is, of course, one of the biggest oil producers in the Middle East. The same diplomat said that relations between the two countries should be normalized in the very short term and that he had already asked the Saudi Arabian foreign minister to review the file on relations with Lisbon, a process that is now under way.

Mr Al-Manqur is expected to visit the Portuguese capital at the beginning of February, probably in an official capacity. Saudi Arabia postponed sine die the opening of its embassy in Lisbon after the Porguguese Government decided to establish diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level with Israel.

DESTROYER FIRED ON BY MOROCCAN PLANE

LD211908 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1800 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] A military incident between Spain and Morocco last Thursday: According to the evening paper EL DIARIO DE LAS PALMAS, a Moroccan Air Force plane fired warning shots at a Spanish destroyer in Saharan waters 4 days ago. The ship, the Admiral Ferrandiz, had received a call for help from a Spanish fishing boat detained by a Moroccan patrol boat. The destroyer went to the spot to find out what was happening. Shortly afterward, a Moroccan Air Force Mirage appeared. It flew over the Spanish ship several times. The last time it opened fire with a machinegun some distance from the Spanish destroyer and then went away. The ship did not respond, although the crew were put on combat (?alert).

A spokesman for the maritime zone headquarters has neither confirmed nor denied this incident although he admitted that the Spanish ship was in the area where the Spanish fishing fleet was operating last Thursday.

Incident Downplayed

LD212050 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The navy headquarters has issued a note in connection with the machinegunning of the Spanish destroyer Admiral Ferrandiz. The text of the note is as follows:

In connection with the report in a Canaries paper on an incident on 17 January off the Saharan coast, it is necessary to state how the incident happened, an incident which could not at any stage be called alarming.

The Spanish destroyer Admiral Ferrandiz, which was operating in the area as support for the Spanish fishing boats operating there, was repeatedly overflown by a Mirage of the Moroccan Air Force. On its last run, the plane fired a burst of machinegun fire as a warning, some distance off the destroyer's bow in order to tell the ship that in the pilot's view it was unduly close to the coast. At no time, the official note says, was the ship felt to be under attack, therefore no maneuver to repel a nonexistent aggression was made.

Although the incident took place on 17 January, this headquarters did not release any note on it since Spain and Morocco had already exchanged the relevant communications to the satisfaction of both sides.

PSUC BRANCHES SUPPORT SOVIET INTERVENTION IN AFGHANISTAN

LD220402 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The fifth conference of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC], Cornella Branch, held during the weekend, passed a resolution in support of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. A similar motion was passed by the PSUC committee in the Tarrasa District of (?Campanet). The motion states that this Soviet intervention is an act of solidarity with the struggle of peoples against U.S. imperialism and its Chinese and West European allies.

We must note that the PSUC Central Committee recently came out against the Soviet action in Afghanistan. This means that there are differences within the Catalonian Communists, that there are pro-Soviets and so-called Eurocommunists.

TENSION NOTED IN SPANISH-BRITISH RELATIONS

LD220345 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Richard Parsons, new British ambassador to Madrid, arrived in Madrid this evening. Mr Parsons arrived in the Spanish capital at a time of tension in Spanish-British relations. The new British ambassador visited Gibraltar before coming to Madrid, and the Spanish Government informed the British Government last Friday of the indefinite suspension of the trip that the king and queen were to make to London next June.

The tension in relations between Spain and the United Kingdom is caused by the difficulties arising from the talks for the decolonization of Gibraltar after a note from the British Government to the Spanish Government was conveyed by the former British ambassador to Madrid at his farewell ceremony.

UCD REJECTS PNV'S REASONS FOR LEAVING CORTES

LD220342 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[Text] We start our political news with an important strongly worded communique issued tonight by the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD]. Carlos Fernandez reports:

In the communique the UCD replies to the decision made by the Basque Nationalist Party [PNV] to withdraw from parliament and explains its reasons for not accepting the PNV's reasons.

The centrists state that in withdrawing from the Cortes, the PNV is being partisan. The communique says:

The UCD, as the party responsible for government and the political force with the broadest support of the electors, views with concern the announcement made by the PNV leaders that they are withdrawing from parliament. After pointing out that this decision by the PNV is hard to justify for reasons other than strictly electoral ones, the UCD states that the PNV leaders are showing a very partisan view and are shirking their responsibility to defend the democratic system. This decision, the note adds, presupposes opting for a strategy of pressure which is dangerous, unacceptable and incompatible with the most basic principles of democracy.

UCD explains in its communique that it cannot take into consideration the reasons expounded by the PNV, to which it replies with a list of eight points. The seventh point refers to the law on the general council of the judiciary, and says that the statute of autonomy lays down that the Basque General Council will have the same powers as the government in the administration of justice and in judicial matters. Despite attempts to establish a fully independent judicial power, the law has transferred to the judicial bodies powers that formerly belonged to the government, to the advantage of the independence of justice. It does not seem to be a fair demand or one in accordance with the state of law to which the executive bodies of the Basque Country should aspire, powers which were so criticized in earlier years for prejudicing the independence of the judiciary.

Further on, it denies that there were any secret commitments with these words: It should be quite clear that there were no agreements other than those defined in the statute itself, and so there are no secret commitments.

It ends by saying: In light of all this, the UCD understands that the decision of the PNV to be made after parliament resumes would be a grave irresponsibility which would be harmful not only to democratic institutions and the parliamentary forces as a whole, but also--and mainly--would be to the disadvantage of the PNV representatives, contravening their mandate as representatives which was granted to them by their own electors via the ballot box. The PNV cannot aspire to impose its will on the whole of parliament which represents all the Spanish people.

All the laws to which the PNV refers have been approved by very big majorities, larger than the numerical strength of the UCD. Also, for those laws still being processed, a broad parliamentary backing will be sought in accordance with the UCD policy of achieving the acceptance of the most representative political forces for those laws which regulate or establish basic institutions of the state.

PSC LEADER ATTACKS UCD'S POLICY ON AUTONOMY

[Text] The recently displayed attitude of the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the government toward the autonomy process is, objectively speaking, an insult to all the peoples of Spain. This was said by Joan Raventos, first secretary of the Catalonian Socialist Party [PSC]. The Catalonian Socialist leader maintains that the chaotic way in which the desire for development has been implemented over the last 40 years has resulted in tremendous cost to working people in general and for certain peoples of Spain in particular. Raventos maintains that the UCD is showing itself to be incapable of behaving justly, as demanded by the present situation in Andalusia, because it has no plan to offer. Its policy on autonomies, he adds, is adrift between centralist immobility and popular pressure. And in this permanent state of indecision, it is now introducing a serious attack upon the peoples' rights and democratic reform of the state.

Raventos ends by expressing his solidarity with the Andalusian Junta [Junta de Andalucia] and with its chairman and all the people of Andalusia, in defense of their right to self-government. He affirms finally that autonomous Catalonia is and will remain the champion of the cause of all the brother peoples.

NORWAY

UN DELEGATE BACKS USSR WITHDRAWAL FROM AFGHANISTAN

LD210859 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 12 Jan 80 p 15 LD

[NTB correspondent Svein A. Rohne dispatch: "Norway Supports"]

[Text] New York--On Friday the Norwegian Government gave unreserved support to the massive demand in the United Nations for the Soviet Union to withdraw its invasion forces from Afghanistan immediately and pledged Norwegian aid to resolve the great refugee problem caused by the incursion.

This was said in a speech made on Friday by UN Ambassador Ole Algard to the extraordinary General Assembly session which is discussing the Soviet invasion.

Algard maintained that the armed intervention in Afghanistan and the recent years of unrest in this area have created a tragic refugee problem. He urged all UN member countries and various humanitarian organizations to offer sorely needed help to improve the refugees' conditions. "The Norwegian Government is prepared to contribute its share to help the refugees," he said.

Ambassador Algard asserted that the UN debate has clearly shown that the Soviet entry into Afghanistan has caused deep dismay throughout the world.

"There is broad agreement that the Soviet Union's armed intervention is a violation of Afghanistan's sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence. The intervention is clear interference in another country's internal affairs, and this has happened contrary to all international law, including the UN Charter."

Algard said that he believed not only that the Soviet invasion might have serious consequences in the short term but also might endanger the entire process of international detente.

There is no alternative to this process of detente. But it is unacceptable for the principles on which this process is based to be violated, as is the case in Afghanistan.

The Norwegian Government will thus reiterate that it believes that it is of supreme importance that peace and stable conditions are restored in Afghanistan in order that the danger of a major conflict may be removed at the same time, he said.

Ambassador Algard asked the UN member countries to support the demand for immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Afghanistan. "The Afghan people's right to choose their own government without external interference must be respected," he said.

NKP REPORTEDLY SPLIT OVER AFGHAN EVENTS

LD210905 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 12 Jan 80 p 6 LD

[Per-Arne Bjerke report: "Open Conflict in NKP Over Soviet Union"]

[Excerpt] The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan has caused an open conflict in the Norwegian Communist Party [NKP]. Following the Central Committee meeting on Thursday it is clear that Chairman Martin Gunnar Knudsen does not have the entire party leadership with him in his unreserved support for the Soviet incursion. Marit Landsem Berntsen, one of the Central Committee members, said that there is a clear split in the party and that many oppose the party chairman's view. She regretted that Marin Gunnar Knudsen has adopted a stance on such an important matter before it was considered by the party's top bodies.

Since the break with the Socialist Party of the Left in 1975, the NKP has outwardly appeared a very united party. The split over the Soviet incursion might mean that we will again have another conflict between the pro-Moscow communists and those who represent a more national and independent communism.

The NKP Central Committee is to continue the discussion of the Afghan question on Monday. After this meeting, a report will probably be issued on the matter.

Martin Gunnar Knudsen consistently refused to comment on Marit Landsem Berntsen's statement.

"I never comment on matters which are under discussion in the Central Committee. All I will say is that the Central Committee has discussed this affair for only 2 hours, and the meeting was then adjourned because I was to take part in a television program."

[Question] Is it not unusual for NKP Central Committee members to come out against their own party chairman?

"No comment," Martin Gunnar Knudsen replied.

Nor did Arne Jorgensen, editor of the party organ FRIHETEN, want to say anything on the matter. FRIHETEN is the only Norwegian newspaper to have supported the Soviet invasion. Martin Gunnar Knudsen has stressed that he fully shares the views expressed in its editorial. On television Thursday evening Knudsen repeated his defense of the Soviet invasion.

Marit Landsem Berntsen says that she does not know the extent of the opposition to Knudsen's utterances throughout the country. But she has the impression that many party members believe that the Soviet Union has acted wrongly.

One of those who clearly opposed the Soviet incursion is Tromso NKP Chairman Harald Reppesgard. He also took part in an all-party demonstration in Tromso on Thursday under the slogan "USSR Out of Afghanistan." The Communist Youth Central Committee has unanimously dissociated itself from the Soviet actions.

SWEDEN

U.S. BUILDUP 'NO SOLUTION' TO SOVIET THREAT

LD181241 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 12 Jan 80 p 5 LD

[Magdalena Ribbing interview with Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten: "Soviet Pullback Better Than U.S. Countermeasures"; date and place not specified]

[Text] Sweden is currently demanding a Soviet retreat from Afghanistan rather than U.S. countermeasures. [paragraph continues]

This remark was made to DAGENS NYHETER by Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten. He warned that international rightist forces are now benefiting from the increasingly cool climate between the great powers.

"Some rightist forces are gratefully watching the conflict between the great powers increase: It suits their purpose admirably," Ola Ullsten said.

The rightist forces he refers to include opinion in the U S. Congress, which has always opposed the SALT II treaty.

Ola Ullsten regretted the Soviet Union's negative attitude to holding negotiations with the United States to seek a halt to the constant arms buildup. The United States and the Soviet Union must begin talks instead of continuing their shows of strength. This is a pious hope from a small country's foreign minister, Ola Ullsten said.

Logical Act

"A U.S. military escalation in the region would be no solution to the threat created by the Soviet incursion into Afghanistan. Now the main thing is to prevent an escalation. The Soviet Union should immediately withdraw its troops from Afghanistan and allow the country to decide its own affairs."

The need to curb any escalation is also the reason why Sweden did not only criticize the NATO decision to deploy cruise missiles in Europe, Ola Ullsten explained. Regrettably, the NATO decision is a politically logical act.

"It is a consequence of the fact that the Soviet Union expanded its armament by deploying 100 accurate SS-20 missiles in the western Soviet Union, from where they could hit targets anywhere in Europe. The root cause of the buildup lies in mutual suspicion, creating the need to match the other side's measures."

Ola Ullsten drew a parallel between the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the NATO decision to deploy cruise missiles in Europe.

"Both cases are examples of how great-power conflicts escalate, how they require countermeasures and how they frustrate disarmament efforts."

The present international crisis is more serious than any for a very long time, Ola Ullsten said. He would not, like Jimmy Carter, say that this is the most serious crisis since World War II--there is no need to draw comparisons, he stated. But the crisis is so complicated that politically it is highly explosive, Ola Ullsten said.

Clear Aggression

"This is the first time the Soviet Union has carried out an invasion and participated in a coup in a formerly neutral country--Afghanistan. This is a clearly aggressive foreign policy which can never be defended.

"The crisis is exacerbated by the fact that it is taking place in an already unstable region--Afghanistan is Iran's neighbor.

"The Soviet incursion is occurring in a region which supplies the world with oil, and this could provoke the United States into countermeasures," Ola Ullsten said. "If the United States blocks various deliveries to Iran--which is under consideration--the Soviet Union could conceivably increase its interest in shaping new relations with Iran."

This would not benefit a great-power balance, Ola Ullsten said.

Sweden was one of the 15 countries which demanded that the Afghan crisis be raised at the United Nations. Ola Ullsten has said that Sweden could take further action at the United Nations, but he refused to be specific. Measures outside the UN framework would be inappropriate--Sweden would only participate in sanctions approved by the United Nations.

Special Meeting

Next week the Foreign Policy Commission will hold a special meeting because of the international situation. The Foreign Policy Commission is the parliamentary body which handles important foreign policy questions, and it ranks higher than the Foreign Policy Committee and the Foreign Ministry.

Sweden lodged a protest immediately after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The protest was an impromptu act rather than a consequence of Swedish foreign policy principles, Ola Ullsten said.

Traditionally, this policy transcends party lines. Did Ola Ullsten, as foreign minister, confer with the opposition on this dramatic question?

We maintain contacts across party boundaries, and so we should, Ola Ullsten said. But they could well be deepened, he stated.

AIR FORCE SUBMITS MODERNIZATION OPTIONS

LD181251 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 9 Jan 80 p 44 LD

[Unattributed report: "Four Different Alternatives"]

[Excerpt] The air force has submitted four different alternatives, each entailing the delivery of eight Viggen fighter divisions in the period up to 1987 (each division consists of 18 aircraft). As well as the Viggen fighters, air force chief Dick Stenberg is ordering:

Nine divisions (about 160 aircraft) of the SK-2 trainer and attack aircraft. This would be followed by a new and partly foreign-built aircraft system. The Draken J-35 cannot be modernized as part of this A-2 option, but three divisions of the old Draken aircraft could be in use over the 5-year period.

This option fits within the economic constraints. The aircraft is said to fulfill essential operational requirements. Since it uses known technology, procurement is relatively reliable, and the final assessment is that this option has the "fewest shortcomings within the given directives."

The remaining options are all regarded as "unacceptable."

SK-2 Aircraft Officially Unveiled

LD181253 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 9 Jan 80 p 44 LD

[Henric Borgstrom report: "The New SK-2--the Poor Man's Aircraft for 50 Million Kronor"]

[Excerpts] The new Swedish SK-2 warplane was officially unveiled in Stockholm on Tuesday. Although air force headquarters calls this a "poor man's aircraft," air force chief Dick Stenberg is ordering the new aircraft--manufactured by Saab--because it has the "fewest shortcomings" compared with other options. The air force wants 160 of the aircraft, each costing about 50 million Swedish kronor [SKr] inclusive of armament. Thus total costs will amount to about SKr8 billion, of which SKr2-3 billion will be spent on development and engineering work. The aircraft will be manufactured over the period 1987-94 and will be in service well into the next century.

GOVERNMENT DECIDES NOT TO RECALL AMBASSADOR TO USSR

LD181548 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1430 GMT 18 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The government has decided against recalling the British ambassador from Moscow, Foreign Office Minister of State Douglas Hurd said today in a Commons written reply.

He told Torbay Tory MP Sir Frederic Bennett: "We have considered recalling our ambassador to Moscow for consultations. However, I believe that it is more to our advantage, in present circumstances, for him to stay in Moscow where he can advise us at this difficult time."

Sir Frederic had asked whether the Lord Privy Seal, Sir Ian Gilmour, would review his decision not to reduce diplomatic representation in Moscow to charge d'affaires level "in view of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan."

WESTERN ALLIANCE DIVIDED OVER OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

LD212116 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2005 GMT 21 Jan 80 LD

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] A split now threatens the Western alliance over President Carter's decision to oppose American participation in the Olympic games unless Soviet troops are withdrawn from Afghanistan. Of the major Western powers, Britain--possibly alone--is the most likely to follow the President's lead.

Prominent American figures--but so far not the administration officially--are starting to ask how much support the U.S. can expect from its European allies. They point out that Europeans regularly ask how firm is America's commitment to defend Europe without recognizing that such cooperation is a two-way process.

If Mrs Thatcher urges British athletes to boycott the Olympics it is still an open question whether they will follow her advice. Mr John Disley, chairman of the Sports Council said tonight that the alternatives being suggested for the games were not practicable. He said the council hoped the government would not bring "undue pressure" on athletes but leave any decision to the British Olympic Association [BOA].

Mr Dick Palmer, secretary of the BOA which has now received its invitation to Moscow said he was prepared to listen to government representations. "Before I formally accept--in view of what is going on at the moment--I will consult with my officers."

The Foreign Office was today giving no information on Britain's talks with her NATO allies on whether it is practical to shift the Olympics from Moscow. According to Whitehall officials, Mrs Thatcher is unlikely to be in a position to make a definitive statement on the Olympics when she answers questions in the Common tomorrow.

Consultations are said to be still going on whether the Olympics can be moved either to an alternative city or split between a number of sites. A clear statement is said to be awaited from Canada on whether Montreal can be used again.

But if an alternative is not available, as seems likely, Mrs Thatcher will have to decide whether to come out openly in support of President Carter. Indications from backbenchers tonight were that she would receive strong party backing for a boycott. But it seems that few if any other West European countries will do likewise.

SOVIET AMBASSADOR ADDRESSES FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

[By PA political staff]

[Excerpts] The Soviet ambassador, Mr Nikolay Lunkov, faced attacks from Labor MP's tonight at a heated Commons meeting over Russian military intervention in Afghanistan. Mr Lunkov, who accepted an invitation to address the party's Foreign Affairs Committee, was subjected to nearly one hour of hostile questions, from left and right, in a session which one MP described as "a roasting for the man."

Mr Lunkov parried questions about Russian action if President Tito of Yugoslavia died. All he told questioners was: "We have good relations with that country."

The ambassador spoke for about 20 minutes explaining Soviet action. Only two MP's, and there were nearly 40 present, asked him what were described afterwards as "sympathetic questions."

Mr Lunkov emerged from the meeting still smiling, saying: "MP's asked some questions concerning the situation in Afghanistan and I should say that there were some misunderstandings. The character of some questions seemed to be motivated by some distortion in press reports and so on. Of course we tried to explain our position to show that there was no Soviet invasion into Afghanistan and that the Soviet Government acted with the full backing of the Soviet-Afghanistan treaty of friendship."

Mr Lunkov stressed that Russia's "limited military contingent" would be withdrawn when threats from outside ceased to exist. When a PA reporter asked his view about President Carter's warning that he would invite American athletes to boycott the Olympics, the ambassador retorted hotly: "the question is a ridiculous one. If you boycott the Olympics you know that you are in flagrant contradiction of the Charter of the Olympic games."

STRATEGIC INSTITUTE HEAD VIEWS INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

DW210840 Munich Bayerischer Rundfunk Network in German 1740 GMT 19 Jan 80 DW

[Excerpts from correspondent Maul interview with Christoph Bertram, director of the London Institute for Strategic Studies--recorded, apparently in London]

[Text] [Question] Do you think the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan constitutes a turning point in East-West relations?

[Answer] No, I do not judge this to be a turning point. I consider it the confirmation of a development which we in our institute have been emphasizing for years, namely that the geographic periphery of the Soviet Union is becoming more and more important strategically for the top Soviet leadership. The considerations that led to the Soviet action in Afghanistan are so threatening because they might also apply to other parts of this strategic periphery of the Soviet Union.

In the event the Soviet venture in Afghanistan is successful--it is still premature for a conclusive judgment--many people in the Soviet Union and outside the Soviet Union will point out that this brings the Soviet Union closer to the energy sources of the Persian Gulf. But I do not think that this was the triggering factor. What triggered the action was the consideration that a regime supported by the Soviets was in danger of being eliminated by the rebels, that a regime with which the Soviet Union had a treaty on friendship and assistance might be overthrown for the first time from within.

[Question] How do you assess the position of the Federal Republic in this changed climate of East-West relations?

[Answer] The Federal Republic is in a difficult position. It has profited from detente more than most other Western countries. This is why any discontinuation of detente is politically much more costly to the Federal Republic than for most other countries.

Secondly, the Federal Republic cannot afford to be isolated in the West. It continues to need the backing of the alliance, the backing of the United States. Yet the policy of the United States, which boils down to shaking the structures of detente proper rather than to facing the Soviets directly on the spot in Afghanistan, is bound to hit the Federal Republic severly, of course.

In the third place, the Federal Republic cannot afford to pretend toward the Soviet Union that nothing has happened, for what did happen is a gross violation of international law. Moreover, the Federal Republic as a highly developed industrial country is much more dependent on secure energy imports than is, for instance, the United States.

This means that it is bound to make a difference to the Federal Republic, in Europe, on the Persian Gulf and in Southwest Asia as to what the Soviets are doing. Displaying a great deal of will for cooperation now might only encourage the Soviets to consider Afghanistan a mere incident on the path of detente which will soon be forgotten.

U.S. PAST POLICIES OF 'APPEASEMENT' CRITICIZED

LD211449 London THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 20 Jan 80 p 16 LD

[Peregrine Worsthorne article: "When Carter Plays the Role of Hawk"]

[Excerpt] Finding the right response to the Soviet Union is going to take much detailed planning and preparation, of which there is yet no sign. Last week's scamper through Europe by an American under-secretary of state has merely served to highlight Washington's lamentable failure so far to realize how much harm its earlier policies have done; how deeply the rot of appeasement has set in. Ever since President Carter came to office, his administration has been articulating an attitude to world affairs that was bound to undermine confidence in America's seriousness as a superpower. Remember Andrew Young. Washington's stated purpose--proclaimed fatuously by Young and obscurely by Brzezinski--was to bring progress to the Third World. This meant putting pressure on all the traditional autocracies to modernise--i.e., liberalise, democratise and secularise, regardless of the fact that in reality this meant, more often than not, giving way to Soviet-armed insurgency, as in Nicaragua and Iran. Thus the consequence, for example, of America's concern with human rights has been to replace bad right-wing autocracies with worse--more repressive--left-wing ones, which is what progress nowadays has come to mean, as we are likely to see shortly in Rhodesia and, if President Carter has his way, in South Africa as well.

So it is not enough for President Carter to announce that he has at last seen the light about the aggressive intentions of the Soviet Union. That is only the first step--and much the easiest--towards enlightenment. Much more important would be some evidence that the United States has adopted a conceptual framework which includes traditional autocracies among those that actually deserve to be protected, not only because they are strategically valuable, but because they are also morally viable, less morally repressive than those that are certain to take their place. Only when the United States shows signs of understanding that traditional autocracies, like Saudi Arabia, are morally defensible, will her promises of protection carry conviction, because only then will the deeply moralistic American people be prepared to honour them in the face of what looks like popular revolt but is, in fact, only Russian-manipulated subversion. In other words, defending the free world has got to be accepted as having a legitimate new meaning: that of defending lesser "reactionary" tyrannies against greater "progressive" ones. Not an easy lesson for liberals to learn in a hurry. But until it is learnt, American anger with the Russians cannot be transformed into effective action on a world scale, since so much that needs to be done will not seem worth doing.

What has to be understood is that there are many layers to President Carter's innocence. His illusions come not singly but in battalions. No wonder, therefore, that Western Europe is cautious. Its faith in the United States will not restored as quickly as his in the Soviet Union was shattered. Doubtless he has been born again. But this is not the same as growing up.

TERRORIST KILLED BY BOMB BLAST REPORTED TO BE LEBANESE

NC192016 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1911 GMT 19 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Beirut, 19 January--The Lebanese newspaper AS-SAFIR today reports that the Arab youth who was killed the day before yesterday in the explosion at the Mount Royal Hotel in London was a Lebanese named Hasan Ilyas Badr and that he stayed at the hotel under the false name of Muhammad Sultan and with a Bahraini passport.

Quoting well-informed sources, the paper says that the youth was killed while preparing a bomb he planned to use against Israeli targets in the British capital, and that after setting the timer on the first bomb he worked on the second which exploded and killed him. The original bomb exploded about 5 hours after the first explosion.

The paper adds that the operation which the youth would have carried out was aimed not only against the Mount Royal Hotel, where Israeli intelligence men were staying, but also against other areas which these sources refused to reveal. The youth had taken part in several Fedayeen operations against Israeli interests in various European capitals.

DENKTAS' MEETING WITH U.S. AMBASSADOR STONE NOTED

TA211824 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 21 Jan 80 TA

[Text] President Denktas has stressed once again that nothing will be accepted by the Turkish Cypriot community through pressure. He made this statement when replying to questions put to him by reporters after a meeting with the American ambassador in Nicosia, Mr Galen Stone, this afternoon.

The president said that Mr Stone's visit was part of routine diplomatic contacts, and he categorically denied Greek Cypriot press reports that Mr Stone was coming to see him today in order to exert pressure on the question of Varosha. Mr Denktas said that the ambassador had inquired about developments concerning the resumption of the intercommunal talks and about the views of the Turkish Cypriot leadership on the prospects for the resumption of the talks. The ambassador had also wanted to know the causes of the difficulties faced on the matter. The president reiterated that the Turkish Cypriot community had a just cause and that it had to fight in order to safeguard the independence and freedom of Cyprus and its partnership rights in the independence and sovereignty of the island. Repeating that there is no pressure on the Turkish Cypriot community, Mr Denktas said that the resumption of the talks depended on the intention of the Greek Cypriots to return to the conference table in good faith in order to reestablish the bicommunal partnership. In conclusion, President Denktas said that everything was destroyed by the recent resolution of the UN General Assembly on Cyprus and that a fair and sensible approach was needed now to rectify the situation.

NEW GREEK CYPRIOT PAPER INTERVIEWS DENKTAS

NC211113 Nicosia ESPERINI in Greek 21 Jan 80 p 5 NC

[Interview granted by Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktas to correspondents Nansia Khatziioannou and Anna Konstandinidhou on 17 January--place not given]

[Excerpts] Question: Do you see a possibility of an early resumption of the intercommunal talks?

Answer: The Greek Cypriot side chose to raise obstacles to resuming the talks. It disregarded point 6 of the 19 May agreement and resorted to the international field in order to obtain unrealistic resolutions. Now UN Secretary General Waldheim is trying to find a way to overcome these obstacles. If he succeeds in this difficult task, then the talks can be resumed.

Question: Are you willing to visit the Greek sector of Nicosia if invited by Mr Kiprianou?

Answer: The time for social visits has not yet come. I am ready to meet the leader of the Greek Cypriot community to discuss questions connected with the settlement of the Cyprus problem. The venue for such meetings is within the buffer zone.

Question: If the efforts to resume the talks fail and the stalemate continues what concrete measures does your side intend to take?

Answer: The Turkish Cypriot community was expelled from the partnership administration through the force of arms in 1963 and was forced into self-government while it was waging a heroic resistance against the coordinated forces of Greeks and Greek Cypriots to avert complete destruction of the partnership republic.

The effort of the Greek Cypriots to destroy the foundations of the republic, that is of the political partnership of the two ethnic communities, is a reality that should not be overlooked by the Greek Cypriot leaders.

Do they not understand that the crisis in Cyprus will end solely when the partnership in government is restored? Until this is achieved, every action or statement by the Greek Cypriot side that is presented under the guise of the "Government of Cyprus gives fresh life to and reason for the existence of the Turkish Cypriot government in the north.

If the talks are not resumed and the Greek Cypriot leadership prefers the international propaganda which uses the title "Government of Cyprus," it is natural that the Turkish Cypriot Government's reaction will continue accordingly.

Question: If the government of Cyprus proposes to you the establishment of a transitional government based on the 70 percent and 30 percent of the 1960 Constitution, would you be willing to agree?

Answer: Let them accept the proposal for the establishment of a transitional government and then the two sides will discuss the details.

Question: You have reacted positively to Mr Kiprianou's recent proposals which will indirectly bring economic benefits to your community. What is your stand toward the other proposals?

Answer: I have said that the government in the north is ready to discuss ways and means of achieving normality with the south. I have intentionally refrained from dealing with the so-called constructive proposals because I did not wish to repeat harsh things. However, you have asked the question and I must answer it: If Mr Kiprianou is interested in the pedagogical aspect of the problem he must understand that his offer in this field is not sincere. If he had offered to pay the Turkish community the educational grants envisaged by the 1960 Constitution--grants that the Turkish community have not received since 1963 (now these grants must be around 16 million pounds)--then all would have noticed an honest intention in Mr Kiprianou's offer. However, what he stipulates as educational offers are mere deceitful propaganda because no one can take advantage of these offers unless questions of security, the right of movement and so forth are settled within the framework of intercommunal talks.

Question: How do you view the practical aspect of the question of the return of Greek Cypriot hoteliers to Famagusta?

Answer: I have discussed this question in London with a team of their representatives. If the Greek Cypriot leaders state that whoever is willing to open his hotel is free to do so (this would in no way affect either the talks or the future status of Famagusta) then this would be the beginning of a settlement of everything.

PASOK CHAIRMAN BLAMES U.S. FOR 'RETURN TO COLD WAR'

AT201612 Athens EXORMISIS in Greek 20 Jan 80 pp 1, 11 AT

[Statement made by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou at PASOK's New Year party--date not given]

[Text] Speaking at PASOK's New Year party the leader of the majority opposition, Andreas Papandreou, made the following statement: "I am extremely happy to be with you tonight in order to wish PASOK and our country a happy new year. We have entered 1980 in a climate similar to a world tempest which rages near our own area and which portends catalytic developments on a worldwide scale.

"The crisis which rages in the West and generally in capitalism is very deep as we forecast a long time ago. In the past two years it has brought about a return to the cold war conditions that prevailed after the end of World War II. It is certain that despite specific developments, such as installation of new missiles in West Europe, the people's revolution in Iran, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan; despite these extremely significant developments, it is clear that the United States returned to a cold war climate at least 2 years ago and that it was simply waiting for the expedient moment to once again attempt to enslave West Europe and all countries which belong to the Western coalition in one way or the other, and to open the way for a speedy culmination of armaments and thus, once again, to threaten world peace.

"There is no other explanation for the readiness with which the United States gave its reply to the intervention in Afghanistan. As far back as 2 years ago all reports to Washington from the U.S. ambassador in Kabul warned of these inevitable developments. Carter knew in detail, in the same way that the entire U.S. establishment knew, that Afghanistan had unavoidably been incorporated into the USSR coalition. The military intervention was nothing more than completing the political task which had already been accomplished.

"Thus we enter 1980 in a climate of achieving cold war. Our area is faced with considerable dangers. There is the question of Tito's health. All of us in PASOK and I believe all the Greeks, wish him well. There is the question of relations between Romania and the Warsaw Pact. At the same time, however, beyond the Balkans, beyond the area of the Mediterranean in which we also live, beyond the Cyprus issue, beyond the Turkish threat in the Aegean, which is a direct threat against our country's territorial integrity, there is vast and dangerous conflict over the oil rich Middle East and the Persian Gulf.

"Naturally we must not become victims of propaganda. It is a fact that at this moment there is a well orchestrated propaganda campaign to convince the people that this is not the time for any social, economic or political changes; that these are dangerous moments which require Greece to return totally, finally and irrevocably to the military wing of the alliance. There will also be vast pressures upon the Greek Government to resolve both the Cyprus issue and the Aegean issue under conditions which would mean reducing Greek territory.

"Consequently, we are faced with dangerous developments not only on a worldwide scale but also in our own immediate area. We are particularly faced with the U.S. threat against the very freedoms, the very democratic institutions and the very course laid down by the people's movement in Greece which, despite contrary U.S. desires, leads to the victory of the people and of PASOK.

"PASOK--and this is no more a simple wish but an established truth--has become the main and decisive representative of the people's movement in our country. Through its policy, its positions, its action, it opens up an avenue which leads toward a new Greece after entire decades of lost opportunities for our people. We in PASOK have a huge responsibility to history and the people of Greece to remain faithful fighters.

"It is not sufficient, however, that we are determined and militant. What will satisfy the people's wishes and what justifies the historic moment is that PASOK must win, and through PASOK the people must win. This is why at this very moment we cannot afford the luxury of dealing with petty internal problems. The time has come when we should become true soldiers in the service of a people who have suffered so much in their effort to once again see the sun rising in our skies.

"Our organization must quickly open its gates and embrace our people, the farmers, the workers, the artesans, the wage earners and the youth of our country. The movement is vast. The movement has deep roots among the people and it is we who will be responsible if we are unable to embrace our people and safely lead them toward the victory that they deserve. The year 1980 will be a significant year for PASOK and for Greece. We must warn everyone that either they join our ranks with self-sacrifice and with a militant spirit or else they should get off the band wagon now so that we may not have problems later. I wish a good year for PASOK and the entire country."

RPP SENATOR INTERVIEWED ON AFGHANISTAN, IRAN

NC211100 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 20 Jan 80 p 5 NC

[Exclusive interview granted to GUNAYDIN by Muhsin Batur, Republican People's Party [RPP] senator and former commander of the Turkish Air Force--date and place not given]

[Text] Ankara (special)--Question: How do you evaluate the Afghanistan developments?

Answer: In reality the Afghan events are not new. For the past 25 years, the Afghan leaders have been pursuing a policy of rapprochement with the Soviet Union--a policy which would enable them to realize their internal political ambitions with the support of the Soviet Union. Taking advantage of both the internal revolutionary struggles of Afghanistan and the situation in Iran following the U.S. Embassy events, the Soviet Union has established its domination over Afghanistan. Now the Russians are facing Pakistan and Baluchistan, which is partly in Iran and partly in Pakistan. They can go down to the warm seas by that route. From a military point of view, I do not believe the Afghan resistance movement stands a chance against the Soviet Union. The Afghans may continue their resistance for a while only because the structure of the land gives them that advantage.

Question: What sort of developments do you expect in the event of Tito's death?

Answer: Marshal Tito's illness during this period of critical events in Iran and Afghanistan is unfortunate. Tito is a factor in the national unity of seven or eight nations in Yugoslavia. Three things may happen in Yugoslavia after Tito's death: The present status quo may be preserved; Yugoslavia may slide into the Eastern bloc; it may distintegrate. Should Yugoslavia fail to preserve its internal unity, it is quite likely that it will slide toward the Eastern bloc. If this happens, Turkey's position will be critical. It will be exposed to two converging forces.

Question: What must Turkey do under such circumstances in the Middle East?

Answer: The United States is making efforts to create a new alliance with the participation of Egypt, Israel, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. The United Stated wishes to protect its oil interests and become stronger in the Mediterranean. I believe that Turkey should not participate in such an alliance. It will suffice for Turkey to be in NATO. It would be a blunder to be on the side of those who undertake to be the vanguard of the United States within the Arab world. We must not take sides in the internal skirmishes of the Arabs. It should be added that the main policies of the two great powers lead to violation of the rules of international law when their interests demand it. According to them, they can block the way to the settlement of problems that concern the small countries. In these days, with extremely important events taking place in our area, Turkey must resolve its internal problems as quickly as possible and turn its attention to developing into a strong state. This will be possible only when the political parties stop struggling against each other in an excessive and offensive manner. They must adopt a more conciliatory attitude. The Turkish nation immediately unites when exposed to a direct military attack. However, if we are weak, we may be confronted with heavy political demands, most probably first from the Soviet Union and then from the United States.

Question: What do you foresee with respect to the development of events in Iran?

Answer: The militant action taken in Iran against the U.S. Embassy runs counter both to humanity and international law. In return, the United States seems to be preparing for economic sanctions against Iran as well as for a subsequent military intervention in that country by concentrating its warships and submarines, equipped with nuclear weapons, in the Persian Gulf. The United States seems to have enlisted the support of the United Nations and NATO regarding sanctions. A probable U.S. intervention in Iran would involve the use of the air force on a broad scale and that would lead to genocide and devastation. It is difficult for the United States to invade Iran using ground forces as it has no common borders with Iran. The Soviet Union is in a more advantageous position in this respect. However, no matter which side attacks, Iran will be divided between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Question: What attitude would the Turkish Armed Forces take in the face of such developments?

Answer: The Turkish Armed Forces are confronted with two problems: The first is that the economic difficulties of our country reflect on them and the second is that they must deploy their strength on a broad scale to maintain law and order. Turkey must relieve its armed forces of their duties in internal security. For instance, today the 1st Army Corps is spending huge sums of money and exerting great efforts in maintaining law and order in Istanbul. I do not think martial law can be lifted in the near future. On the other hand, we should not attach much importance to the measures package, which parliament is expected to endorse. The socioeconomic problems, which are the root of terrorism, can be eliminated only through long term efforts. The only thing that can be done now on a short term basis is to create a strong and impartial intelligance service, capable of countering incidents and militant actions and of rendering them ineffective.

AYDINLIK REPORTS CIVIL DEFENSE SURVEY BEING MADE

NC221000 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 21 Jan 80 p 1, 7 NC

[Text] Ankara (speical)--Following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the grave condtion of Marshal Tito's health, Turkey has begun to review its preparations for a problem war.

All organizations concerned with civil defense have been instructed to review the work done so far. They have also been instructed to complete "plans for war preparations." Consequently, the civil defense organizations are making a survey of the work to be carried out at the institutions which they would protect in the event of a war. It is reported that a commission, composed of high-ranking representatives from various ministries and organizations has been set up to coordinate the work.

CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE TRT POLITICAL NEWS

TA171722 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Jan 80 TA

[Text] TRT [Turkish Radio and TV Administration] Director General Dogan Kasaroglu has said that in a bid to avoid daily polemics, TRT reports concerning the views of the political parties will be examined by a consultative committee comprising representatives of all political parties. In a news conference held in Istanbul today Kasaroglu said that this would represent a new trend in the TRT's relations with the political parties. Kasaroglu said that the consultative committee composed of representatives of political parties having seats at the parliament will meet every 15 days. Objections by party representatives will be dealt with during these meetings. He recalled that the TRT dealt with political news items in a completely impartial way and that it would continue to do so.

Recalling that article 26 of the Constitution asked for legislation providing for the impartial, democratic and just expression of the views of the political parties on the radio and television Kasaroglu said: Although the TRT was established 15 years ago, such a law has still not been passed. This causes occasional friction between the TRT and the political parties. The leaders of parties with whom I discussed this issue have promised to exert efforts to enact such a law. Such legislation will permit the TRT--as in other Western countries--to prepare special programs for political parties thus alleviating the burden of the newscasts which carry news concerning the views of political parties.

Noting that the TRT was facing economic difficulties, the TRT director asked that the annual radio and television subscription rates be increased.

NAP DEPUTY ACCUSES RPP YOUTHS OF SUPPORTING COMMUNISTS

TA211647 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Jan 80 TA

[Text] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] Deputy General Secretary Yasar Okuyan has accused the RPP [Republican People's Party] spokesman of attacking his party under the guise of criticizing the government. In a written statement released in Ankara today, Okuyan said that as a result of a statement by an RPP deputy general secretary claiming that the NAP was a source of terror, attacks were being launched against the party's offices and members. Okuyan continued: Is the NAP a source of terror or a target of terror? The best answer to this question can be seen in the action of the 14 RPP youth organization members in Istanbul who have agreed to the call for unity of action made by the clandestine Turkish Communist Party. Okuyan added that instead of seeking to criticize others, the RPP spokesman would do well to account to the public for the actions of their youth organization members.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

EC PARLIAMENT SEEKS AFGHANISTAN SANCTIONS, ASKS IOC TO RECONSIDER MOSCOW

LD221003 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Jan 80 p 5 LD

[Philippe Lemaitre dispatch: "European Parliament: Condemnation in Disorder and Confusion"]

[Excerpt] Strasbourg--A tough resolution on Afghanistan was finally approved, on Wednesday, 16 January, by the center-right majority of the European Parliament. This text, presented jointly by Christian Democrats, British Conservatives and Liberals, condemns the USSR's "brutal" intervention and asks the European Comission and member states to apply economic sanctions and "to act in harmony with all governments" in condemning this aggression. The International Olympic Committee and national sports federations are also asked to reconsider their participation in the Moscow Summer Olympics.

The socialist group and the PCI voted against it. The PCF and European Democrats for Progress group (including the Rally for the Republic) did not vote. M. Ansart explained on behalf of the PCF that his group, opposed in any case to the proposed resolutions (since they all condemn the USSR), wanted to show its opposition to the assembly's abuse of power. The European Democrats for Progress, who presented their own resolution, withdrew it and left the session in protest at the chaotic atmosphere in which the vote took place. Italian Radical leader Panella, whose interventions, in truth, did not help the president's task, left the floor in order not to be associated with a "mock vote."

Another resolution put forward by the socialists and drafted with PCI help was rejected by the Parliament. The PCI, in keeping with its commitments, voted in favor. This resolution condemned the USSR but stressed the need to preserve detente. The consensus within the European left, emphasizing the PCF's isolation, gives obvious satisfaction to the French Socialists.

The PCI did not withdraw the resolution it had proposed before its arrangement with the socialists. The parliament rejected it, with the socialists abstaining.

LUNS URGES INCREASED MILITARY, ECONOMIC AID TO TURKEY

TA212035 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 21 Jan 80 TA

[Text] NATO Secretary General Jospeh Luns has said that military and economic aid to Turkey must be increased following the developments in the region, including the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan. Luns was speaking at the NATO Council meeting held in Brussels today. The United States' appeal to boycott the Moscow Olympics and the developments in the region following the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan were discussed at the special meeting held at the level of permanent representatives this afternoon. The issue of increasing military and economic aid to Turkey was emphasized. Following the NATO Secretary General's speech urging increased military and economic aid to Turkey, various other representatives also expressed their views on the issue.

The chairman of the NATO Military Committee, Gen Herman Zeiner Gundersen, and the U.S., FRG and U.K. representatives said that they agreed with Luns' views on the issue of Turkey. These representatives also urged speeding up the work necessary to extend military and economic aid to Turkey.

GENERAL COMMENTS ON MILITARY PREPAREDNESS; REACTIONS GIVEN

AU221348 [Editorial Report AU] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 22 January 1980 carries on page 2 a 300-word report on a Georg Possanner interview with General Wilhelm Kuntner, commander of the Austrian National Defense Academy, stressing that the general "regards it as wrong for Austria to 'contribute to the psychological escalation' by conspicuously raising its defense preparedness at the present time." According to the paper, Kuntner said in this context: "Otherwise, it would be said that we, too, believe that the Russians are coming. There can be no question of any troop concentrations in southern Hungary or Bulgaria." He added that there were not enough troops deployed for an invasion of Yugoslavia, and Yugoslavia's military measures merely indicated that it either feels threatened or wants to make clear that it will defend itself.

"An increase of Austrian defense preparedness--intensified guarding of the borders or partial mobilization--is a political decision. Such measures would become necessary should there be massive troops reinforcements in the neighborhood of Yugoslavia, Kuntner said." He adds: "'If in Hungary another 15 or 20 divisions were added to the 6 divisions now stationed there, then we, too, would have to take such measures.' But this would take time and certainly could not pass unnoticed. At any rate, an attack on Yugoslavia is not possible without preparations," he is reported as saying.

Vienna KURIER in German on 20 January carries on page 5 a 1,500-word interview with Kuntner. According to the paper, the general said that to him a Soviet invasion of Yugoslavia was no longer as inconceivable from a military point of view as it would have been 10 years ago, since the balance of weapons systems effective in Europe has changed in favor of the USSR. However, he felt that Austria had "a certain chance" of being kept out of a potential East-West conflict since, from an overall strategic viewpoint, "neither for the East nor for the West is it absolutely necessary to seize the territory of neutral Austria."

According to the paper, Kuntner declared that the question of missile weapons for the Austrian Army--he called them "self-propelled and guided defensive combat weapon systems" arguing that even the Soviets nowadays have a completely different idea of "missiles"--actually "constitutes no problem at all." Asked whether he would "not ask, but just go ahead and buy them," Kuntner declared: "Yes, we don't need any special interpretation of our own of the state treaty. It would be the worst thing we could do to seek that. Rather, we can adopt the position that others in a similar position--such as the Finns--do possess those arms systems."

KURIER on 22 January on page two carries a commentary by Fritz Pesata, entitled "General, You Are Wrong." He argues that the question of missile weapons is not only a military question but also a highly political one, and therefore should not be publicly discussed by military figures but only by political ones. Secondly, he continues, the text of the state treaty ban on such weapons is so unequivocal that any attempt to reinterpret it is bound to be futile. It follows that missile weapons for the Austrian Army can be obtained only through appropriate negotiations with the state treaty powers--and for that "there are more suitable times than the present, as well as more competent persons, General," the commentator says.

CSU CHAIRMAN STRAUSS SPEAKS IN BUNDESTAG DEBATE 17 JAN

Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1300 GMT 17 Jan 80 DW

[Speech by Franz Josef Strauss, CSU chairman, Bavarian minister-president and chancellor candidate of the CDU/CSU, in the 17 January Bundestag debate on the international situation following the USSR intervention in Afghanistan--live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: May I be allowed from the very outset to note that I was informed about the absence of the chancellor this afternoon due to his suffering from the flu, and that he thus cannot participate in the continuing debate. I say this expressly because I would have criticized the absence of the chancellor if it had been for another reason. In this particular case, however, I recognize the reasons, of course. [applause]

But if I view the contents of the government statement of this morning, the contents of the government statement on which I must base my explanations, I arrive at the conclusion--and I do not mean this to convey any sarcasm but at best some ironical polemics--that as far as the government statement is concerned the debate might as well have not taken place at all. [applause] There was no reason whatsoever to hear this government statement. We could have waited with any large-scale foreign policy debate until the chancellor was able to watch the debate again.

Colleague Helmut Kohl, in his final remarks, drew the attention of the chancellor to the seriousness of the situation and to the burdens, and perhaps sacrifices, that we will be facing. He said in this context: you have neither the courage nor the followers to announce and enforce that in public. I must say, unfortunately, that the chancellor also lacks a sense of reality, for what he has said today is nothing but the endless sequence of platitudes which have been advanced in sacred form and sometimes with a smart, heroic pose but which have very very little to do with the issue with which we are dealing here today. [applause]

I have another remark to make. If requirements, burdens and sacrifices are to confront us, this Federal Government will definitely not be capable of fulfilling these tasks without the opposition in the Bundestag and without the political cooperation of the CDU/CSU-supported laender governments. We not only do not want to give the Federal Government any trouble in fulfilling these tasks--this applies to nuclear energy, the implementation of the NATO decision--we also wish expressly to declare our readiness for cooperation and for the assumption of a responsibility which is not always popular. I have done that several times before from this rostrum, in my capacity as Bundestag deputy and as the minister-president of a great land of the Federal Republic; but it would be desirable, by the same token, for the chancellor to invite the chairman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag Faction and the joint candidate of the two union parties for a dialog, particularly because we are in an election year, in order to discuss the tasks, burdens and sacrifices ahead and to debate openly, also in our controversial positions, the political mode of behavior connected therewith. [applause]

If what matters is the fulfillment of great national responsibilities having international import, it is not only the government but also the opposition that must bear its share of the burden and which, I may add, also wants to and will bear it. [applause]

I am making this offer in the awareness of the cohesion of the CDU/CSU in the assessment of the world situation, in the judgment of the risks and dangers looming ahead for us, and in the careful assessment of the potential tasks and burdens. I am making it--and this is not a political polemic--because the differences and deviations, meaning the dissension, about the assessment of the essence and objectives of Soviet policy extend far into the rank and file of the SPD and perhaps also partially of the FDP.

What I consider a true political blunder, a genuine, serious political mistake is the representation of the world situation as a consequence of our detente policy, a representation of the world situation which has largely led to the destruction of the awareness of the problems. [applause] If we, Mr Foreign Minister, are sitting in one boat--and you say we are sitting on the edge of it, which is true--only when the boat keels over is the one sitting in the middle not better off, possibly worse. If we are in such a position on the edge of the boat, then the knowledge of the dangers, the awareness of the challenges, the knowledge of the risks in a merciless analysis free of self-deceit is more important for the one sitting on the edge than for the one who is still sitting far away from the hotbed of danger. [applause]

We must view tension and detente as a natural historical development which, however, in view of European geography and in view of the peculiarities of the powers involved gains a special quality here. Tensions between great powers have always existed. Especially when I heard about the Russian invasion of Afghanistan I, like many others surely, remembered that as early as in the 19th century tension occurred between the great power Russia and the world power England in the Central Asian region, a tension in which the geographic position of the Khyber Pass and its military control played a decisive role for the conditions then prevalent. This is not new.

Ladies and gentlemen, all this, thank God, is past history. The only question of tensions today is not a clash of interests here and there between us and France or in the question of the EC financing between us and Great Britain. These are normal political routine developments. There is a true problem of tension and thus also of the necessity of detente, and that is the relationship between the democratic sphere of power and the communist sphere of power, the relationship of these two power groups with each other; and the peculiarities of these groups constitute the character of the tension. This is why this question must be judged from the viewpoint of power policy as well as philosophically and morally.

On several occasions I have spoken out at this rostrum with genuine conviction against this neutrality of value with which the power system of communism and the governmental and social system of the world of democratic states is being treated as morally equal. We cannot derive great claims from that; yet for our own moral key, for our own moral and philosophical orientation we should not lose sight of the maxim that we must risk tensions now and then if we advocate freedom [applause], if and when we advocate the freedom and the rights of man in all of Germany, also in the other part of Germany, the freedom and the rights of the nations and the people in the East and southeast European regions.

During the noon recess some interesting bits of news came up, there was a DPA report from Tokyo that five Soviet warships, including a missile-carrying cruiser of the Kara class, were seen in the Sea of Japan on Thursday. According to information released by the Japanese Defense Ministry, the small flotilla was presumably en route to the Indian Ocean to reinforce the presence of the Soviet Navy there.

This is also the consequence of a fact to which the (?Italian) prime minister has drawn my attention: namely, that the Soviet Pacific Fleet today no longer needs to operate from Vladivostok, but can now have its starting point 4,500 kilometers further south, following the restoration of the former U.S. naval bases in Vietnam and their conversion to meet the requirements of the Soviet Navy. Thus it has a range into the hotbed of crisis of world politics which will yet give us a lot of trouble. I am neither a genius nor a prophet, but it will give us a lot of trouble, of that I am firmly convinced. I have no reason to change this prognosis, just as I had no need to amend any of my earlier prognoses of this nature.

I have heard that peace has become more secure: I do not say this ironically. Some 10 years ago it was at best one out of a hundred who was afraid of war. In the mid-seventies it was few more. Just before Christmas, prior to the invasion of Afghanistan, a public opinion poll showed that every fifth person is afraid of war, and following the events in Afghanistan, every third. So one cannot but wonder what is wrong with this form and concept of detente policy. There must be something wrong. [applause] What matters is not pigheadness. It is not the one drawing attention to the facts who creates the dangers. The dangers come from the facts and tendencies, not from those who recognize them properly and truthfully tell the public about them. That should not be turned upside down. [applause]

If the policy of the Soviet Union had taken a different course, and we know what we mean by a different course--without Hungary, without Prague, if all that had already been forgotten, and now without Afghanistan--then we, the opposition, could roam the country like cheap traveling salesmen and be called fools if we talked of the dangerous character of Soviet policy just to have our way by being politically bullheaded. The thing is, the facts prove us right. We have not created the facts, say, by means of political speeches.

One can judge properly the armament of a great power like the Soviet Union only if one views three criteria at the same time: One of them is the potential. The potential has grown during the past several years at breathtaking speed. The invasion of Afghanistan also showed that the technical mishaps that occurred in August 1968 have been nearly completely ironed out, international military experts say. The composition of the potential has changed. All components, the ground, air and naval forces, have mediun-range and intercontinental missiles; they have undergone a gigantic quantiative and qualitative reinforcement. Yet the offensive components of the ground, air and naval forces have been stepped up much more strongly than the defense components.

I do realize the difficulty of drawing a plausible, tangible difference between offensive and defensive arms. However, the capability of transporting large components over great distances, far beyond the requirements of the Soviet Union, has increased dramatically in the course of the past few years. The Americans have granted the Soviets strategic parity, meaning thereby nuclear parity. The Soviets understood this to mean something different, namely the same worldwide presence of the Soviets on all five continents, if possible, just as the United States had it temporarily shortly after World War II. This Soviet potential is serving the building of this worldwide presence. This Soviet potential allows all military options; it allows an invasion of Afghanistan with perhaps five divisions and corresponding logistical troops; it allows even the smallest actions; it also allows subversive actions, and it would also allow, albeit under unimaginable horror and destruction, the great conflict between the two powers.

I will now proceed to the next group, which is the intentions of the Soviet leadership. I do not contend, nor have I ever contended, nor will I do so in the future, hoping that I will be right at least in this respect, that the intentions of the Soviet leadership are tantamount to unleashing World War III. This is why I advocated the view in previous debates in this house that peace in Europe, despite Berlin and despite the wall and the great military potentials across the border, after World War II, was never seriously jeopardized. [paragraph continues]

Surely there were some aggravations over Berlin sometimes, or in connection with the Cuban crisis. Surely we would also have been affected by it. Yet only a fool could take into consideration here the Verdun strategy of Falkenhain at the time, namely creating a mill of blood and bones, harming the adversary under a frontal attack while suffering immense losses in the process.

I admit one other thing regarding Soviet leadership: They are not military adventurers who, like Hitler, in a mixture of madness and crime know only brutal force and want to score successes on the battlefield.

I will proceed to the third category. This involves the long-term strategic trends. In these long-term strategic trends, the combination of grand Russian imperialism and world revolutionary objectives of the Kremlin, this seamless combination, is quite obvious. What must be added to these three principles, these three guidelines, is the clamp function of the pressure to keep their own sphere of power together over the GDR, the Poles, the Czechs, the Hungarians, which I would not want to call of equal rank here, however. The potential allows everything. The intention is to avoid World War III, and the long-term strategic objective is a combination of grand Russian imperialism, also dating back to the tsarist bra, with a world revolutionary goal. The Soviet actions from about mid-1970 on must be viewed with this analysis.

We have been seeing this trend toward a worldwide grasp since the mid-seventies, toward a worldwide operational cabapility. I said here once what nobody will argue today, namely, that a gigantic military depot exists in Libya, which is not provided for purposes of the Libyan or Algerian troops but for equipping units flown in as personnel, as it were. I do not claim that the Soviet Union will do that; yet it is creating for itself all preconditions for establishing for itself in the crisis belt from the north of Afghanistan to the south of Africa--where East-West and North-South are seamlessly joined--a starting position which then is to allow it to exercise control over this area also in the event of a larger military operation.

Ladies and gentlemen, please believe that I do not have any intention of defaming or abusing the leadership of the Soviet Union nor declaring them war criminals. These are categories which we had after World War II with the trials and all. What matters to me is only to ask myself whether I am right in this analysis of Soviet policy; whether I am right in this analysis of the definition of the objective of the Soviet potential, its further development and its further enhancement. Or do I need to correct my view? This is the only attitude commensurate with the responsibility of a politician.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, who knows what the next 8 days will bring, or the next 4 weeks? But if the hostages are not released, and I need not repeat our judgment on that as all of us have the same judgment, then the Americans will be forced to impose at least serious measures of an unbloody nature, for instance, blockade measures, lest this world power bring humilation upon itself even beyond the degree of self-humilation. If this happens, a period of extreme tension, extreme insecurity, will begin, and economic consequences may ensue which we cannot imagine at this time.

It is a fact that the crisis belt from the north of Afghanistan to the south of Africa forms an uninterrupted strategic whole. We are discussing Afghanistan today, the consequences of Afghanistan. Some 11 years ago we discussed Czechoslovakia and the consequences of the action. When will we be talking about the Arab peninsula? When will we hear again that developments there are being viewed with concern? Whom does the military deployment in South Yemen serve?

Let me say here plainly, ladies and gentlemen: The world keeps silent about the Africa corps of Mr Honecker. East German communist soldiers of the communist NVA National People's Army] are present in Angola with a specific mission. I do not have enough time to describe all this in detail. They are in Ethiopia, they are in Mozambique, they are surely in South Yemen. In addition, there are Soviet Russians and Cubans. What is the purpose of the military deployment in South Yemen? [paragraph continues]

The president of North Yemen has already made an approach because he is truly afraid; he is afraid, which is why he did not wait for the U.S. arms deliveries but has ordered Soviet arms now, believing that he might thus better hold his own since the Americans surely do not want to overthrow him. So what is the target? The target is to replace the feudal-monarchic regimes on the Arab peninsula with social-revolutionary regimes. This is the objective of that policy. The foreign minister and those who constantly deal with the diplomats of these states know what concern prevails there with respect to the future of Kuwait, Qatar, Oman, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia.

Let me say in this context a word about the geographic responsibility of NATO. It is necessary to differentiate between the geography of its member states and the security interests which have also been stipulated in the treaty. The concept of the northern Tropic of Cancer including the airplanes and ships located north of this--I believe the 22D--latitude plays a great role. One should be allowed, for God's sake, to say that the defination of security chosen in 1949 is no longer in keeping with the present military conditions. [applause]

At the CDU/CSU security policy congress I refrained from saying that German units, units of the Federal Republic, be stationed somewhere in these regions. Yet the world would cry out in outrage if only one single unit of the Federal Border Police were put into action somewhere for the protection of German citizens. But it acknowledges the Africa corps of Honecker with calm and as a foregone conclusion, just as one might say: Well, a predatory animal must have its meat, it is part of its nature. This constant intervention policy in Africa--Angola, Mozambique, the key point Ethiopia; the center of the Soviet General Staff for Africa is located in Addis Ababa and a number of Soviet generals and marshals, and also an East German, a GDR, general is among this elite, are there, doing what, development aid, welfare promotion, deepening of friendship among peoples?--this policy constitutes a piece of classical, naked power which is adorned with ideology and revolutionary trappings. [applause]

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, if we regard this belt of crisis from the north of Afghanistan to the south of Africa as an entity, and that is what it is, we see the following: The Soviet fleet transferred 4,500 kilometers southward to extend its radius of operations into the Indian Ocean and to the Horn of Africa without any difficulty; Soviet troops stationed 500 kilometers north of the Indian Ocean as a result of the occupation of Afghanistan; armament in South Yemen with the support of Cubans, East Germans, and Russians; the development in Ethopia, the events in Mozambique and in Angola. Are these coincidences, one saying I will operate here for a change and the other saying I will go to another country instead?

No, all these are components of a grandiosely devised global power strategy--and if one were able to talk free of morality this should be said with great recognition--in the face of which the United States at best develops a shortwinded, hectic counter strategy from one presidential election to the next; that is, when the consequences of one election have been overcome and the shadow of the next election has not become too strong. What I am saying here is not just my opinion, it is also that of Mr Kissinger, who expressed it on various occasions with partially even more drastic formulations.

What is the objective of this strategy anyway? After all, this strategy also burdens the Soviet Union. The last grain harvest was miserable. The economic conditions are anything but brilliant. We know that the maintenance and continuous modernization of large military machineries constitutes an immense burden to the national economy. Mr Genscher gave some figures here today. In this connection the personnel costs are lower in both percentages and absolutely than they are in the Western armies with their entirely different position of the soldier as a citizen in uniform and his pay.

This is a pressing burden on the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union spends an unreasonably high portion of its gross national product for this armament, continuous modernization and the reinforcement of the offensive components. I always ask myself why they are doing it. Are they so foolish as to overlook the harm? Must we help them comprehend this? The whole thing--and we should never overlook or forget this in the case of communist regimes--is that the political goals have priority over economic considerations. [applause] They figure that the world will return to business as usual after Afghanistan just as quickly as it did in 1968-69. I am not saying this out of malice of party polemics. Was it not you, Mr Brandt, and was it not the fanatics of stepped-up ostpolitik who veritably promoted, likewise in a stepped-up manner, the moral rehabilitation of the Soviet Union after the invasion of Prague? [applause, commotion]

Do not tell us now, treaty is treaty. My view is that pacta sunt servanda. I shall never be induced to go beyond what the Federal Constitutional Court has established in the way of limits, nor will I ever be induced to recognize the partition of Germany into two nations as the logical consequence of these treaties. The treaties are bad, yet they are valid, and we have to live with this fact. This is still no reason to jusiify them or their architects post facto.

The Soviet Union is taking this great economic sacrifice upon itself. The form of government there makes it possible to demand more of the people than would be possible in a democracy. But why? Because with the reach for the Middle East and with the reach toward the oil reserves of the Middle East and toward the raw material resources of Africa, Europe could be made politically complaisant, meaning it could be blackmailed, without one shot being fired.

Are we really aware of how prone to blackmail we are? Our political-social systems are vulnerable, dependent, prone to blackmail for energy and raw materials. A slight loss of more oil deliveries, a slightly greater scarcity of the five and the other thirteen raw materials which are indispensable to a modern industry would create immense unemployment in our country which would simply make it impossible to maintain the network of social security in its present effectiveness.

This is the state of affairs which the Soviet Union wants to bring about, namely to destabilize our political and social systems, so anyone having his hand on oil and raw materials is the master of Europe, even without medium-range missiles. So why the medium-range missiles?

We have heard sufficient military reasons, and these reasons are conclusive, too. There is perhaps one reason. I have not as yet read it, but this is my opinion, namely that this deployment of the medium-range missiles with their offensive character is naturally also to intimidate the Europeans to prevent them from protecting jointly with the Americans their vital lines, their vital communications lines in the Middle East and Africa. This, too, is a mission of these medium-range missiles, not the destruction of Europe but the paralysis and intimidation of Europe. [applause]

Mr Foreign Minister, as far as the military defense of Western interests is concerned I must agree with you in one point, whereas I have to disagree with you in another. I agree with you that it is not up to the Federal Republic of Germany to stand in the foremost frontline here, for reasons I stated at the security policy congress of the CDU/CSU, for reasons that have simply developed from our past, and so forth. Yet in one point I fail to share your view, namely owing to my many talks with Arab and African state presidents. We must give these people the guarantee that they will not be left alone by us in the hour of subversion, in the hour of the artifically unleashed civil wars, in the hour of the call for help from the friends--you know what I mean by that. [applause]

The impression must be prevented from spreading that anyone being allied with or being inclined toward the West is lost, is threatened by defeat, ruin and death; but that whoever is allied with the Soviet Union will enjoy victory, survival, power and all earthly riches connected with this power. This, after all, is the problem the West must cope with now for a change. [applause]

I am aware that we find ourselves in an ambiguous position here. Our foreign friends keep asking us: What are you in the Federal Republic doing anyway? And we cannot say: For us the original situation is not the same as it is for other European countries or even for the United States. More consideration is imposed on us--and I am not trying to agitate with this speech. We must enter into a different sort of division of labor. We must make the necessary and required sacrifices for filling the military gaps that might occur in Europe if and when the Americans and other European countries safeguard our far flung and long, vital routes and lines, no matter how difficult this may be for us. I am expressing myself as carefully and as generally as I can here.

Yet for this very reason the 50 percent solution must not be introduced in a contractual manner under MBFR. The insiders know what is meant by that. [applause] If the military presence of European countries in the Middle East or in Africa becomes necessary, not for the purpose of colonialist expeditions but for the purpose of protecting our friends, then no gap in Europe's defense must ensue. Therefore we cannot agree with a provision that the armed force of one participating state must not put up more than 50 percent of the troops operating in that area, because this would make us the captives of our own illusions and euphoric ideas again.

I do not think that I differ with the foreign minister in this particular point, if I have understood him correctly. It is a different question, though, whether this is so unanimous in the Federal Government.

The Federal Government and we, who have expressly welcomed the decision of the arms gap closure and deemed it inevitable, did not approve of this decision just because the Berlin SPD congress so wanted or because some colleagues in this house vehemently demanded it. The Federal Government has approved this decision because it did not see any other option, and they had to approve of this decision knowing that this would lead to the most serious confidence crisis between West and East and to a collapse of the detente euphoria and illusion.

With its approval of the NATO decision, for which we praise and not chide it, the Federal Government has dealt a terrible blow to detente in Europe we have come to know it. And what Mr Zamyatin said today again is nothing but this: Either you revoke this decision or we will not negotiate on arms control and disarmament. Whether this is the Soviet Union's last word is a different question with which I do not intend to deal just now. What I do want to discuss, however, is the problem of the divisibility or indivisibility of detente.

From this rostrum--and I checked this in the past few days--I leveled serious accusations at the chancellor in a number of speeches, even to being blind to history, when he spoke of the divisibility of detente. Naturally, the degree of tension is different because a military action along the border from Luebeck to Passau would immediately evoke the greatest risks with an automatic escalation meachanism which nobody can keep under control. This is why peace here has always been relatively secure, to the extent it can be secure at all in this world and in view of the partition of this world. Elsewhere, however, things are different. Elsewhere military actions or the support of military actions have been possible without any serious risk to the Soviet Union. What now matters, and nothing else, is to make it clear to the Soviets through countermeasures that they must withdraw their troops from Afghanistan and that they must not dare take any other action in the world, as otherwise detente policy will really collapse for good. [few words indistinct] [applause]

The Soviet party paper PRAVDA has asked the Federal Republic to continue detente policy as this benefits the Federal Republic as well as the rest of Europe. It writes, the DPA report reads verbatim: The unpredictability of the present policy of Washington makes this policy particularly dangerous for Europe. In the Federal Republic the governing coalition is linking its chance in the forthcoming Bundestag elections with the detente policy in Europe, whichhas lasted for 10 years now.

This clearly shows the point where interests meet, emphasizing the difference in interests between the United States and Europe, which is gradually coming into existence, but which basically does not exist, attributing to the United States an adventurous, criminal policy of readiness to take military risks and of veritably sacrilegious military carelessness so as to tell the Europeans: However, you may continue enjoying the fruit of this detente policy provided you repudiate this criminal activity of the Americans. This, after all, is the message of this PRAVDA article, and this is something which must be said concerning the concept of Soviet interpretation of detente policy. If we Europeans abide by our commitments in solidarity, shoulder to shoulder with the Americans, the other side time and again will accuse us of disturbing and destroying detente policy. At least there should be the power to realize this here, because it cannot be that just one partner defines and dictates detente. We, too, must have a say as to what detente means in our view. Detente means more rights and liberties for the people in the other part of Germany and Europe. Detente also means abolition of the order to shoot. Detente means normalizing along the lines of the recognition of the basic democratic rights of a citizen and his freedom of decision.

But as soon as you say this you are denounced by this propaganda machine immediately as a cold warrior, as agitator, as an enemy of detente and as an enemy of peace. The detente partner, however, dictatorically imposes on us what we may and may not do. Detente ceases to exist, ladies and gentlemen, when the military balance no longer exists. Detente must never contribute toward the neutralization or even mitigation of the will for defense.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH VANCE

[Excerpts] Washington--According to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Europeans should not cherish the illusion that they can keep out of the Afghanistan conflict. Following his consultations with U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance in Washington, Genscher called again on Monday evening for the formulation of an overall policy with which the West should oppose further Soviet expansionist moves.

In a talk with German journalists, Genscher said that the Americans accept the idea of a division of labor among the allies, adding that details ought to be formulated in the relevant bodies of the Western alliance. Genscher sees the German role here as being mainly in Europe and the Third World. He said that one active contribution by Bonn is a stepping-up of aid to Turkey under German leadership in order to buttress this cornerstone of the Western alliance politically and economically.

Genscher is also thinking in terms of closer cooperation with the Arab states along the lines of the agreements between the European Community and the ASEAN states, which intend to sign a cooperation treaty soon. Genscher considers it particularly important that the West draw closer to the Third World. He said that the developing countries are just as affected by the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan as Europe and America. This closer cooperation ought to be set in motion without preconditions.

According to Genscher, these ideas fell on fertile soil in Washington. Carter's administration largely shared these views. But Genscher made no bones about the fact that the United States expects real efforts from its allies. It is also important to make it clear to Moscow that Europe and America consider their interests equally affected. "We are in the same boat," Genscher said. Soviet efforts to undermine Western solidarity must be resolutely opposed.

Following the talk with Vance, Genscher called for a continuation of the policy of detente in Europe; the West's relevant proposals are still on the table. Genscher obviously does not consider further sanctions against Iran a topical issue since Iran's territorial integrity is now threatened by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

He said that regarding the hostages there are certain developments that have to be awaited. He also gained the impression in his talk with Vance that the United States would welcome fresh movement in the Middle East dialog. The differences between Egypt and the moderate Arab states have to be overcome. Genscher described the atmosphere in the talk with Vance as "very friendly." The United States understood that Bonn considers the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan a challenge just as much to Europe as to the United States.

Support for U.S. Policies

[Excerpts] Washington--The United States Government is prepared to take up the German proposals for a Western overall strategy to oppose further Soviet expansionist moves. This is how Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher summarized the substantial results of his 2-day talks with the United States Government. He forecast a busy week ahead filled with diplomatic activity in this direction.

The talks were marked by "extraordinary friendship," Genscher said at his press conference. He also said that the United States was very grateful for the support of its viewpoint on the crisis areas of Iran and Afghanistan by the Europeans and the Germans.

The two sides clearly stated that the matter must not stop at protests against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The challenge must be met with a long-term policy. The German proposals envisage a division of labor between the Western allies in which the focus of the German role would be placed on Europe and on aid for Turkey.

The stabilization of Pakistan was mainly a matter for the Americans and perhaps also the British, but other states, such as the Federal Republic, could be included with a view to economic support. A cooperation agreement with the Gulf states is also being considered.

Genscher said that during the past few months the Soviets had twice misread the situation: They had incorrectly calculated the reaction to the Afghan invasion, and had not taken seriously enough the Europeans' efforts to modernize their defense. Now it is necessary to prevent the Kremlin from misreading the unity between the United States and its allies; otherwise, valuable time for fresh points of contact would be lost.

According to Genscher, the Americans agreed that the Western initiatives in the sphere of arms control must be pursued further, that is, in talks on medium-range weapons, the Vienna disarmament talks and the coming CSCE conference in Madrid.

According to Genscher, Carter did not ask the Federal Republic to join in a boycott of the Olympics. A decision on participation in the Olympics will be taken by the EEC in Brussels. Genscher added that the arrest of the Soviet civil rights activist Andrey Sakharov will have a negative influence on the Moscow games.

DEFENSE MINISTER APEL HOLDS TALKS WITH NATO'S ROGERS

[Text] Mons, Belgium--Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel arrived today for talks with NATO Commander U.S. Gen Bernard Rogers in NATO headquarters near Mons. The minister, who is accompanied by State Secretary Karl Schnell, was welcomed at the airport by NATO Deputy Commander German Gen Gert Schmueckle, who will take part in the talks with Rogers.

The conference, which is to last several hours, will center on the development of the international situation and questions of the modernization of the German Bundeswehr and the new structure of the army. Apel intends flying back to Bonn the same day.

Apel, Gen Heinz Interviewed

DW221302 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1900 GMT 21 Jan 80 DW

[Martin Schulze interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel and Deputy Bundeswehr Inspector General Heinz in Brussels--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Now that you have talked with General Rogers; Mr Minister, tell me: Did the West know anything, and if so how much, about the preparations for the invasion of Afghanistan?

[Apel] The West did know. The West received information relatively late in December, yet this information was not sufficient to foresee an invasion of this magnitude. This means that to that extent we were taken by surprise. But now we have the governments under very tight control [as heard] on the whole so that additional surprises are not possible.

[Question] General Heniz, NATO was taken by surprise in the Afghanistan issue, as the minister has just said. The people of Western Europe are afraid. Are there any indications now of a Soviet deployment in the direction of Western Europe? Rumors to that effect do make the rounds.

[Heinz] We are aware of these rumors. We have refuted them, too. From our viewpoint there is no indication whatsoever that something is going on over there which goes beyond the normal level. Whatever is happening can be classified as normal maneuver activities.

[Question] Mr Minister, did NATO fail to draw any conclusions at all, or has some thought been given at least to cutting short the advance warning period.

[Apel] Quite a bit of thought has been given to this subject; it also played a role in our conference today. We will have to reexamine quite a few things. We will have to reexamine, for example, whether the ammunition reserves are adequate everywhere. This will require a continued debate. As for the advance warning period, we have no reason whatsoever to change the advance warning period which we now envisage. Unlike Afghanistan, where they invaded a country in which 4,000 Soviet advisers had been operating and where combat units were present already, these opportunities for the military to stroll in do not exist here. Hence, no anxieties about changing anything in that respect.

STRAUSS SUGGESTS NEW DEFINITION OF NATO MISSION

[Report signed FY.: "Strauss Suggests New Definition of NATO's Tasks"]

[Text] Bonn, 18 Jan--In an interview with this newspaper on Friday, CSU Chairman Strauss voiced the expectation that the Federal Government would be prepared to draw "concrete conclusions" from the changed world situation, especially in the event another aggravation occurs, above all in the Middle East. Strauss thereby referred to the meeting scheduled for next Thursday to which Chancellor Schmidt had invited the CSU Chairman [Klast] on Thursday. Reportedly Apel, Genscher, Kohl and Zimmermann will participate in this meeting as well. Asked about his concepts, Strauss referred to his speech to the Bundestag the day before in which he had pointed out that the present delimitation of NATO's sphere of interests has been rendered obsolete by political developments and that a new definition is necessary. As matters stand the protection of the sea routes for raw materials and oil supplies can be handled only by the allies of the Federal Republic. He rejects a mission of the Bundeswehr outside the sphere thus far envisaged. Strauss advocates the view, however, that in this case the Federal Republic must be prepared to relieve the allies in central Europe and that tasks would have to be assigned to the Bundeswehr which have so far been handled by the allies. Strauss hinted that as far as he is concerned neither the size of the Bundeswehr nor the duration of conscription is a taboo subject. "The only taboo subject that exists for me, in this connection, is the maintenance of peace," said Strauss.

The CSU chairman further indicated that he does not rule out the possibility that a further worsening of the situation in the Middle East might confront the Federal Government with the need to consider rationing. Strauss is obviously very worried by the possibility that the Soviet Union might let the present crisis situation jump over from the Middle East to the states bordering on the southern coast of the Arabian Peninsula.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON OLYMPICS, AFGHANISTAN

NC231238 Paris AFP in French 1234 GMT 23 Jan 80 NC

[Text] Paris, Jan 23 (AFP)--The Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan has been judged "unacceptable" by the French Government, but should not call into question the staging of the Olympic games in Moscow, said an official Cabinet statement here today.

A possible boycott or transfer of the scheduled Moscow venue is considered by the French Government to be an inappropriate method of re-establishing a "normal" situation in Afghanistan. The French Government made clear that they will not be joining any initiatives to disrupt the Moscow games for, as the statement explained, France had helped re-draw the modern Olympic rules to re-establish the tradition of the four-yearly Olympiad.

"Under these rules," the statement went on, "only the International Olympic Committee [IOC] has the sole authority to choose the games' venue, and the IOC authorizes the national committees to look after the participation of their own athletes. Therefore, the government has no intention of intervening in any decisions made by the French National Olympic Committee."

Concluding, the statement emphasized: "Despite this decision the French Government judges the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan as unacceptable, and considers that they must now commence a normalization of the situation there to conform with the rights of the Afghan people and the requirements of international peace."

NATIONAL COMMITTEE ACCEPTS SOVIET INVITATION TO OLYMPICS

[Text] The Committee for Human Rights--Moscow 1980, which was set up in Paris this morning to boycott the Olympic games, is calling for a demonstration of solidarity with Andrey Sakharov tomorrow evening in front of the USSR Embassy in Paris. The French Olympics and Sports Committee tonight replied officially and favorably to Moscow's invitation for this summer's games.

GISCARD SEEKS 'CLARIFICATIONS' FROM BREZHNEV ON AFGHANISTAN

LD221229 Paris LE FIGARO in French 18 Jan 80 p 4 LD

["H.K." report: "Giscard Puts Questions to Brezhnev"]

[Text] In a message conveyed to Leonid Brezhnev, Valery Giscard d'Estaing has recently suggested an in-depth exchange of views between Paris and Moscow on the Afghan affair. It is in view of the special relations existing between the two countries and to insure that these relations are not upset by misunderstandings that the president would like to obtain clarifications from the Soviet Union.

Explanations given so far have been unsatisfactory. In particular, the head of state would like the Kremlin leaders to clarify their intentions with respect to Afghanistan. For instance, France would like to be told more clearly under what conditions the Soviet troops will withdraw from the country which they occupied almost a month ago.

In his message, the president recalled the position adopted by France, which has condemned the intervention by Soviet troops. He emphasized that France supports peoples' right to self-determination.

The exchange of views proposed by Valery Giscard d'Estaing should take place between high-level officials. For the time being no possibility of a visit by Jean Francois-Poncet to Moscow has been mentioned. A visit by Andrey Gromyko to Paris is to take place during the first 2 weeks of April. The date of this visit will not be moved forward.

CHABAN-DELMAS TO END MOSCOW VISIT OVER SAKHAROV AFFAIR

LD231035 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 23 Jan 80 LD

[Text] The first reaction from a French official [over the arrest of academician Sakharov] is that of Jacques Chaban-Delmas, president of the National Assembly, who is currently on a visit to Moscow and who has decided to cut short his trip in the belief that the events in Afghanistan were already unacceptable and that the latest treatment of Sakharov is intolerable. On the line from Moscow is Paris Radio's permanent correspondent Gabriel (Merett)

[Begin recording] I can state that Jacques Chaban-Delmas will leave Moscow shortly for Paris. It was certainly a very difficult decision to make because--although I cannot officially confirm this news to you--the letter from Jacques Chaban-Delmas to the Soviet leaders, notably Mr Leonid Brezhnev, has not been yet delivered. However, members of the delegation accompanying the president of the National Assembly have readily explained that it is inconceivable, after the decision made yesterday by the Soviet leaders against Nobel Peace Laureate Andrey Sakharov, that this visit, scheduled long ago, could continue as if nothing has happened. In fact, even before coming to Moscow and while Afghanistan was the main topic throughout the world, Mr Chaban-Delmas said that he would ask the Soviet leaders to take concrete steps in favor of detente. The least that can be said, and yesterday's events confirm this, is that officially such action has been lacking on the part of the Kremlin. Although Mr Chaban-Delmas told the CPSU general secretary that he condemns the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and considers it inadmissile and unacceptable, he did not directly raise the case of Professor Sakharov. But by leaving Moscow he condemns the measures taken against Sakharov. [end recording]

PCF CENTRAL COMMITTEE MEETS IN IVRY

LD221112 Paris Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Text] There is news on the progress of work at the Central Committee of the Communist Party, which has been meeting since yesterday in the Ivry area of Paris. Maxime Gremetz, who is in charge of international relations for the PCF, submitted a report in which he denounces a return by France to an Atlantic alinement. This alinement, he says, is practiced not only by the government but also by the Socialist Party of Francois Mitterrand, who is trying to introduce a social-democratic policy. Mr Gremetz thus echoed Georges Marchais' words on television last night. A report by Pierre Juquin is also worth mentioning. He deals with the contesting of the official line which is developing within the Communist Party, but points out that these moves are restricted to a small number of comrades, and is normal in any democratic party.

L'UNITA CRITICIZES USSR OVER SAKHAROV ARREST

AU230841 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 23 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome, January 23 (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party daily L'UNITA today harshly criticized Soviet authorities' decision to confine Nobel Peace Prize winner and Soviet dissident leader Andrei Sakharov to the city of Gorkiy.

In an article in today's issue commenting on reports from the physicist's mother-in-law in Moscow, L'UNITA said that measures of this kind "show first of all the incapacity of resolving in terms of tolerance and free confrontation of the tensions running through Soviet society."

According to the paper, the "minority" nature of the dissident movement and also its "isolation" with respect to the majority of public opinion, "far from legitimizing the harshness of repressive measures, highlights even more the rigidity of a mechanism of political and civil relations which are based on a monolithic vision of society which considers pathological and irretrievable everything which is different.

"Under this profile, this is another depressing confirmation", the paper added.

L'UNITA then speculated on why Sakharov was arrested and confined at this moment when he had voiced very harsh criticisms of Soviet policy and leaders in past years. By way of explanation, the paper said in part: "Things change when the Soviet-American crisis explodes and Soviet leaders, defining American leadership no longer credible, feel themselves surrounded and take steps for maximum internal unity. The situation should make everyone reflect. The winds of the cold war may freeze not only international relations, but on both sides, the mechanisms of temperance and reason."

SOVIET BALLET DANCER REQUESTS POLITICAL ASYLUM

COSSIGA TO DISCUSS INTERNATIONAL, EEC ISSUES IN WASHINGTON

AU230905 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 23 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome, January 23 (ANSA)--Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga will have his first important international appointment of the new year today when he begins his brief but heavy schedule of encounters with American leaders in Washington. Besides President Jimmy Carter, Cossiga will meet with Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, national security advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski, Defense Secretary Harold Brown and Treasury Secretary William Miller. The Italian Government leader's two-day visit will include sessions with congressional leaders and American businessmen.

The agenda of topics is long and varied, including the most burning international topics of the moment: the Soviet thrust in Afghanistan and its consequences (including the Olympic games boycott), the Iranian-American stalemate, the ailing health of Yugoslav President Josip Broz Tito, the Middle East situation, along with the American political situation (with the 1980 White House race getting under way) and the Italian political scene.

Cossiga is going to Washington not only in his role as Italian Government leader but also as European Economic Community (EEC) deputy chairman, and in preparation for the visit he had telephonic consultations with British Premier Margaret Thatcher, West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

Cossiga is convinced that the European "Nine" must show the highest degree of cohesion to be able to play a more incisive role on the international scene. He is of the opinion that Europe must cease being an object of the policies of the superpowers and become a subject of international politics.

A confrontation of American and European positions is considered particularly useful in this stage of acute international tensions.

Cossiga was preceded in Washington recently by Margaret Thatcher and West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and will soon be followed by French Prime Minister Raymond Barre and later by West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

While in the United States, Cossiga will also be given up-to-date information on the situation in Asia when he meets with United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim on his return from a visit to India and Pakistan.

Though international affairs will take the lion's share of Cossiga's talks, he will also discuss bilateral economic relations with his hosts. Cossiga is slated to meet with John Samuel, former undersecretary at the State Department for economic affairs, who will head a delegation of businessmen to Italy in April to study ways to increase American investments in the Italian South.

TERRORIST DEBATE MAY POSTPONE DC CONGRESS

AU230933 Rome ANSA in English 0835 GMT 23 Jan 80 AU

[Text] Rome, January 23 (ANSA)--The Christian Democrat [DC] Party Congress, slated for February 1-5 and which is expected to virtually decide the eventual degree of Communist participation in a government majority, may be postponed seven-ten days.

The delay would become necessary should the small but highly vocal Radical Party carry out its filibustering threat against the antiterrorist decree already passed in the Senate and not before the lower house.

The decree must be passed within February 14 or will expire. The lower house is also debating a bill (which has no expiration date) on measures against organized criminal terrorist activity.

The eighteen Radical Party deputies have proposed more than seven thousand amendments to the decree which provides for national police coordination, stiff jail terms for serious terrorist crimes and leniency for suspects who cooperate with the police.

In order to cut short the debate it is possible that the government will propose a confidence motion.

LISBON ROUNDS UP REACTION TO PROPOSED OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

LD221540 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0800 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Excerpt] More Soviet troops are arriving daily in Afghanistan. All signs are that a major offensive against the Muslim rebels is in the offing. But it is thought that both the Chinese and Americans will have a word to say on the matter.

As is known, the U.S. President opposed from the very outset Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. More recently, Carter went as far as to suggest a boycott of this year's Moscow Olympics if the Soviet troops do not withdraw within a month.

At the moment it is known that 8 of NATO's 15 members support the U.S. President's attitude. However, countries like Chile, Argentina, Mexico and the socialist bloc have already made it quite clear that they hold a different view. Sports authorities, for their part, are not very happy with Carter's idea. The same, naturally, can be said of the athletes--the main protagonists of this the great festival of sport--who have been working hard for years with their thoughts on an Olympic medal. But, as Pierre de Coubertin once said, the important things is to participate.

UDP DECLARES AIMS OF UPCOMING CONGRESS, CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT

[Excerpts] The Popular Democratic Union [UDP] announced at a news conference this morning that its fourth congress will be held in April.

Three reasons were listed for holding the congress: First, the holding of a broad, profound, critical and self-critical debate on the UDP's political situation and the activities of its leading bodies; second, the political responsibilities arising from the significant increase in the votes polled in the interim elections; and last, the need for guidelines for the UDP's activity within the popular movement and in the political struggles to come.

After its weekend session the UDP National Council released a communique critical of the government. It says that the government's main goal is a total legislative and international turnabout. It also criticizes the president of the republic, describing him as a man on whom NATO places its full confidence.

The UDP has also voiced its commitment to creating a popular unity force--a process already underway--to provide a leftwing alternative and in which Major Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho will play an important role.

GREEK, SPANISH FOREIGN MINISTERS BEGIN TALKS

LD222242 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Yeoryios Rallis and Marcelino Oreja, the Greek and Spanish foreign ministers, held their first working meeting in the Santa Cruz Palace this afternoon. The situation in the Mediterranean, particularly the Cyprus problem; the European conference on security and cooperation to be held in Madrid next autumn; the situation in Asia after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan; and the problems of European integration were the main subjects discussed.

This evening, Mr Rallis is attending a dinner offered in his honor by his Spanish colleague, Mr Oreja, in the Viana Palace. Tomorrow the Greek minister will have a meeting with Spanish minister for relations with EEC, Leopoldo Sotelo Calvo. He will be received by Prime Minister Suarez and will visit the Congress, where he will be received by Landelino Lavilla, president of the Cortes.

MINISTRY SOURCES DENY RUMORED CHILL IN RELATIONS WITH UK

LD221132 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Text] With regard to international relations, the news that the visit of the king and queen of Spain to Great Britain has been suspended sine die has been denied by sources close to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs speaking to this newsroom. According to these sources, it would be difficult to suspend a visit that has not yet been planned. As for the reasons given for this alleged suspension--a cooling of relations between Spain and Britain--the same sources say that this does not seem to be sufficient grounds considering that relations have already lasted 270 years.

MADRID DAILIES COMMENT ON SUAREZ' U.S. VISIT

LD231117 [Editorial Report LD] Spanish newspapers published 16 January 1980 carry editorials criticizing the White House statement issued at the conclusion of Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez' visit to Washington.

Madrid EL PAIS expresses surprise on page 8 that two separate statements were issued by the two sides, instead of the usual joint communique. It maintains that there are "considerable differences of tone" between them. The paper describes the White House statement as "disturbing," inasmuch as "the Spanish side, according to the Americans has gone a good deal further than most Western countries in agreeing that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan is a 'flagrant violation' of the UN Charter and 'constitutes a very grave theat to international peace,'" and in suggesting Suarez' agreement with "'concrete measures which will make the Soviet Union realize the consequences of its conduct.'"

EL PAIS speaks of a fear in both Europe and the United States "that President Carter has overestimated the extent of the tension and is pursuing a 'brinkmanship' policy worthy of the heyday of Foster Dulles." It continues:

"All these anxieties, in which nothing less than world peace and what is rightly being termed the apocalypse are at stake, would be unexpectedly increased by Suarez' agreement in Washington as expressed by the White House communique, which, however, is seriously qualified by that issued by the Spanish prime minister's office. Spain is not in a psychological, political, social and economic position to take part in 'convincing' the Iranians, perhaps by means of a blockade of the Gulf and military actions from strategic bases, some of which are in Spain. It forms no part of our traditional policy, of our relations with the Arab countries, of our urgent need for oil and our stance on the Middle East conflict or the Palestinian problem.

"Above all, we should not be in a position to undertake anything which has not been previously and extensively debated and which does not have the assent of the party leaderships, meeting not only in conclave but also in an open debate in parliament in which everybody will be accountable to public opinion for what he says and how he votes--an extensive national debate, in short, in which the appraisal of international issues will not be conducted taking other people's problems into account as much as our own."

It asserts: "Spain should not take part in a cold war. That is neither its vocation nor in keeping with its situation.

Instead, it should strive to offer its good offices to the parties and to be a factor in the dialog and reduction of tensions. This is not the stance which follows from the Washington communique, but we do not know whether it is the one which could follow from Madrid's qualifications."

Madrid MUNDO OBRERO urges Prime Minister Suarez on page 7 to explain the reasons for his apparently sudden visit to the United States, and compares the wording of the two communiques. "To what," it asks, "has the Spanish prime minister committed himself? Was he summoned to discuss specific matters, because they already have sufficient talkers to talk for talking's sake in the United States? Specific matters--let us say--such as Spain's entry into NATO in the medium term and the use at any time and immediately of the Spanish airbases by the United States within the context of its operational plans in the Persian Gulf, Pakistan, the Middle East...."

MUNDO OBRERO maintains: "It is necessary to go out into the world, of course. It is necessary to work with an independent and real Spanish policy in order to give an impetus in Europe and the world to peace and detente, which depend on strict respect for each country's sovereignty and borders. It is necessary to insure that the Soviet forces leave Afghanistan to the Afghans, that all powers abandon the bases on other people's territory, that the deployment of new missiles be abandoned and that progress be made in disarmament.

"This is no dream. There are many other countries, currents of opinion, peoples and movements in Europe and the world with which to proceed along this path, which is not that of either of the opposing blocs."

PNV OFFICIAL EXPLAINS PARTY'S STAND IN CORTES

LD221144 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Text] Carlos Garaicoechea, president of the Basque General Council and the Basque Nationalist Party (PNV), last night summed up his party's position in parliament and also defended himself against accusations being levelled against him from various points of the political spectrum. Garaicoechea said that accusations made against the PNV have so far been of a polemic kind. His claims are based on the inexplicable fact that the Basque people have not been able to get an agreement on new packages for transferring powers to the Basque General Council since February last year.

Garaicoechea also said that there had been agreements with Suarez, some of which are being distorted, if not contravened, in a scandalous manner. It is obvious that the PNV was negotiating with the government although there is no notary documents. It is one man's word against another.

GOVERNMENT SUMMONS USSR ENVOY, SHOWS CONCERN FOR SAKHAROV

ID222128 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2009 GMT 22 Jan 80 ID

[Text] The government tonight expressed anxiety and distress at the reported arrest of Soviet dissident leader Dr Andrey Sakharov.

The Soviet ambassador in London, Mr Nikolay Lunkov, was called in to the Foreign Office by Parliamentary Under Secretary of State Mr Richard Luce, who expressed the government's concern on behalf of the prime minister and the foreign secretary. According to REUTER, Dr Sakharov, a Nobel Peace Prize winner, has been stripped of all honours and his mother said tonight he had been sent into internal exile.

Mr Luce said that the arrest of Dr Sakharov following the invasion of Afghanistan, was further evidence of Soviet disregard for genuine detente.

In the Commons, 50 Labour MPs and three Liberals tonight tabled a motion deploring the arrest. The motion, sponsored by Mr Greville Janner, Labour MP for Leicester West and president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, calls for Sakharov's full reinstatement and assures him of the deep admiration, respect and concern of the House of Commons. Mr Janner said the Labour signatories represented "a complete cross-section of the parliamentary party from left to right."

Earlier, in Commons exchanges, Mrs Thatcher said the government took a very serious view of the reports and added: "We will most certainly register it."

THATCHER ASKS FOR ALTERNATIVE OLYMPIC SITE, OFFERS UK

ID221642 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1624 GMT 22 Jan 80 ID

[Text] Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher is writing to Britain's Olympic Committee today asking them to seek an alternative site for the 1980 games, due to be held in Moscow. And she told the Commons today, she was offering sites in Britain for certain events.

Mrs Thatcher's announcement followed a meeting of ministers earlier today at Downing Street, which she chaired, to consider moves by Britain against the Soviet Union following the invasion of Afghanistan.

Meanwhile, the Department of the Environment is likely to carry out an urgent study of sites throughout the country which could be used to stage some of the Olympic events. Among sites being considered were Holme Pierrepoint in Nottingham for rowing, Crystal Palace, Earls Court and Wembley in London, Meadowbank in Edinburgh which staged the Commonwealth games, the Isle of Wight or the Clyde Estuary for sailing.

The moves were considered by ministers at the meeting today. Their scope was reflected in the responsibilities of the twelve there. They included the secretaries of state for defence, industry, energy, and Minister of State for Trade Mr Cecil Parkinson. Also present were the foreign secretary, the lord chancellor, the chancellor of the exchequer and the attorney general.

The question of paying for the removal of the games from Moscow was unlikely to be a sticking point with the government, and ministers were willing to see extra cash made available through the Sports Council to finance the shift.

Britain was continuing diplomatic efforts to try and persuade as many other countries as possible to follow the lead of U.S. President Carter and Mrs Thatcher in pressing to have the venue for the Olympics moved from Moscow. In addition, backbenchers from both the government and the opposition will be seeking to try and put increased pressure on Britain's sporting administrators to drop their opposition to a switch for the Olympics. The games were last held in Britain in Wembley, north London in 1948, and the site has recently been facelifted. And London has been suggested as a possible site for the 1988 Olympics.

NATIONAL OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION FAVORS GAMES IN MOSCOW

[A. J. McIlroy report: "British Athletes 'Will Still Go to Moscow Games'"]

[Text] British athletes will go to the Olympic games in Moscow with or without government approval, the British Olympic Association [BOA] and spokesmen for member bodies said last night. This decision followed President Carter's weekend call for a boycott of the games in protest against the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan.

The association said it was fully behind leaders of the International Olympic Committee in resisting American proposals to switch the games to Montreal. Member associations pledged support "even if it means losing traditional financial support from our own government."

The decision has put the associations on a confrontation course with the government, which has supported Mr Carter. Government spokesman would not comment on any possible financial sanctions to persuade the associations to co-operate. The government contributes 15,000 pounds sterling a year to administrative expenses of the Olympic Association, provides money towards uniforms and other items and lends 75 percent of the fares of competing athletes.

Mr Bill Cox, spokesman for the Amateur Boxing Association said they feared that the government would influence big business concerns who were big supporters of the Olympic Association and other amateur sports bodies. A BOA spokesman said confusion over the future of the games had already affected efforts to raise the 1 million pounds sterling needed towards the cost of sending teams. The Amateur Swimming Association said it would go to Moscow even without the traditional uniforms and other facilities provided with government aid.

It was not considered likely that many American counterparts would go against their president's wishes.

Lord Killanin, president of the International Olympic Committee, disclosed his own anxiety over the problem yesterday by announcing from his Dublin home that the committee's executive board would meet on Feb. 10 and 11 in Switzerland to hear a report from American Olympic officials. While most committees in member-countries are expected to support the British committee's opposition to Mr Carter, it is uncertain what action the American committee will take.

Lord Killanin and committee officials have been the first to point out that under the Olympic rules it is for national Olympic associations to decide such issues and not for governments or politicians. Under the international rules national Olympic associations must be autonomous and must resist all pressures whether political, religious or economic.

Lord Killanin said he did not underestimate President Carter's wishes. "This is the most difficult situation I have had to face," he said. He had made it clear that he would not take a second term of office with the committee. "I had a heart attack two years ago and do not feel another eight years would be a good idea."

He might be prepared to support the growing lobby for a permanent home for the Olympics, though not necessarily Greece. He had rejected the idea some years ago but noted that the Greek prime minister, Mr. Konstandinos Karamanlis, had raised it again. "My only reservation is that a permanent site must be neutral," he said. He believes the games should proceed as planned in Moscow.

Sir Denis Follows, chairman of the British Olympic Association, said: "If we receive representations from the government we will consider them, but we shall accept the invitation to the games once it is formally sent out from Moscow, the host country under agreement by the International Olympic Committee. We are loyal members of the International Olympic Committee. There is no question of our not attending the games in Moscow. I have to go on with the efforts to raise 1 million pounds sterling on this very basis. We have nearly half a million pounds still to raise and it worries me that we have to go on working in these circumstances to raise the money."

The British Government, or even the Olympic Association, could do nothing to stop individual groups of athletes attending the games.

Sir Denis joined other officials of amateur sports associations in saying there was no question of British athletes being opposed to the reasons for President Carter's actions. The International Athletes' Club had already asked the international committee to ban all flag ceremonies and national anthems as a form of protest against the Russian invasion and this had been supported by British representatives.

COMMONWEALTH TEAM TO OBSERVE RHODESIAN ELECTIONS

LD22175 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1710 GMT 22 Jan 80 LD

[Text] An 11-member Commonwealth observer team flies from London to Salisbury tomorrow to see if the Rhodesian elections at the end of February are free and fair.

At a press conference at the Commonwealth Secretariat today team leader Mr. Rajeshwar Dayal, former Indian foreign secretary, was asked if the team would recommend that Rhodesian independence should be withheld if they thought the elections were not free and fair.

"That would be a long shot," he said. "I would hate to contemplate a contingency of that kind which would be entirely negative. It would be a very serious situation."

The team recognized that conditions in Rhodesia were unusual, he said. "One has to make some allowance for deficiencies. Even in the most orderly countries deficiencies occur in elections."

The observer team would be prepared to receive complaints from political parties, but would suggest grievances should be dealt with by the competent authority.

The group paid a courtesy call on Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington today.

Britain has given assurances that the group will receive full cooperation from the Governor Lord Soames, and will have complete freedom of movement in Rhodesia, a Commonwealth Secretariat statement said.

They would concentrate particularly on such issues as freedom of expression and assembly, the statement said.

Other countries represented are Australia, Bangladesh, Barbados, Canada, Ghana, Jamaica, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Sierra Leone and Sri Lanka.

SOME PROGRESS MADE IN ULSTER TALKS

[Colin Brady dispatch: "Ulster Talks Take a Tiny Step Forward"]

[Text] Belfast--Crucial talks about Ulster's political future continued to inch forward optimistically in Belfast yesterday. Several sensitive issues have still to be negotiated, but the fact that the talks have not collapsed in acrimony after four sessions is encouraging news to the government.

The Official Unionists, the province's biggest single political grouping, are steadfast in their refusal to take part; but the Rev Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists [DUP]--who are participating--hope to persuade them to change their minds.

The groupings at the conference, apart from the Democratic Unionists are the Social Democratic and Labour Party [SDLP] and the moderate Alliance Party.

So far, there has been no head-on collision between the SDLP, who insist on an "Irish dimension" involving Dublin and the DUP, to whom this is abhorrent. This has been avoided because the issue is not formally on the agenda, instead in a neat manoeuvre proposed by Mr. Atkins, Ulster secretary, the parties can raise items outside the official agenda scope in individual meetings.

This way, a bitter clash at the conference table is avoided but the views of the individual parties on controversial issues will still be passed on to the Cabinet.

The conference is to meet again today and delegates have agreed not to talk to the press.

The Greek Cypriot side, he stressed, is ready and desires the resumption of a substantive, constructive and decisive dialog. KLIRIDHIS CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT ON AMERICAN PLAN

NC230820 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 23 Jan 80 pp 1, 2 NC

[Text] Mr Glavkos Kliridhis, the opposition [Democratic] Rally Party leader, apparently ending his "truce", reverted to his attact on the government, blaming it for its treatment of the American plan of November 1978 and for the government's present approach to the intercommunal talks.

But the government spokesman retorted by accusing Mr Kliridhis of "exploiting the danger of colonisationof Famagusta for which the Turkish expansionism alone must be blamed" in order to attack the government. The spokesman stated on Monday that the government had dismissed the American plan because of its content but had not refused to treat it as a "non-committing working paper" at the conference table.

Mr Kliridhis, speaking at a meeting of the political committee of his party in Limassol, said that the explanations given "do not relieve the government of the responsibility for the rejection of the American plan, nor could it convince any reasonable man about the correctness of the treatment'.

Mr Kliridhis said the government had for a long time hidden the facts from the people saying that it had neither rejected or accepted the plan and later saying that it rejected it because it contained "partitionist elements" and now, several months later it says actually that it had formally rejected it but informally accepted it as a non-committing working document.

Mr Kliridhis recalled that the U.N. secretary-general told both parties that the plan could be used as a framework for discussions and amendments without prejudice to the stand of the two parties and that the talks would be under him; therefore there would be no departure from the UN auspices. All this, Mr Kliridhis said, confirmed the need for a strong government to deal adequately with the serious problems.

Mr Kliridhis questioned the wisdom of inviting experts for a draft constitution before political decisions are taken. Experts can only put in legal language political decisions or agreements and therefore what is needed in the first instance is for the government to take political decisions on the disputed points of the Makarios-Denktas agreement, Mr Kliridhis said in obvious reference to the guidelines which still need definition.

"If the government has arrived at new and concrete political decisions on the controversial points of the Makarios-Denktas agreement, then the presence of the experts is useful. But if not then no reason for calling experts exists, given that one of them, Prof. MacDonald, was in Cyprus and cooperated with President Makarios, the negotiator and his advisers for the preparation of the proposals of 1977", Mr Kliridhis said.

The government spokesman, in a rebuttal, said Mr Kliridhis was exploiting the danger of colonisation of Famagusta in order to blame the government for the rejection of a plan which "in the assessment of the government and of the overwhelming majority of the people was unacceptable to be used as a basis for negotiations." The spokesman insisted that the plan contained "inadmissible elements" and its acceptance as a basis for negotiations would create commitments towards undesirable directions.

In the circumstances the foreign minister told the UN secretary-general the reasons and the acceptance as a "noncommitting working paper" and Dr Waldheim prepared his plan. It was this plan which the Cyprus Government accepted but the Turks rejected.

The whole situation about Famagusta was discussed yesterday by the Famagusta Coordinating Committee and the foreign minister, Mr Rolandhis and the Greek Cypriot negotiator Mr Ioannidhis. In the meantime the board of the Famagusta Chamber of Commerce and Industry, in a statement insisted that Mr Rolandhis had told their members that the American plan contained both negative and positive points and that he would try to persuade the UN secretary-general to adopt it and also convince the president and the government to accept it as a basis for negotiations.

According to the Chamber's statement Mr Rolandhis said that final decisions would be taken by the government but he was concerned about the AKEL stand. But Mr Rolandhis described the Chamber's allegations as "totally unfounded" and said he would be issuing a detailed reply today.

Government Spokesman Statement

NC230919 Nicosia Public Information Office in English 22 Jan 80 NC

[22 January statement by Cypriot Government spokesman]

[Text] Exploiting the danger of colonisation of Famagusta, for which Turkish expansionism alone is to blame, Mr Kliridhis reverts to the subject and tries to blame the government for rejection of a plan which, in the assessment of both the government and the overwhelming majority of the people, was unacceptable as a basis for negotiations.

What the government did in the period after submission of the plan is proved by documents and minutes. What Mr Kliridhis says about official and unofficial handling of the matter by the government is an arbitrary allegation. All government moves were official. The government cannot simply make public all it does.

The government accepted the framework-plan as a non-committing working paper as early as December 1978. It did not accept it as a basis for negotiations because there were unacceptable elements in it. Acceptance of the plan as a basis for negotiations would create commitments towards undesirable directions.

Dr Waldheim, before whom Foreign Minister Mr Rolandhis placed written views which included acceptance of the plan as a non-committing working paper, prepared a plan of his own which the government accepted. Therefore, since Mr Kliridhis admits that negotiations had to be carried out within the framework of the United Nations, what counts is Dr Waldheim's plan which finally emerged from an assessment of all factors.

KARAMANLIS REJECTS BOYCOTT OF MOSCOW OLYMPICS

[Text] Athens, January 22 (ASNA)--The Greek Government today condemned what it called the commercial interests and the political discriminations that have filtered into the Olympics.

Greek Premier Konstandinos Karamanlis stressed his country's interest in bringing the Olympics back to their place of origin, in Greece, as of 1984. He also lamented the fact that the less developed countries find themselves, even in the field of sports, in a position of inferiority with respect to the big powers, which have monopolized the Olympic games since they are the only ones able to sustain the costs involved in organizing them, he said.

The Greek Government will officially ask that the games be held permanently in Greece and will submit a series of proposals on the creation of infrastructure.

Karamanlis reiterated his criticism of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan but said he was against a boycott of the Olympic games to be held in Moscow in June. Greece will take part as planned, he said.

TO VIMA Report

AT221501 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 22 Jan 80 p 10 AT

[Excerpt] As is well known in statements by Prime Minister Karamanlis, the Greek Government has put forth for discussion the issue of permanently holding the Olympic games in Greece. However, last Friday, although in a talk with foreign correspondents Karamanlis reiterated this proposal, at the same time he made it clear that Greece does not intend to participate in the "boycott" of the Moscow Olympic games.

AKROPOLIS SUPPORTS GREECE AS PERMANENT SITE OF OLYMPICS

AT221240 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 22 Jan 80 p 2 AT

[From the "Laconic" column: "The Olympic Games and Greece"]

[Text] Karamanlis' idea to establish Greece as the permanent site for the Olympic games is gaining ground. Already President Carter has thrown his weight on the scale of decision by supporting the acceptance of the Greek prime minister's proposal.

It is still too early, of course, to take anything for granted. Very many countries must agree. However, the advantages of holding the Olympics in Greece are so significant that the Greek proposal does not constitute an excessive or unrealistic demand, and it is worth pursuing its acceptance persistently and methodically. After all, let international society recognize its moral debt to classical antiquity in a practical way, because we have been satiated with mere rhetoric.

AKROPOLIS PREDICTS REJECTION OF ROGERS NATO PROPOSAL

[Text] Very soon, Supreme Allied Commander General Rogers will have a new meeting with Deputy Defense Minister Davos on the issue of Greece's special relationship with NATO. It is predicted that Rogers will put forth a new proposal for the settlement of the issue, but its content is not yet officially known.

The Greek Government also knows nothing officially regarding Rogers' reported views on the apportioning of NATO jurisdiction in the Aegean into three zones, one of which will cover the Greek national area and will fall under Greek command, another of which will cover the international area and fall exclusively under NATO command, and the third which will cover the Turkish national area and fall under Turkish command.

In any case, informed sources have observed that the Greek side would not be prepared to accept such a settlement if Rogers indeed intends to make this proposal.

I KATHIMERINI RECOMMENDS CAUTION IN INTERNATIONAL EVENTS

AT191600 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 19 Jan 80 p 5 AT

[Editorial: "With Wisdom"]

[Excerpts] The tendency toward exaggeration, one of the negative elements of our public and social life as well as generally of our character and behavior, once again became manifest recently on the subject of and as a result of well known international developments and particularly on the Afghanistan crisis, its sequel and the seriousness of Marshal Tito's health. The serious character of developments, circumstances and prospects tend to be presented in our country with an extent and character which, if not unrelated, is at least disproportionate to the true dimensions of the entire situation.

This exaggeration has different origins and reasons and tends to converge upon certain experiences. Often it is due to the character of certain personalities; at other times it aims to create a certain "climate" favoring certain political goals. At other times it is motivated by the desire of the "merchants of concern" for profit.

The fact that developments in Afghanistan created a crisis in international relations is obvious.

These exaggerations, therefore, the unfounded dramatization and "danger-mongering" undertaken either naively or for "spurious reasons" should not lead to a loss of composure and it should not draw the responsible leaders of the country into hasty or spasmodic actions, diverting the country from the priorities established for coping with dangers and needs facing Hellenism.

It is obvious that Greece must take a position on issues of principle and international law and other issues. Beyond this, however, it has no reason to become involved voluntarily and actively in confrontations and clashes between forces and interests of a worldwide caliber and scale unrelated to our country's specific interests. At a time when forces of the magnitude of the EEC avoid such involvements then why should we?

Interpretation of involvement must also include actions which are hasty, untimely, undertaken nervously or under false impressions. Such an action would be the country's return to NATO's military wing without prior fulfillment of conditions and prerequisites set by the Greek side and which are related to vital interests and the country's very security.

International and Balkan developments, whether real or immaginary, do not change the facts of the issue and do not nullify the above conditions and prerequisites. We make this statement because recent reportage has connected the well-known recent changes at the Ministry of National Defense with trends and aspirations of at least certain government personalities by contrast to those supported by other personalities. Any possible "deviations" on such vital issues could have direct consequences.

We believe the government will not be influenced by any such "danger-mongering"--whether it is in good faith but unrealistic or often (which is worse) deliberate--into taking hasty and wrong actions. A relevant assurance on this was delivered in the Greek Chamber by the prime minister himself. The origin and the direction of any imposition against Hellenism does not alter things. We will once again express the conviction that the Greek Government will not stint any form of action toward anything which might be construed even as a possible imposition or any "forceful" imposition upon the legal and acquired rights, security and sovereignty of Greece or upon the substructure of Hellenism at large. We believe it will not deviate from the position held to date or from the rules which govern such a position. Consequently we believe it will not accept any "deviations" upon the substance of the matter, that is "gilded" proposals which do not conform to the essence of the legal and accepted Greek interests.

[Unattributed commentary: "Foreign Policy"]

[Excerpts] Dear listeners, on Wednesday, the Senate and the National Assembly will hold a joint meeting to discuss Turkey's foreign policy in general. We shall all soon find out to what degree this debate--to be held at a time when regional tension is increasing and the imperialist war drums are being heard--will clarify for the public the obscure aspects of our foreign policy, and will contribute to the adoption of a foreign policy stand in our national interests. An independent, peaceful and anti-imperialist foreign policy is the best stand that will defend the rights of our working class, toiling people and the Turkish nation of 45 million. Such a foreign policy can only be realized through the difficult struggle of our people.

Turkish Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has announced in a statement that Turkey will not participate in the U.S. decision of an economic embargo on the Soviet Union. It is no coincidence that there are such contradictions in the capitalist world on this issue. As Lenin put it, socialism is a formidable revolutionary factor with its economic power.

Let us take a look at Turkey. The existing trade agreement between Turkey and the Soviet Union, which is in effect until 1981, envisages the tripling of the trade volume between the two neighboring countries reaching $1.27 billion. With this agreement--based on equality of rights and mutual benefits--the Soviet Union undertakes to supply Turkey with 3 million tons of oil annually, to provide the necessary machines and equipment to the iron and steel mills--which play an important part in the development of our national industry--to supply agricultural equipment as well as to build electric power stations and dams and to supply the necessary raw materials for other industrial enterprises.

Currently, the national economy is going through its worst crisis. Gasoline, diesel oil and cooking oil cannot be found. There are no raw materials and no foreign exchange reserves. The factories are operating at half their capacity. The national economy has reached this point because of the exploitative imperialist monopolies which claimed that there are no oil (?reserves) in Turkey. Under the circumstances, to impose an economic embargo on the Soviet Union in accordance with the request of the imperialists, would be to completely disrupt our national economy and to undermine our people's interests. That is why the foreign minister's statement is so significant.

Turkey must also adopt a clear and definite stand on the issue of participating in the Moscow Olympic games. From the very beginning this proposal by the U.S. President has been opposed by a large part of the public. Washington's efforts to mix politics with sports have already been defeated. As the International Olympic Committee president has stated, Carter must give up his efforts to use sports to achieve his political aims, and it is for the International Olympic Committee and not Washington to decide on participation in the Olympic games. This is concrete proof that the U.S. proposal has boomeranged.

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "Our Place in the West..."]

[Excerpt] We were relieved and gratified to see that Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has refrained from talking as the foreign minister of the Democratic Party era, full of "admiration for the West." Truly, in a statement to a newspaper the other day, Foreign Minister Erkmen very clearly explained Turkey's attitude toward the international crisis which has arisen as a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the question of American "hostages" in Iran.

This is what he said: "If we have characterized Soviet action in Afghanistan as contrary to international law, this does not amount to a declaration of animosity toward the Soviet Union." Furthermore, the foreign minister emphasized that Turkey is not concerned with the decision of the United Staes and some Western countries to impose certain economic sanctions on the Soviet Union. The foreign minister also stated that Turkey does not intend to alter its friendly relations with Iran because of the 50 American hostages kept at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran--in spite of Ayatollah Khomeyni's bold statements (against Turkey) some time ago.

Erkmen's words symbolize a foreign minister who looks "in a realistic manner" at "friends" who turn their backs on Turkey when their interests are not served, but who embrace Turkey whenever their interests demand it. This inspires confidence, but this attitude should not prevent Turkey from benefiting from the present conditions of the world, in other words, from obtaining as much foreign aid as possible. We believe that it is at this juncture that Erkmen will prove his efficiency.

OUR RADIO SCORES CARTER CALL FOR OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

[Unattributed commentary: "The Imperialist Policy of Blackmail and the Olympic Games"]

[Text] Dear listeners, for days now an intensive aggressive campaign has been waged against the Soviet Union in Washington and Beijing as well as in the capitals of NATO countries. Carter and his comrades, who are leading this aggressive campaign, are implementing one after the other the steps that will lead to a return to the policy of cold war. As a first step, the United States stopped the sales of grain to the Soviet Union. This was followed by attempts to disrupt unilaterally the existing agreements of cooperation between the two countries in the economic, technical and cultural fields.

In an effort to justify this disgusting campaign based on gross anti-Sovietism, the lie and slander machine of [word indistinct] was activated. Ridiculous, unfounded and slanderous claims were made: After the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan it is now the turn of Pakistan and Iran; or the Soviets are massing troops at their Iranian and Turkish borders.

In a statement to ABC television, Carter revealed a new process in intensifying this aggressive campaign in trying to mix politics with sports and by attempting to use the Moscow Olympic games as a political and aggressive weapon against the Soviet Union. Carter called for a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games.

Dear listeners, in a statement to the Soviet daily PRAVDA, Comrade Brezhnev pointed out that those responsible for the present turmoil were the circles who were acting as if everything was permitted to them in the international field. The latest call by President has proved once more how right were Comrade Brezhnev's statements. Carter is attempting to give directives as if he were the president of the International Olympic Committee. Carter and his partners have no right to decide on whether the Moscow Olympic games should be held or not, that is for the committee to decide. President Carter is certainly aware of the statement of the president of the International Olympic Committee to the effect that no one will permit the use of the Olympic games as a political weapon.

The fierce and desperate attacks by Carter and his partners and their attempts to use sports to fan anti-Sovietism is proof of their confusion in the face of the determination of the Afghan people to preserve their revolutionary gains.

What has happened in Afghanistan? First of all, the plans of imperialists, NATO'ites and the Maoist administration in China and their plots against the Afghan people have been thwarted by the aid extended to this friendly country by the Soviet Union in reply to the call of the Afghan Government. This is the main reason why Carter and his partners are confused and this has pushed them to use their anticommunist and anti-Soviet weapons.

Comrade Brezhnev has clearly stated this fact: We are aiding new Afghanistan--in response to the call of its government--to preserve its national independence, its freedom and its honor in the face of armed aggression from the outside. The only task given the Soviet troops is to aid the Afghan people in repulsing an aggression from the outside. The Soviet Union is fulfilling its internationalist task, and will continue to do so.

Cutting off the grain sales to the Soviet Union to produce economic difficulties, like attempts to boycott the Moscow Olympic games, is meaningless and unfounded. It is not Carter but the Afghan administration and people who will decide how long the Soviet troops will remain in Afghanistan. As Comrade Brezhnev pointed out, Soviet troops will withdraw as soon as the reasons that made it necessary for the Afghan administration to call for Soviet troops disappear.

ARAB LEAGUE'S CHEDLI KLIBI VIEWS MIDDLE EAST CRISES

AU231656 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 23 Jan 80 p 3 AU

[Georg Possanner exclusive interview with Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League in Vienna on 22 January 1980]

[Text] DIE PRESSE: What are the concrete results of your talks with Chancellor Kreisky?

Klibi: I have broached two points. First, the Palestinian question. Here I have asked the chancellor to use his influence with his friends in Europe to improve the attitude toward the Palestinians. Second,I have attempted to explain to the chancellor that the negotiations between Isreal and Egypt will not produce any results. The reason for that is that the present Israeli Government is not ready to do anything of principal significance to let the Palestinians at long last obtain their rights.

[Question] Do you expect more from any other Israeli Government?

[Answer] After discussions with international experts I have gained the impression that, for example, Simon Peres would probably be more willing and able to do something more positive in this respect.

[Question] It has been rumored that Vienna will get an Arab League bureau....

[Answer] We plan and hope that this will materialize in Vienna in the very near future, because Vienna is very important to us through Kreisky's policy.

[Question] What do you expect from the Islamabad Islamic summit on 26 January?

[Answer] We have no direct influence on it and are not playing any specific role there. Moreover, only some of the potential participants are from our organization, and I am not at all certain that the meeting will materialize because some Arab countries have voted against it.

[Question] All important politicians of the world have taken a stand on the question of a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games. How do you assess this question?

[Answer] I am for a very clear division: politicians for politics, sportsmen for sports. Those should be kept apart.

[Question] How do you envisage Iran's future within the framework of the Middle East?

[Answer] The revolution has two goals: The first was the elimination of the old regime which was repressive and unjust. [Second] the revolution wants to build, on a long-term basis, a modern state based on Islam. In a revolution it may well happen that an adopted course cannot be followed 100 percent. Hence, we should be patient and help this (new) government along so that it can attain the objective it has set for itself.

[Question] Thus, Iran presents no danger to its Arab neighbors?

[Answer] We must regulate the relations between Iran and its neighbors in such a way, especially in the Gulf, that potential difficulties can be easily solved. The Arab countries should maintain cordial relations with Iran, and solve problems peacefully like neighbors.

[Question] Will Iran and the Arab world, being in control of the oil, use the oil weapon?

[Answer] There are difficulties all over the world. However, there is also oil in South America and in the United States, in England and in the Soviet Union. One should not always pin the blame for all difficulties on the Middle East. These difficulties result from the fact that oil is a raw material that can only be produced for a certain period of time. And it is certainly the Arab countries' right to take advantage of the time when they possess oil. They will certainly not have it forever.

[Question] But the point is the oil weapon.

[Answer] Patience; I'm coming to that. The industrialized countries have used this raw material for a long time to build up their industry at the expense of the underdeveloped countries, while forgetting these countries. The Arab countries, however, have extended their hand several times to help the European countries master their energy problems. But one cannot expect the Arab countries and the oil producers to keep selling their oil at the same price while the price of gold is soaring. If the industrial countries were ready, however, to continually adjust the price to the dollar devaluation, and if they were to recognize the fact that the oil deposits are not inexhaustible and can be exploited up to a certain point only, then I see no difficulties.... But, if the question is broached here whether oil is to be used as a weapon, all I can say is that it is the Americans who for the first time have frozen all Iranian funds in the United States--something nobody thought possible--and who want to carry out a sea blockade.

Thus it is evident that possibilities exist of which no one would have thought in the past. Should the oil-producing countries be compelled to use oil as a weapon, it must be said that they are fully entitled to do so.

[Question] Under what circumstances would this happen?

[Answer] That cannot be said. The Arab countries would adopt a decision to that effect if they were of the opinion that their interests were threatened. However, I want to emphasize that up to now there has been no intention to use oil as a weapon.

[Question] But 'Arafat is constantly threatening this.

[Answer] 'Arafat is a revolutionary leader. He has the right to say anything that serves his revolution, but I hope that the Arab and oil-producing countries will not come into a position of doing what 'Arafat is threatening.

[Question] If you condemn the American measures against Iran, do you then regard the taking of hostages in Tehran as justified?

[Answer] As I have said before, every revolution involves certain slip-ups. I am absolutely against the taking of hostages. I said so as long as 2 months ago, and it was I who 2 months ago in Tunis assisted the Palestinian Liberation Organization in establishing contact with the Iranian Revolutionary Council. I did that for two reasons: First, to bring about the liberation of the hostages and, second, to demonstrate that the PLO is also ready to make peace efforts.

[Question] How dangerous do you assess Soviet expansionism to be in the Middle East?

[Answer] There are two views here. One says that the Soviets have launched an attack and are pursuing a policy of expansion; the other, that the Soviets have come to the aid of the government of the country where they now are. Then I would like to draw attention to another difference between the Arab and the other Islamic countries: We see that here the interests of the Western powers are threatened; now the Islamic and Arab countries are asked to take a stance on the situation in Afghanistan. however, the Arab countries are living day after day in a dangerous situation. Take the Palestinian problem, or the occupation of the Golan Heights. If we assess the situation objectively, then we must say that those who have supported the Arab countries in the past have been the Soviets.

This is why the West and especially America must face up to making a choice between the Arab countries and Israel. The Arab countries find it difficult to support America internationally because it is still on Israel's side, and this also accounts for their inclination to consider the use of oil as a weapon.

[Question] In your opinion, what is more dangerous to the Middle East--the existence of Israel, or the expansionism of the Soviet Union?
